A judgment by Lord Mansfield had more than once been quoted, in which that eminent Judge had laid down "that custom should override covenant." This principle, though it might be correct law, should not, he maintained, be allowed to stand in the way of the measure before their Lordships. To those familiar only with the customs of England and Scotland, it was difficult to understand the operation of the Land Act; but their Lordships would understand that, in the case of Irish tenant right, they were not dealing with one interest only, but with two—namely, the interest of the landlord, and that of the tenant, which was legalized by the Act of 1870. Under the Act, as he understood it, the landlord had a right, at the close of the lease, to re-consider the value of the holding, and to re-let it at the full market price; and the tenant, on the other hand, having the right to compensation if he were disturbed, or to remain at a fair rent. His noble Friend (Viscount Lifford), last year, had referred to the case of Lord Leitrim; but it was well known that that noble Lord had a good deal of litigation with his tenants, and, no doubt, had sometimes to pay a large amount in compensation. The amount of compensation, whether it was small or large, did not affect the principle of the case at all. He did not think that if his noble Friend succeeded in his opposition to the Bill he would improve the position of the landlords of Ireland. His noble Friend had had a very long experience as an active landlord in the North of Ireland; and he asked him whether he thought that many years would elapse before, in some manner or other, this matter would be settled, and whether a postponed settlement was likely to be in the interests of the landlord? He was himself aware that on many estates in the North of Ireland the principle which the Bill would establish prevailed. He would only mention those of Lord Downshire, one of the largest in Ireland; of the Duke of Abercorn, whose liberality to his tenants was well known; and of Lord Londonderry, who had hoped to be present to support the Bill. He earnestly asked their Lordships to give a second reading to the Bill, and not, by rejecting it, to inflict a heavy blow and a sore discouragement on those who were willing to be their landlords' friends, if they would only let them.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^a."
—(The Earl of Belmore.)

VISCOUNT LIFFORD, in moving that the Bill be read a second time this day six months, said: I have heard it reported that it was said in "another place" by a Conservative of a Tenant Right Bill introduced by another Conservative—"This Bill is not to be considered harmless on account of its insignificance." If my noble Friend will not be offended, I will say the same of the Bill before your Lordships. If you will look back to the history of Ireland, you will see that it is, with few exceptions, a course of sacrifice of great principles for temporary and often paltry ends. This Bill is not an exception. It proposes to sacrifice a great principle of English law, laid down by Lord Mansfield, that a custom shall not override a covenant for some advantage, which no one has asked for, about which few people care, and which, as seems to me, is not altogether patent on the surface of the Bill. The first case, to the circumstances of which the Bill before your Lordships would apply, was a curious case—"M'Noon v. Beauchere"—in the County of Down. There a very old lease of land close to the landlord's residence expired. The landlord wished to take the land, or some of it, into his own hands; and the County Court Judge awarded £1,400 against the landlord as tenant right, or something about £20 an acre. This dropped through, as I understand, from some informality.

Then came a case of "Austin v. Scott," in the County of Derry, which was decided by Chief Justice Monahan in accordance with the principle of this Bill, but was appealed, and the appeal was not heard in consequence of the death of one of the parties. Then came a case—Lord Ranfurly and Murphy—in Tyrone, and that was decided by the County Court Judge in accordance with this Bill; but that decision was reversed on appeal. It is, therefore, unfair to state in the Preamble of this Bill that doubts have arisen, because in no instance has a case been determined in accordance with this Bill, and one has been determined against it. Notwithstanding, it may perhaps be said, as it has been said, that what your Lordships are asked to do now was done by the Act of 1870. If so, which of your Lordships was aware that you were then abrogating without protest, without notice, a fundamental principle of English law? Judge Barry, then Attorney General, said, in supporting the Bill of 1870—

"No human being ever felt disposed to deny that if persons entered into a contract it was their duty to abide by it. Nobody ever questioned the doctrine that if a man took land for a certain number of years under a lease, he was bound to quit at the end of the term without notice."

Sir Roundell Palmer, now Lord Selborne, said—

"The retrospective part" [of the 3rd clause] "applicable to present tenancies, left all leases for fixed terms exactly as they stood by law, so that there would be no claim against the landlord upon the termination of any existing lease."—[3 Hansard, cc. 1536.]

These are the statements on which your Lordships passed the Act of 1870; and if your Lordships were to pass this Bill, you would make a greater inroad on the principle of English law and English equity than this Act ever did. And now I hope you will bear with me while I refer to the Land Act itself, with a view to showing the danger, the injury to Ireland, of further extension of it. In the first place, I am ready, in the barren, but somewhat populous district in which I live, loyally to make the best of it. There is much that is valuable in it, especially the "Bright Clauses." A Land Act was necessary; and I have, long before Mr. Gladstone took it up, urged in your Lordships' Committees that the tenant on eviction should be compensated for everything he or his predecessors had expended on the land, the presumption to be in favour of the tenant, failing proof to the contrary. But the Land Act, while it did not give so much to the tenant as that would have given, looking to the whole of Ireland, went far beyond it in the invasion of the rights of property, and that on no fixed principle whatever; so that to a people brought up as the Irish people were, half-a-century ago, to believe that the land was theirs and not the owner's, it was like giving blood to a tiger, though the Irish people have, for the most part, endured the trial with a marvellous patience. Still, here are some of their demands which, if this Bill be passed, will, of course, apply to the termination of a lease—

"The Act of 1870 has been tried now for three years, and its very framers must admit that it has utterly failed to accomplish the end for which it was passed—namely, the protection of the homes and properties of the Irish farmers. Therefore, it takes its place among the other abortive attempts that have been made for the last 16 years to solve the Irish difficulty. Nothing will or can meet the case but fixity and valued rents, with right to sell."

At a meeting held in Maryborough in 1873—there were 10,000 people present—the following resolution was passed:—

"That we insist on perpetuity of tenure, valuation of rents, and free sale, as the only just settlement of the Land Question."

Let the landlord do what he likes with his own demesne; but one of the speakers denied that the land in the occupation of the tenant was his. The speaker asked—

"Is not the whole country in a state of dismay, irritation, and alarm, because of a Land Act, which is as huge a piece of treachery as was ever permitted to see the light? The electors asked for an Act which would secure them in their tenures, which would give them a right to property erected by their industry, and which would enable them to either hold, bequeath, or sell that property at pleasure, and what is the nature of the Land Act which these Representatives have had the assurance to dictate to them, and as to which Bumbledom has vomited so much? Why, it is an act of treachery, which has hardly a single redeeming clause annexed to it."

I have read enough to show your Lordships that the violation of the laws of property has produced its natural effect, and that the scent of spoliation has encouraged demands of which the framers of the Land Act never dreamed. And now my noble Friend steps in with his little drop of blood, infinitesimally small and worthless in the opinion of the Irish tenant, but, in principle, a greater breach of the laws of property than anything in the Land Act, and lays it in the track to what? Here are the words of a man who, in his outspoken, fearless utterances, was a truer friend to the Irish tenant than any of those who cajoled him or deceived him—the present Chief Secretary for Ireland. He said—

“Well, the hon. and learned Gentleman asked me to go further, and to say that this custom should be extended to districts and estates upon which it does not now prevail. To that I reply, unhesitatingly, that if we begin de novo I cannot conceive any worse system upon which land can be held than that which is known as the Ulster custom. What is that custom? Why, as I said the other day, it is simply a device for locking up the capital, which otherwise ought to be spent upon the soil. The hon. Member for Malloy (Mr. MacCarthy) spoke upon the question of political economy in connection with the matter. In a former debate, I ventured to tender the advice that the political economist had better hold his peace in a discussion of this question from the point of view of the tenant-right advocates; because, from the point of view of political economy, what can be worse than withdrawing capital which ought to be employed in the cultivation of the soil, and not merely locking it up—that would be bad enough—but removing it altogether from the land? A man comes into a farm under the Ulster custom. He pays down all the money he has, all he can collect from his family and friends, and all he can borrow from usurers and others, and what becomes of the money? When he leaves the farm the money is, perhaps, taken to the Colonies, or it is invested in business, miles away from the land upon which it ought to be spent; and I cannot conceive anybody arguing, from the politico-economical point of view, in favour of the adoption of this Ulster tenant custom where it does not prevail. So much for the first part of the Bill; and when I am asked why the Government do not address themselves to its principles, I say that the principle of this Bill is pure, undiluted, unmitigated Communism.”

This is Ulster tenant right as regards the tenants, and if it occurred at the end of a lease such would be the tenants' position. As to the landlord, it is by no means so unfavourable, for he gets all his arrears of rent out of the unfortunate incoming tenant's money; and the tenant having invested so much is adstrictus glebæ, and cannot throw up his farm, as I hear so many tenants are doing now in England. But is that a wholesome state of things as regards the economy of Ireland as a nation? There is only one point more to which I would call your Lordships' attention, and that is the increased power which the latter part of the Bill puts into the hands of the County Court Judges. These gentlemen are, I am sure, all honest; some are able; a few learned. But when most of them were appointed, their office was not nearly so important as it became under the Land Act. In deciding land claims, they follow different modes. One gentleman takes, as the Act intends, the custom of the estate; another takes the custom of the district generally; and a third decided in three ways, for in one case he gave £20 an acre against the landlord; in another he said (page 29, Evidence before Lords' Committee) that he would give what a farm would sell for in open market; and in a more recent case he laid down the law that a small proprietor should be treated differently from a large one. The landlord must agree to whatever rents the County Court Judge chooses to fix, or pay sometimes the fee-simple value of his land apportioned on such vague principles. I look on this Bill as a spoliation of the landowner, whose ancestor granted lands with covenants for quiet surrender, and probably at a low rent, in consideration of certain works to be done by the tenant instead of a high rent, as bad for the incoming tenant, but most mischievous to Ireland, as increasing the hope of further revolutionary changes, and setting at defiance the plainest laws of political economy.

Amendment moved, to leave out (“now,”) and add at the end of the Motion (“this day six months.”)—(The Viscount Lifford.)

THE EARL OF LONGFORD said, he had charge of a similar Bill last Session, when the noble Viscount took alarm at some provisions which were not in the Bill, as he had done just now, and stated his objections so forcibly that the Bill was thrown out. The Bill did not contain any of the revolutionary measures of which the noble Viscount seemed so apprehensive; it referred only to a special class of cases, and it could not be extended to others. It was not brought forward by a farmers' club or a tenants' league, to obtain by surprise and clamour that to which they were not entitled; but it was promoted by large proprietors in the North of Ireland, who examined the Bill with prepossessions against it, and, after scrutiny, came to the conclusion that the claim of the tenants was just, and that it would be just and wise to apply it. If it were said that a tenant who had a claim might go into the County Court to establish it, he replied that one object of the Bill was to prevent unnecessary litigation, and to arrive at the same conclusion by a simpler process.

LORD CARLINGFORD said, their Lordships knew well the hatred entertained by the noble Viscount, who had moved the rejection of the Bill, for the Ulster custom and the Land Act, and, if they had forgotten it, they would have been reminded of it now. The noble Viscount's experience of the Ulster custom had not been of the most favourable kind; he had probably seen it in its most objectionable forms, with not much improvement upon farms, and with an extravagant rate of payment for the same. He did not know whether the noble Viscount would go so far as the Chief Secretary for Ireland, who had lately said that the Ulster custom was by far the worst tenure he knew of on the face of the globe. That might be an opinion excusable in a gentleman who was only accustomed to the tenure of land in England and Scotland; but it was marvellous how such an opinion could be held by anyone acquainted with the various Provinces of Ireland. The question was one of results; it must be decided by the facts. Let anyone compare the condition of the tenants at will under the Ulster custom, with all its drawbacks and extravagances, with the condition of the tenants at will—the ordinary small poor tenants at will—throughout the rest of Ireland, and he would say—“Solvitur ambulando ; the case is settled by the facts.” The Land Act said that certain usages should be enforced by law; and this Bill said that one of those usages, when it was proved, should not be defeated by any doubts and difficulties entertained by the County Court Judge. It had been proved in numerous cases that the past existence of a lease did not, according to the Ulster understanding, which formed a moral and equitable bargain between the landlord and the tenant, debar the tenant from claiming tenant-right under the Ulster custom; and the only object of the Bill was that the tenant should be at liberty, if he could, to prove that such a usage attached to his farm. Some of the County Court Judges had held this view, which, in the case of an appeal by the Irish Society, had been confirmed by a Judge of Assize; but that was only a single judgment of the Assize Court, and the question had never been raised before the Land Court in Dublin. The intention of the Bill was not to add anything to the provisions of the Land Act, and not to increase the powers of the County Court Judges, but simply to remove certain doubts which ought never to have existed. So far as he was concerned, he could say that the intention of the Land Act was that the usage now sought to be legalized should be legalized. For these reasons he supported the second reading of the Bill, as he did that of a similar Bill last year.

VISCOUNT POWERSCOURT strongly objected to this perpetual tinkering of the Land Act, and thought their Lordships would set a very bad precedent if they consented to read this Bill a second time. The Irish landlord had been a very well-abused person; but, after the Land Act, he had supposed that he was to be left in comparative peace for some time to come. Under the present Act the tenant got compensation for all he did, whether he did it with the consent of the landlord or not. He thought that was going far enough, unless their Lordships contemplated taking away proprietary rights from the landlords altogether. The constant agitation for further change in the Land Law would create a very bad feeling if they consented to re-open the question, which, at the present time, was used very much for electioneering purposes. There was really no necessity at all for this Bill. He himself granted tenant-right at the close of a lease upon his estates in Ulster, and he knew that other landlords, upon whose estates the usage prevailed, did the same. The Bill was quite unnecessary, and he hoped it would not be read a second time.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, when, during the last Session, a Bill similar to the present came before their Lordships, he took the liberty of stating that, although the matter was one for which the Government was in no manner responsible, he should offer then, as he would offer now, some reasons why it appeared to him that their Lordships would act wisely in giving a second reading to the Bill. He must say that he thought the decision on this Bill should not be arrived at from any general view of liking or disliking the Irish Land Act of 1870. He spoke for himself on that subject. He was not an admirer of that measure. He took an opportunity in their Lordships' House to propose, and he thought he carried, several modifications of that measure; but he always held the opinion that, since it became law, it was the interest of all their Lordships to take care that no unnecessary friction or irritation was permitted in the working of that measure. For that reason, in 1871, when a decision was given in one of the Irish Courts—or an opinion was thrown out by one of the Judges in that country—which most seriously imperilled the interests of the tenants where sales had taken place of the property of their landlords in the Landed Estates Court, he introduced a short measure, which their Lordships accepted, to remove that doubt, and declare that the judicial opinion so given was without foundation. It appeared to him that there had now arisen exactly one of those cases in which, with a little care, their Lordships might prevent a difficulty and doubt, which might cause great irritation in various parts of Ireland if that doubt were permitted to remain unsolved. He was, therefore, glad to hear the noble Earl who moved the second reading (the Earl of Belmore) promise to offer an Amendment, which would confine the operation of the Bill to Ulster—because no question had arisen in any other part of Ireland. The Bill related merely to the custom of Ulster, and it would create confusion and doubt to extend it further. What was the question with regard to Ulster? The Act of 1870 did nothing more than this—it enacted a very simple, short sentence—which I took the liberty at the time of saying was by no means so full and clear as it ought to be—but there it was, and they must deal with as they had it. All the Act of 1870 said was—

The Earl of Longford

“The usages prevalent in the Province of Ulster which are known as, and in this Act intended to be included under the denomination of, the Ulster tenant right customs, are hereby declared to be legal, and shall, in the case of any holding in the Province of Ulster proved to be subject thereto, be enforced by this Act.”

Not a word was said about what the customs of Ulster were—no explanation was given—they were not told whether the custom of tenant right applied to leases or tenancies from year to year—the whole question was left to be solved afterwards by the Judge of the Civil Bill Court. Now, was that a satisfactory state of things? He thought it was not at the time—he thought it was not now. The difficulty they were now bound to consider arose from the want of clearness in the Act upon that subject. He had no doubt many of their Lordships were surprised at Ulster tenant right in any shape or form, and, no doubt, many more were surprised that Ulster tenant right custom applied where there had been a lease; but there was not the slightest doubt that in many parts of Ulster the system was always held to apply even where there was a lease. If their Lordships would look at the Devon Commission evidence, a number of cases would be found there sufficient to satisfy the Commissioners that Ulster tenant right was, in many parts, applied where there were leases; and to-night, he thought, instances were mentioned—names being given in the North of Ireland—that Ulster tenant right custom was allowed to prevail where there was a lease. Now, it was not enough to say that was very wrong, and contrary to what our ideas were. But the Act of 1870 had told them that whatever was de facto the custom of Ulster was legal; and, therefore, the only question that remained was, what de facto was the custom in the particular Province? How was that to be solved? He wished to point out this to those interested in property in Ulster—they were at present in this danger and difficulty, that wherever there was property upon which tenant right had existed in the case of tenancies from year to year, there the inference to be drawn was, that in the case of leases, also, they must take it to exist. The Judge was made judge of the fact by the Act of Parliament; and, therefore, though they might not like the conclusion, they must accept it. On the other hand, the danger of the tenant was this—the Judge might decide that it was contrary to the eternal fitness of things that there should be tenant right custom in the case of a lease—and there was danger to the tenant in that respect. This was really a casus omissus in the Act of 1870, which ought to be supplied by judicious and wise legislation. He should object to the Bill as it stood; but, with the Amendment of his noble Friend, he thought they would do well to read the Bill a second time. He understood that his noble Friend would follow the words of the Bill up to a certain point, and then add a Proviso that the customs should not apply if the landlord were able to show that upon any holding, or any property of which it was part, it had not been the custom to allow tenant right at the expiration of a lease. It appeared to him, therefore, that with that modification of the Bill, and the difficulty being cleared up that had now arisen, their Lordships would act wisely by reading the Bill a second time.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL thought their Lordships were entitled to complain of being called on to vote for a Bill which was totally different from the Bill now before them. The noble and learned Lord had made an admirable—he would not say a plausible—defence, but a really sound defence for such a Bill as he described, if only the state of facts alleged really existed. The noble and learned Lord, however, did not so much offer a defence of the Bill, as draw attention to the manner in which it affected the Land Act of 1870. Now, he (the Duke of Argyll) was one of the authors of that Act, and he entirely disagreed with the noble Earl (the Earl of Belmore) as to the general principles he had laid down as regarded that Act. He maintained that its principle was this—as had been clearly explained by the noble Earl behind him (Earl Fortescue)—that where customs, properly so called—where usages generally existed, so that they might be presumed to enter into the understandings of persons making contracts, those customs and usages really formed part of the contract, and should be recognized by Parliament. Therefore, when a custom was proved to be the usage of an estate, they were imported into the contract where a lease was entered into, and became part of the contract. These customs were recognized by Parliament, and it was upon the principle of legalizing existing customs that the Irish Land Act was founded. He must complain of the charge which the noble and learned Lord made of ambiguity in the Land Act. In that Act customs and usages were recognized; but customs and usages were not confined to Ireland—they existed in England and Scotland as well, though in these countries they were more limited. In various parts of Scotland there were usages perfectly well understood, which were never included in the contract; but which, if disputed in a Court of Law, would be invariably considered part of the contract. Therefore, he contended that the late Government were perfectly right when they sanctioned usages in general terms, and left it to the Courts of Law to say what were usages. The effect of the 2nd clause of this Bill was not to enable the Courts of Law to ascertain a usage, but to import, by Act of Parliament, a new usage. The noble Earl (the Earl of Longford), who was in charge of the Bill last year, recommended this measure on the ground that it had not emanated from farmers' clubs, but was brought in by great proprietors. But did the noble Earl know what was in the mind of the conveyancer? He must say it was hardly fair for the noble and learned Lord representing the Government to recommend the House to vote for the principle of the Bill because the Bill would be subsequently altered in Committee. For his own part, he objected to the principle of the Bill, because it directed the Irish Judges to presume that there was a usage where properly there was none. If the object of the Bill was that the existence of a lease should not preclude the tenant from making a claim, why should the Bill have been brought in? If their Lordships read the provisions of the Irish Land Act, they would see distinctly that every holder of a tenement in Ulster would be entitled to make his claim according to usage, and there was no clause whatever which limited him in making it. The noble and learned Lord who was at the head of the Law in England had brought an accusation against the Irish Judges that they did not interpret the law aright, but were guided by what they considered the eternal fitness of things.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR explained, that what he said was that there was a difference of opinion on the subject, and that doubts had been thrown on the meaning of the Act. Where an estate had been sold in the Landed Estates Court, and notice had not been taken of the rights which the tenant might have under the Act, those rights might be sacrificed. It was to remove these doubts that he introduced a Bill himself in 1871.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL said, he did not think the Irish Judges would be guided by the eternal fitness of things, but by their duty in ascertaining the facts. He had heard of one or two cases in which it had been found that tenants under lease were entitled to make this claim. He could not conscientiously give his vote in favour of the second reading of the Bill, under the vague expectation there would be made in Committee certain Amendments of which the House at present knew nothing.

LORD INCHQUIN said, that as the Bill was not confined to Ulster, or the Ulster landlords, those of their Lordships who resided in other parts of the country were, he thought, entitled to express an opinion upon it. He opposed the second reading, on the ground that the Bill was wholly unnecessary, and also that it was inconsistent with the rights of property. If the Bill were to pass, it would lead to claims of tenant-right in every case where leases existed. Even if the Amendments suggested by the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack were made, the presumption would be altered, and instead of the tenant having to prove that the custom did exist, the landlord would have to prove that it did not. If the Ulster custom, or anything approaching it, were extended to the other parts of Ireland, the value of estates, and of all reversionary interests in estates, would be diminished to a considerable extent. It exceeded his comprehension how landlords could come forward to advocate such a measure. Lord Justice Christian, in a judgment delivered in the Court of Appeal on the construction of the 28th section of the Land Act, said that hundreds of thousands of pounds belonging to the landlords of Ulster had been confiscated. Their Lordships were now asked to pass a Bill to extend the confiscation still further.

THE EARL OF DERBY said, that every noble Lord who had expressed an intention of supporting the Bill on the second reading had emphatically condemned it in the form in which it now stood. The noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack had condemned it, and so had the noble Duke (the Duke of Argyll) who was one of the authors of the Land Act of 1870. It was admitted on all hands that if the Bill were to pass, the one clause which contained the whole substance of it would require to be materially altered. In these circumstances, was it not rather unreasonable that their Lordships should be called on to sanction a Bill which it was not intended should be passed in its present form? If the Bill were withdrawn, and a new one, properly drawn, introduced, they would know what they were doing; whereas, it was very unfair to ask their Lordships to go to a division, and vote "Aye" or "No," when they could not know what it really was they were voting upon. They might, in the result, discover that they were voting for or against principles entirely out of harmony with their real feelings on the question. What he would recommend was that the Bill should now be withdrawn, and be brought up again when the Amendments to be proposed by the noble and learned Lord should have been incorporated with it.

LORD O'HAGAN said, that he was prepared now to vote for the Bill; but there was so strong an expression of opinion against it, in its present shape, that he thought an improvement in it would be desirable. A very small modification in the measure, such as that suggested by the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack, would meet the views, at all events, of his noble Friends on that (the Opposition) side of the House. As he understood the noble Earl who moved the second reading of the Bill, its provisions were not to extend beyond the Province of Ulster. The main object of the Bill being to facilitate the determination of the custom of tenant-right, where that custom existed, it appeared to him that the Bill would have more chance of success if that object was made perfectly clear. As he understood it, it was a clear and substantial question that the Bill had to settle; and the question, which was an important one, was not whether Ulster was to be governed in one way or another, but whether the Ulster tenant-right was to be legally recognized under given conditions. That which affected the Ulster tenant-right was important, for the right, as it existed, was the root of the prosperity of Ulster. Under these circumstances, he thought it highly desirable that the relations between landlord and tenant in Ulster should be permanently and definitely settled.

LORD SELBORNE said, he doubted whether the Amendments referred to by the noble and learned Lord would be adequate to meet the case. He joined with the noble Earl (the Earl of Derby) in asking not to be called on to vote either one way or the other whilst something most material and important was wanting; since he could not, in that case, tell whether he was voting for a principle to which he objected, or against a principle to which he would readily agree. He entirely agreed with the noble Lord (Lord Carlingford), and the noble and learned Lord (Lord O'Hagan), that it was quite clear that if there was a custom, the custom should be recognized; and, further, while it appeared from what had fallen from the noble Lord, who understood better than he could do what the feeling in Ireland was, that there was no difference of opinion in the country itself as to the desirability of existing doubts or ambiguities being settled. The Bill before the House, as he read it, said that the Judge should not go into the question of fact whether or not there was a custom applicable to this particular case; and he doubted whether the Amendment supported by the Lord Chancellor would be adequate to meet the objection. He understood the noble and learned Lord to say that it was proposed that the claim should retain its general character, but that a Proviso should be added, enabling every landlord to prove—if he thought fit—that there was no such custom applicable to the property. But that, by throwing the onus probandi upon the landlord, would be inflicting a hard and grievous burden upon him; and, further, the presumption in all cases would be raised against him that such custom did exist. He was convinced, under all circumstances, that their Lordships would agree with him that it was fit and proper that they should not be called on to vote at once. The right course would be to withdraw the Bill and have a new and proper one introduced, and then he hoped it would be agreed to.

THE EARL OF ANNESLEY, as a resident in County Down, the very centre of the Ulster tenant-right custom, was strongly opposed to the Bill. He invited their Lordships to consider what would be the state of affairs in England, if a large Lincolnshire farmer, for example, holds 1,000 acres, had to go to his landlord and pay him £25,000, which was at the rate of £25 an acre, before he took possession of the land. That, however, was only an ordinary case in Ireland, and he could tell their Lordships of some extraordinary instances. The noble Lord, after citing some remarkable cases, said he would appeal to their Lordships whether they wished the same state of things to extend over the whole of Ireland? Since this Bill had been put down for second reading, he had received from an agent for considerable estates in Ireland a letter on the subject. In this communication the writer stated that the Bill introduced a totally new principle, which, in some instances, would be most injurious to the interests of the land. The writer of the letter expressed the conviction that if the Bill became law it would lead to expensive litigation in certain cases where improvements had to be paid for at the expiration of a lease. He hoped that if the noble Earl in charge of the Bill insisted on taking a division, his proposal would be rejected by a larger majority than that which threw it out last year. The Bill contained a new and vicious principle; and he felt certain that nothing was more likely to injure the prosperity of Ireland than measures calculated to interfere with the security of property in Irish land.

EARL GRANVILLE said, he rose, not for the purpose of prolonging the debate, for he had no personal knowledge of the working of the Land Act in Ireland, but for the purpose of appealing to the noble Earl at the head of the Government whether he would not join in the request made to the noble Earl who moved the second reading to withdraw the Bill? From what had fallen in the debate that night, and also in that of last year, he thought that a grievance existed which ought to be redressed. He made this appeal to the noble Earl at the head of the Government in antagonism to the noble Earl who had charge of the Bill, for he felt convinced that if he pressed the second reading to a division, he would find himself, notwithstanding the powerful support of Her Majesty's Government, in a minority, and, therefore, this grievance would remain entirely unredressed. Under these circumstances, he hoped the Prime Minister would join in urging the noble Earl to withdraw the Bill, and to introduce it in a different shape, so as to meet the views which had been expressed in the course of the debate.

On Question, that ("now") stand part of the Motion? Resolved in the Negative; and Bill to be read 2^a on this day six months.

STATE OF THE COUNTRY—DEPRESSION OF TRADE.

QUESTION. OBSERVATIONS.

THE DUKE OF RUTLAND rose to ask the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether his attention has been called to a meeting of manufacturers at Huddersfield on the 2nd of the present month? The meeting to which he referred was called by the President of the Local Chamber of Commerce, and was attended by a number of gentlemen engaged in the manufacture of woollen goods. The first resolution passed affirmed that the present serious depression in the woollen industry in this country was largely caused by foreign competition. From the statements made by the several speakers at this meeting, and from the statistics of a valuable paper read by Mr. Brassey (extracts from which the noble Duke quoted), it was clear that the very greatest depression existed in the woollen trade, and that this depression was not decreasing, but increasing. They took exception to the statement of the noble Earl at the head of the Government on the 20th of April, that the volume of our foreign trade had not diminished; and seeing that foreign workmen worked 72 hours a-week they passed a second resolution, to present to Her Majesty's Government a Memorial praying for a Bill which should enable workers in factories to work 60 hours a-week, as could be done before the Act of 1874. It was clear, therefore, that the manufacturers present at the meeting desired that the hours of labour should be increased. He had sent a message to the noble Earl (the Earl of Shaftesbury), to inform him that he intended to bring the resolutions agreed to by the meeting before the notice of their Lordships; but he regretted to say that the noble Earl was unable to be present. The noble Earl had signalized himself by his devotion to the factory workers of this country, who were indebted to his ability, energy, and perseverance for the salutary legislation which regulated their hours of labour. Were, then, their Lordships going to agree to the prayer of the Memorial to which he had referred and to repeal the Factory Acts, so that the people, by working some 72 hours a-week instead of 56, might aid in reducing the intensity of the present depression? He thought their Lordships would dismiss the suggestion at once. As usual, there were three courses open to their Lordships. The first he had already mentioned. The second was one which might be debated, and which he was afraid had been somewhat popular. It was to hold our arms, open our mouths, and wait for something to fall into them; to trust, in short, to Providence, and hope that something of a satisfactory nature would happen. That would be a very easy course to pursue; but it was not one which their Lordships would assent to. He would again refer for a moment to the proposal to increase the hours of labour. A very important pamphlet had been written on the subject by a Mr. Lister, who pointed out that we were being ruined by having to compete with foreign nations, by whom 72 hours of labour were allowed in the week. Later on, Mr. Lister said—

"The Conservatives passed the Factory Act and the Liberals Free Trade; and these are antagonistic to each other; and I say that we cannot have restricted labour and unrestricted competition. The question, therefore, narrows itself to this issue—are we to make our factory operatives slaves, in order that we may compete with our rivals, or are we to protect both the labourer and the produce of his labour?"

Now that gentleman attended the meeting at Huddersfield, and, presumably, was a consenting party to the resolution in favour of extending the hours of labour from 56 to 60 hours. What had caused the change in his opinion? Perhaps he had read the words recently uttered by his noble Friend—namely, that reciprocity was a phantom, and he might have thought that, as he could get no relief in that direction, there was nothing for it but to lengthen the hours of labour. He (the Duke of Rutland) quite admitted that reciprocity was now a phantom; but he asked whether, if they put on duties on foreign imports, reciprocity would not, instead of being a phantom, become a living power? No fewer than 168 articles had been taken off the tariff, and only 22 remained on.

Why should they not say to foreign Powers—"Take off your duties, and we will treat you in the same way?" If they did, reciprocity would become a force; now it was as an enormous gun, without either powder or shot, but properly loaded it would become as formidable as one of the Armstrong guns. They had been, on a late occasion, reminded of the number of Treaties they had with foreign nations containing the "most favoured nation" clause, and it was said that they were bound to treat all those nations in the same way. That might be so; but he saw that last night there was a short debate on this subject in "another place," and that Mr. Bourke stated that the French Treaty had lapsed in December, and that other Treaties were about to lapse. Might he not suggest that those Treaties might not be renewed at all, or else renewed leaving out the "most favoured nation" clause, or in any other way in which life could be given to reciprocity? He now came to the third course which they might adopt, and which he believed was most likely to be conducive to the interests of the country; and that was to put a moderate duty on foreign imports. In favour of such a course he could cite Chatham, and Pitt, and Huskisson, and Thiers, and Bismarck, and Derby, and George Bentinck, and, might he not add, the name of Disraeli? These were some of the greatest statesmen who had ever lived, and they had all advocated a system of import duty. There was not a country under the sun, with the exception of this, which had not adopted the system. Would it not, if adopted here, relieve those who were suffering from the depression of trade, by means of indirect taxation? They now raised, on an average, £120,000,000 a-year by taxation and rates, and of that sum £20,000,000 only was raised by indirect taxation. Was that a fair proportion as between the two systems? No one, he thought, could say that it was. For all these reasons he hoped they would make some compensation to the hard-pressed manufacture of which he had spoken, by putting some duty on foreign imports, and protecting, not one industry or two, but all the industries of this great country. The ultra-Free Traders seemed to think that all the world was mad except themselves; but he hoped he had shown that the time had come when we ought to take some step for ameliorating the condition of our commerce and industry, even if we were to follow the example of those poor unenlightened French, or Germans, or Canadians.

THE EARL OF BEACONSFIELD: My Lords, I have listened with great interest to my noble Friend's expression of his views, which reminded me almost of the days of my youth, when I heard doctrines of the same kind enforced by himself with the same energy and determination. But I do not think my noble Friend has treated me very fairly in respect of the manner and the occasion which he has selected for bringing these matters before the House. In the first place, the Question, of which my noble Friend had given Notice, was whether my attention had been called to a meeting of manufacturers at Huddersfield on the 2nd of May? I keep my eye on public meetings as much, probably, as any Member of your Lordships' House, but, unfortunately, that meeting escaped my observation; and my noble Friend, by an inadvertence which I am sure was quite unintentional on his part, did not in his Notice give me any clue to the subject which had occasioned that meeting, and which he thought of sufficient interest to justify him in bringing it under the notice of your Lordships. But from the statement which my noble Friend has now made, I gather that the meeting was held in a manufacturing town of repute, in consequence of the general depression and distress, in reference to which I made some remarks a short time ago. I did not collect from my noble Friend anything which really seemed to meet the observations I then made. By way of refuting my remarks, he quoted the opinion of a gentleman (Mr. Brassey), who, although I do not know him, I have no doubt is a competent witness to the fact, that not merely the value of our woollen exports, but the amount—the volume of them—has considerably diminished. But, as a matter of fact, I never gave an opinion upon the state of the particular trade to which my noble Friend has called our attention this evening. I spoke generally, when I said that while the value of our exports had fallen off their volume remained unchanged. That statement was made upon official authority, and upon facts the accuracy of which no one can impugn, and it is perfectly consistent with the fact—if fact it be—that the amount of our woollen exports has diminished. The total amount of our exports may have been maintained, while our woollen exports may have diminished. I come now to the subject of reciprocity—and I must say it is gratifying to find that the arguments which were elicited in the course of the previous debate on this subject have convinced my noble Friend that reciprocity cannot be, in present circumstances at least, a satisfactory remedy for the state of things to which he has called attention. I showed, on that previous occasion, that reciprocity was really impossible with us. First of all, because we had almost destroyed our tariff. I stated that when we had still 168 articles left on our tariff the idea of reciprocity was not entertained; and that at the present moment the number of those articles was only 22, which it would be difficult for us to touch, since Revenue mainly depended upon them. But I also called the attention of my noble Friend to another difficulty which we should encounter in attempting to introduce the principle of reciprocity—namely, the number of Commercial Treaties we had entered upon, that number being, if I recollect aright, 38, every one of which contained the “favoured nation clause”—so that in obtaining a concession from any particular Power in return for one conceded by us, the remaining 37 nations would have the right to claim from us the same concession. I showed my noble Friend that, in these circumstances, the introduction of reciprocity must be a process of considerable time. I ought then to have added—what is an important consideration—that 20 of those Treaties are extended to our Colonies. The whole, therefore, of their vast foreign commerce would be disturbed, and possibly destroyed, if we suddenly interfered with those Treaties. Some of them are for a long term of years—10 years—others have conditions to be observed in terminating them which it would not be easy to fulfil. I do not think it is an exaggeration to say that it might take a quarter of a century to rid ourselves of all this machinery of Commercial Treaties founded upon the principle of the “favoured nation clause.” It is not, therefore, surprising, after all, that my noble Friend should be convinced that reciprocity, in the present state of affairs, is not the easy remedy which, unfortunately, so many people throughout the county consider it to be for the manufacturing and commercial distress now prevalent. My noble Friend did not come forward with the fresh remedy for the evil which appears to have been adopted by this meeting at Huddersfield. The meeting at Huddersfield seemed to regard the Factory Laws as the great cause of this evil. Well, my Lords, I am not prepared myself to change my opinion upon the wisdom, the beneficence, and the national advantage of that great system of legislation, commonly called the Factory Acts, without evidence more convincing than any yet produced that the distress in our manufactures is to be ascribed to that diminution of working hours which many believe adds to the efficacy of labour. Considering the unanimity of opinion with which your Lordships adopted that system of legislation, I do not suppose your Lordships would readily agree to a change. I do not think my noble Friend himself would do so. Well, then, if my noble Friend agrees that reciprocity is a phantom, and if he agrees that it is not in any legislative increase of the hours of labour that a remedy should be found for the manufacturing and commercial distress now existing, what is really the remedy which the noble Duke wishes us to adopt? It is neither more nor less than the imposing upon all foreign articles what my noble Friend calls “a moderate duty,” but which I shall call a duty, without the epithet, because I have observed that opinions as to what constitutes moderation differ greatly. I have no idea myself as to what are the “moderate duties” which my noble Friend would impose. Well, my Lords, this brings us face to face with one of the gravest questions that can demand our attention; and is it to be expected—is it fair to expect—that we should enter upon a discussion of it simply because my noble Friend has placed a Notice on the Paper that he will call attention to a meeting of manufacturers in Huddersfield on the 2nd of May—a meeting, the object of which is not even stated? If the noble Duke thinks the time has come for a vast change in the commercial system of the country, let him give Notice that he will call attention to the subject—let us have an attendance adequate to the occasion—whatever may be our opinions, let us have an opportunity of enforcing them by all that documentary evidence which the experience of many years has afforded us; and let us have a discussion worthy of the subject which by the country generally may be received with content and confidence. I must decline, on an occasion like the present, to enter on such a discussion. It is not unsatisfactory that by these guerrilla remarks we have had on two or three occasions the position occupied by my noble Friend and a numerous party in the country is now clear. It is not a movement in favour of reciprocity—which, in the present state of affairs, is acknowledged to be a phantom. It is not a movement for increasing the hours of labour—which my noble Friend says he will not sanction. It is a movement to produce a tariff which shall encounter the hostile tariffs of other countries by equal duties and equal regulations. That is what is clearly before the country now. The details of this change in our commercial system should be put before the country completely and clearly. Let us know what is to be the nature of this new tariff. It is not satisfactory to hear that it is to consist of what are called “moderate” duties—because one man will consider 20 per cent a moderate duty, and another man will consider 5 per cent moderate. Let us know clearly whether those who are proposing these changes are prepared to extend these duties to agriculture and its products. The noble Duke has reminded me of a remark I made in a former debate, and which I do not shrink from now. Of all the distress which now prevails among different interests, agricultural distress, which is so severe, is, perhaps, the only instance in which that severity can be traced or attributed to the change in our commercial system which was made when the principle of Protection was relinquished by the country. Is my noble Friend prepared to give to the agricultural interest that protection which he thinks is necessary? In the discussions which the present distress has led to, I have heard of schemes for relieving the pressure on British industry by what are called import duties; but we have always been told that land will be an exception to that protection, and that no article of agricultural produce is to be subject to these import duties. I can only protest against the injustice, if you are to have a protective system, that, under the plea that it is impossible to tax the food of the people, the landed interest and all its produce is to be subjected to unequal treatment. I hope your Lordships will not be induced to enter into a long and desultory discussion, when we have not before us any proposition embodying the conviction which my noble Friend so earnestly entertains. If he will bring before us the question whether we will give up the commercial system which was established 35 years ago, I am sure the House will give to so important a subject, brought forward by a Member of the House whom all so much respect, that due consideration which it would deserve.

INDIA—TELEGRAPHIC COMMUNICATION WITH INDIA.

ADDRESS FOR PAPERS.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL rose to move—

“That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty for Copies of any minutes or memoranda by the Secretary of State for India, or by Members of Council, in 1873, on the subject of telegraphic communications with the Government of India.”

The noble Duke said, he would not have brought the matter forward at so late an hour, but that by the time their Lordships met again he should probably be on the high seas. His object in moving for these Papers was this—the Viceroy had repealed the cotton duties; the repeal would involve an estimated loss of £200,000 a-year to the revenues of India; and the Viceroy had done this by overruling, which he had the legal power to do, his Council in India. As their Lordships were aware, the sanction of the Government at home to that course of action had been given, but not in the form of a despatch which had been passed by the Council of the Secretary of State for India. He did not wish to enter on the policy of the repeal of the duties; but it was evident that the step had been taken in a manner and at a time which had roused feelings of great asperity towards this country in India. A Member of the Council in India had recorded his dissent in language that was all the more remarkable, seeing that in other respects he was a warm supporter of the policy of the Government. He said—

The Earl of Beaconsfield

“I am convinced I do not overstate the case when I express my firm belief that there are not at the present time a dozen officials in India who do not regret the policy which has been adopted in this matter as a policy adopted, not in the interests of India, nor even in the interests of England, but in the supposed interest of a political Party, the Leaders of which admit that it is necessary at any cost to retain the support of the cotton manufacturers of Lancashire.”

This was a grave accusation, which he quoted, not for the purpose of suggesting that this had been the motive of the Viceroy, but to show that the subject was one on which it was important not to have acted without the fullest opportunity given to the constituted authorities to record their opinions in the prescribed manner. The Viceroy and the Secretary of State might override their Councils; but the Act of 1857 provided that every order or communication proposed to be sent to India, or made in the United Kingdom, should be submitted to a meeting of the Council or placed in the Council Room for seven days before it was sent out or issued. True, the Secretary of State might act through his Secret Committee; but there was no pretence for saying that a reform of the tariff was a matter to go through the Secret Committee. The Secretary of State had intimated to the Viceroy that his decision would be upheld; but that had been done without any communication with the Council, so that the Members had not had even an opportunity of recording their opinions on the policy of the act. This course of procedure had been defended by the Chancellor of the Exchequer in “another place.” He had no complaint to make as to the accuracy of the statement in its words given by the Chancellor of the Exchequer. Verbally, it was accurate; but the impression it conveyed out-of-doors was quite inaccurate. The noble Viscount the Secretary of State for India would admit that, so far as he was concerned, he was not responsible for the use made in this case of the particular forms referred to. He wished to state how the matter arose. He had occasion to send some telegrams to the Viceroy, and Sir Erskine Perry questioned his right to send any telegrams without passing through the Council. He raised the general question of principle—Could the Secretary of State send telegraphic messages to the Viceroy without passing them through the Council? He (the Duke of Argyll) would say at once that it never could be supposed that private letters were excluded under the clause in the Act of Parliament; and it was notorious that every Secretary of State communicated freely with the Viceroy and the Government of India through private letters. This led to considerable discussion in the Office. Memoranda were written by Sir Erskine Perry and Sir Henry Maine, and the result was, it was agreed that the Secretary of State might send telegrams to the Viceroy provided they were marked with the word “personal;” but it might be seen at once how easy it would be to abuse the power of sending communications to India without consulting the Council at home. He should be sorry to discuss this question fully till he saw the Memoranda. He would only say that if this arrangement with regard to telegrams in the place of private letters was to be used, not only for the purpose of overruling, but evading altogether, the opinion of the Council on such a matter as the reduction of the Indian duties, they might as well do away with the Council altogether. Nothing would be left of their power or authority, or even of their influence—especially in a matter very nearly affecting the feelings and interests of the people of India. Therefore, it was a serious question whether the noble Viscount the Secretary of State for India had or had not used this power to avoid a debate by his Council upon a matter which touched both the interests and feelings of the people of India.

Moved, that an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty for Copies of any minutes or memoranda by the Secretary of State for India, or by Members of Council, in 1873, on the subject of telegraphic communications with the Government of India.—(The Duke of Argyll.)

VISCOUNT CRANBROOK said, that the noble Duke, in discussing this subject, had taken upon himself to guess much and surmise much—and very inaccurately. He had informed the noble Duke that he might have seen the papers relating to telegrams, if he thought proper, before he addressed the House to-night. With respect to anything that he had done which was impugned, he was there perfectly prepared to defend it. He had not used the telegraph for the purpose of interfering with the rights of the Council, either here or in India. The Viceroy had a perfect right by law, in carrying out his views, to overrule his Council; and it was not necessary for him to make any application to the Secretary of State for India in Council on the subject—he had the power in his own hands. But when the Viceroy asked the Secretary of State, as a Member of the Government, whether, if he took a certain course of action, the Government would be prepared to support him, he (Viscount Cranbrook) was perfectly entitled to reply in the way which he did; but the Members of the Council would have the same opportunities as they had before of expressing their opinions with respect to the Indian Budget, when the despatch relating to that subject was prepared to be sent out in the usual course. Every Member of the Council might minute his views to the fullest extent; and the noble Duke had himself quoted some of the very strong language which had been used by some Members of the Council of the Governor General in recording their opinions. The system of dissent he approved of to the fullest extent, if it was exercised in a fair and decent manner; but some of their opinions had become pamphlets and rhetorical expositions, instead of that kind of argumentative protest which was suited to the subjects dealt with. It seemed to him a strange novelty that the Members of the Council should undertake to impute motives alike to their Chief and to the Government in England. He entered his protest against the style of language that had been adopted on this subject. The real question was, whether the Secretary of State should be in confidential communication with the Viceroy? That was an essential part of his position; it had been the practice hitherto. The position of the Secretary of State would simply be intolerable if he were not to have any confidential intercourse with the Viceroy. These Councils were not appointed by him—they were put there as a check; but with respect to matters for which he was answerable to Parliament, the Secretary of State was perfectly entitled to communicate confidentially, either by letter or telegram, with the Viceroy. He (Viscount Cranbrook) admitted the distinction between the Secretary of State and the Secretary of State in Council, and that telegrams from the Secretary of State in Council should be shown to the Council. With regard to the Papers moved for by the noble Duke, they should certainly be produced; and if any question was raised with respect to his conduct, he would be quite prepared to vindicate it. He had done nothing but what had been done by his Predecessors.

Viscount Cranbrook

LORD LAWRENCE said, that what the Indian Council naturally desired was to have an opportunity of submitting to the Secretary of State arguments against any particular policy which it might be intended to pursue, and of putting their opinions upon record. A Member of Council would hardly care to place on record his opinion on a matter which had been already decided upon. It would, indeed, be useless for him to do so, except for the sake of the private satisfaction of letting Parliament hereafter know what was his individual opinion. It seemed to him that the Council had had no opportunity of using their influence with regard to the policy which had been pursued in respect to the cotton duties; for the fact appeared that the Secretary of State had allowed them no opportunity of considering the question. What moral influence could the Council have, if the Secretary of State did not consult it in important matters? It was no exaggeration to say that it would be better to do away with the Council than to treat that body as it had been treated lately. They had thus become of little use, though they were men of great experience in India, and well fitted for the position they occupied in this country. During his experience he never knew the Council to be treated in anything like the way it had been during the last two or three years.

THE MARQUESS OF RIPON said, that having been himself at the India Office, he could confirm the statement of his noble Friend. He believed he was correct in stating that, although his noble Friend (Viscount Halifax) wrote numerous private letters to the Governor General and to other authorities in India, he never took any step of importance, nor sent out any important order, without having the fullest consultation with the Members of the Indian Council. In one of the rare cases in which his noble Friend differed from his Council—namely, in reference to the re-organization of the Indian Army—he went out of his way, so to speak, in order to secure for its Members the fullest discussion of that important question. On that occasion he overruled the Members of his Council; but he used always to give them the most ample opportunity of expressing their opinions. He did not know how much that practice had been deviated from in recent times; but, certainly, a deviation from it must reduce the Indian Council to a nullity.

Motion agreed to.

House adjourned at a quarter before Nine o'clock, to Friday next, half-past Ten o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Tuesday, 20th May, 1879.

MINUTES.]—SELECT COMMITTEE—Sugar Industries, nominated.

Special Report—Commons [No. 198].

PRIVATE BILL (by Order)—Considered as amended—Thames River (Prevention of Floods).

PUBLIC BILLS—Second Reading—Local Government (Ireland) Provisional Orders (Killarney, &c.) * [178]; Elementary Education Provisional Orders Confirmation (Brighton and Preston, &c.) * [177]; Elementary Education Provisional Order Confirmation (London) * [176]; Local Government Provisional Orders (Aspull, &c.) * [151].

Committee—Army Discipline and Regulation [88]—R.P.; Customs and Inland Revenue [150]—R.P.

Committee—Report—Consolidated Fund (No. 3) *.
Third Reading—Parliamentary Burghs (Scotland) * [97]; Dispensaries (Ireland) * [66]; Hares (Ireland) * [165], and passed.

The House met at Two of the clock.

PRIVATE BUSINESS.

THAMES RIVER (PREVENTION OF FLOODS) BILL (by Order.)

CONSIDERATION, AS AMENDED.

Order for Consideration, as amended, read.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
“That the Bill be now taken into Consideration.”

COLONEL BERESFORD, in moving, as an Amendment, that the Bill be considered upon this day five weeks, said, that his object in wishing to have the Bill postponed for that period was to secure that the measure should not be disposed of until the House had an opportunity of considering another Bill upon the same subject which was about to come before them. The Rivers Conservancy Bill, introduced by Her Majesty's Government, stood for second reading on the day to which he desired to have the consideration of the present Bill deferred. A further reason was that the House had not yet had an opportunity of considering the evidence taken before the Select Committee on the Thames River (Prevention of Floods) Bill. Indeed, it was not yet before the House, and would not, he believed, be in the hands of hon. Members before to-morrow. The object of the Bill was to deal with the incidence of taxation; and he wished to point out that, in all former cases, the whole of the riparian expenses had been paid out of the general rates, and not by the riparian owners. He was, therefore, at a loss to understand upon what grounds it was now proposed that some of the riparian owners of the City of London should be mulcted in the expense of carrying out the instructions given by the Metropolitan Board of Works. He had no desire to detain the House, especially as he believed that his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Carmarthen (Mr. B. Williams) would second the Motion, and would explain the grounds upon which the present application was made. He would simply move now that the consideration of the Bill be postponed for the period he had named.

MR. B. WILLIAMS said, he rose with great pleasure to second the proposition of his hon. and gallant Friend opposite (Colonel Beresford), that the consideration of the Bill should be deferred until that day five weeks. He ventured to submit that there were very strong reasons why the consideration of the Bill should be postponed in the way suggested. The chief reason which he thought it was necessary for him to put before the House was that there was already in the House a Bill entitled “The Rivers Conservancy Bill,” which had just come down from the House of Lords, and the second reading of which was fixed in this House for the 16th of June. Now, that Bill was based entirely on principles opposed to the principle of the Bill before the House, and he did not think it right, or conducive to the dignity of the House, that they should pass two Bills in the same Session, one of which was diametrically opposed to the principles of the other. Considering the peculiar circumstances of the case, perhaps the House would allow him, by one or two short observations, to explain the present position of legislation with regard to the subject. As hon. Members would be aware, the Bill now before the House was brought in with the object of preventing inundation by the River Thames within the Metropolitan area. That was an object which everyone would concur with; and the sole question for consideration was, what was the best way to carry it out? The Metropolitan Board of Works, in 1877, brought forward a Bill which was referred to a Select Committee of 11 Members, upon which his hon. Friend the Member for the Elgin Burghs (Mr. Grant Duff) sat as Chairman. After a long inquiry, that Committee reported in favour of imposing the charge for the construction of the necessary works upon the whole of the Metropolitan area. That was the result of a very careful investigation; but the hon. and gallant Baronet opposite—the Chairman of the Metropolitan Board of Works (Sir James M'Garel-Hogg)—and his Colleagues did not accept the decision of that Committee, and, accordingly, they withdrew the Bill in 1877, and introduced another Bill last year, and also introduced a Bill this year—the Bill which had just come down from the consideration of a Select Committee. Now, the two Bills which were introduced last year and this year were not based on the Report of the Committee of 1877, but were directly opposed to it. But a kind of compromise was suggested with reference to the incidence of taxation; and what the Committee suggested was this—that a portion of the expense should be borne by the Metropolitan area, and the other portion be borne by the District Boards. That compromise was founded on the idea that at the present moment the law imposed the liability upon the District Boards and the riparian owners to prevent inundation from rivers. He had no desire to weary the House by entering at length into the question. He only wished to make a few remarks, without raising any legal discussion on the point. He might, however, say this—that after carefully considering the matter, and with reference to the proper construction of the Metropolitan Management Act of 1855, following the authority of the well-known case of Hudson v. Tabor, which was decided by the Lord Chief Justice and his Colleagues, and affirmed upon an appeal, he freely asserted that there was no liability on the part of the riparian owners or the District Boards to prevent the inundation of rivers, as the law now stood. The Bill was based on the assumption that there was such a liability; and, after the investigation which had taken place, the House might be disposed to accept the decision of the Select Committee who had just reported, although it was not in accordance with the decision of the Select Committee of 1877. But if the House took that course, it would be in this difficulty. The Government were now promoting a Bill for the Conservancy of Rivers. It had been sent down to this House by the House of Lords, and it was proposed that it should be considered on the 16th of June. Now, what was the principle on which that measure was based? Was it based on the principle that the riparian owners and the District Boards were liable for the expense of the works necessary to prevent the inundation of rivers? No; it was based upon an entirely opposite principle, because it expressly provided, in a sub-section of Clause 11, that—

“No person shall, by virtue of this Act, be compelled to execute, at his own expense, any works which he would not have been compelled to execute if this Act had not been passed.”

That was entirely opposed to the principle involved in the Bill now before the House. The question now for the consideration of the House was, whether the House was going to commit itself to the principle of this private Bill before the principle involved in a public Bill had been thoroughly investigated and decided upon by the House? That was really the question. Was the Metropolitan Board of Works to have privileges given to it by this private Bill, which were denied by a public Act to every authority in England? What he ventured to suggest—and he made the suggestion not by way of defeating the passing of the Bill—was, that the House should not commit itself, until the proper time arrived, to any principle in regard to the prevention of the inundation of rivers; because, at the present moment, it had before it two separate and distinct Bills which were sought to be passed into law—which were based on two inconsistent principles. He asked the House not to fix now a principle in regard to the Bill now before them, until they had full and ample opportunity of considering the principle involved in the measure, which Her Majesty's Government proposed to pass in regard to the conservancy of rivers. Under all these circumstances, he ventured to urge with respect, but, still, with some earnestness, the suggestion he desired to make, that the consideration of the Bill should be postponed until after they had had a discussion upon the public Bill. He, therefore, begged to second the Motion moved by his hon. and gallant Friend the Member for Southwark (Colonel Beresford).

Mr. B. Williams

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon Tuesday the 24th of June next."—(Colonel Beresford.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'now' stand part of the Question."

SIR JAMES M'GAREL-HOGG did not think it was at all necessary to take up the time of the House in endeavouring to prove to them the necessity of the Bill which was now under their consideration. In fact, he might say that it was allowed, both by the Mover and the Seconder of the Amendment, to postpone the consideration of the Bill, that it was an important question, and one that ought to be speedily dealt with. The Mover of the Amendment, and the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Carmarthen (Mr. B. Williams), who had just sat down, tried to found an argument for delay on the fact that Her Majesty's Government had brought a Bill down from the House of Lords—a Rivers Conservancy Bill—which dealt with floods in the various rivers of England. He was bound to tell the hon. and learned Gentleman opposite (Mr. B. Williams) that he (Sir James M'Garel-Hogg) did not think the hon. and learned Gentleman could have read the present Bill, or, if he had read it, he could not quite have understood the various clauses of it; because he (Sir James M'Garel-Hogg) thought he was perfectly right in asserting that the Metropolis was expressly and absolutely excluded from its operation. Therefore, all the arguments of the hon. and learned Gentleman, and the hon. and gallant Member for Southwark (Colonel Beresford), which were founded on this assumption, at once fell to the ground. The hon. and learned Member for Carmarthen stated to the House that he did not wish to impede the progress of the Bill. But how could he hope to succeed in that object, when he proposed to postpone the consideration of the Bill for five weeks? The hon. and learned Gentleman must be perfectly aware that such a proposition must impede the progress of the Bill; because, if they postponed the consideration of it for five weeks, or until the Conservancy Bill could be considered, the Bill could not go through the House of Lords this Session, and all the time and money which had been expended upon it would be utterly lost. The argument, therefore, that the postponement of the Bill would not impede its further progress, entirely failed. And now, with regard to the facts of the case. The hon. and gallant Member for Southwark wished that the consideration of the Bill should be postponed. But he (Sir James M'Garel-Hogg) would tell the House that the constituents whom the hon. and gallant Member represented, and who had petitioned against the Bill, every day received a copy of the evidence given before the Committee. Every day the hon. and gallant Member received two copies of the evidence—one for himself and another for his friends, so that they might specially study it; and if the hon. and gallant Member and his constituents had not done so, it was their own fault. Independently of that, the day after the Committee closed their labours a full copy of the evidence, and the speeches of counsel, and everything relating to the Bill, was placed in the Library of the House by the special direction of the Chairman of the Committee, and the Librarian who had charge of them would enable any hon. Member to peruse them who thought fit to do so. Under all these circumstances, he certainly thought the hon. and gallant Member for Southwark, and the hon. and learned Member for Carmarthen, had failed to lay before the House any satisfactory reason why the progress of the Bill should be further delayed.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, he was anxious to say one or two words before the House came to a decision upon the Bill. He had been Chairman of the Select Committee, and thoroughly agreed with the decision of the Committee, although he never was called upon to vote. Indeed, no point ever got anywhere near the casting-vote of the Chairman. He trusted that the hon. and gallant Member for Southwark (Colonel Beresford) would not ask the House to divide upon the Bill. The hon. and gallant Member said he wished to have the consideration of the Bill postponed for five weeks. He had better have said at once for six months, because the postponement of it for five weeks would make it utterly impossible to carry it during the present Session. The ground on which the hon. and gallant Member for Southwark put the matter, and upon which he was supported by the hon. and learned Member for Carmarthen, was this—that a Bill was coming, or had come, that had not yet been considered in regard to the conservancy of rivers generally. Well, but the Committee appointed by the House of Commons were told to consider the question of the incidence of taxation for the River Thames; and he thought he might say something on behalf of the general position of Committees of the House of Commons—namely, that the decision of such Committees was not to be overruled when it had been delivered on a subject specially referred to them, because there happened to come down, after their decision, a Bill from the House of Lords, which was supposed to deal with the same question. The Bill, however, really did not deal with the question it was supposed to deal with. The Bill which had come down from the House of Lords related to the question of the conservancy of rivers generally; but, as the hon. and gallant Member for Truro (Sir James M'Garel-Hogg) had stated, the promoters of that measure—who were, he believed, Her Majesty's Government—were perfectly aware of the fact that the position of the River Thames was exceptional, and had, therefore, excepted the Thames from the operation of the Bill. The Select Committee upstairs found, when they came to consider the question, that the position of the Thames was very exceptional; and, after having gone carefully into all the questions brought under their notice, the Committee came to the conclusion that they ought to support the Bill. It was true, to some extent, that the present measure was not in accordance with the resolution of the previous Committee; but the Bill was presented before the Committee upstairs in a somewhat different manner. He did not accept the interpretation of his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Carmarthen, that this was a compromise—that the Metropolitan Board of Works was to pay part of the cost, and the owners the other part. If his hon. and learned Friend would read the Bill, he would find that the Metropolitan Board did not pay any part of the cost of constructing the necessary works. It was not requisite that he should detain the House by entering into the general merits of the question; but he believed it would be found that the expense of carrying out the works would be much less than was supposed. That was the conclusion at which the Committee arrived after hearing the evidence. It was estimated that £55,000 would cover the cost—£55,000 for the protection of the river from floods—and there was no serious challenge before the Committee of that estimate of the cost. The Committee also ascertained this fact—that at least three-fifths, and probably more, of the owners of property, both in regard to numbers and the length of frontage, had already executed all the works that were necessary. That, he thought, placed the matter upon a very different footing than it would occupy if all the works had now to be entered upon. The Select Committee thoroughly considered the case of the Petition presented from the constituents of the hon. and gallant Member for Southwark (Colonel Beresford); and, without giving any opinion whether the cost would ruin the Metropolis, they were of opinion that, at any rate, there were good grounds for supposing that it would not. They had clear evidence before them that a great mistake was made by the parties who were interested in opposing the Bill. Perhaps the House would allow him to give an illustration. There were wharfingers who strenuously opposed the previous Bill. They not only opposed by Petition, as his hon. and gallant Friend the Member for Southwark did, but they appeared by counsel, which he did not. They thought that the Bill was a very dangerous measure. Since then they had done all the works that were necessary themselves, and the expense of constructing them turned out to be £60; while the expense they had previously incurred in opposing the Bill amounted to £400. There was another opponent who was not at all convinced about the matter, and his counsel came before the Committee in hot haste, because he thought it might be necessary to make a change in connection with his works. But, on inquiring what the cost of the works would be, he found out that it would only amount to £8. In that way the real facts in regard to the expense and everything else came overpoweringly before the Committee. They found that it was necessary the Thames should be guarded against floods; and they found, further, that the owners were people who, generally speaking, gained their livelihood upon the Thames. It was not unreasonable, they thought, to ask Parliament to oblige their owners to prevent the property of other people from being injured by the overflowing of the Thames; and it was found that the expense of constructing the necessary works was very slight, and much cheaper than anybody expected — and cheaper, also, if done by the owners than by anybody else. That being so, it appeared to the Committee that the present Bill was the one they ought to support. He therefore trusted, if his hon. and gallant Friend the Member for Southwark put the House to the trouble of a Division, which he hoped his hon. and gallant Friend would not do, that the House would reject the Amendment. To postpone the consideration of the Bill, as now suggested, would be simply to defeat it altogether.

Sir James M'Garel-Hogg

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH expressed a hope that it would not be necessary to put the House to the trouble of a Division on the present occasion. The question had already, and only recently, been fully and carefully considered by a Select Committee upstairs; and the right hon. Gentleman who presided over the deliberations of the Committee told them that the conclusions arrived at were unanimous. An important element in the case was the fact that, in the case of the great majority of the owners, the works necessary to prevent floods had already been voluntarily carried out at their own expense. Not only was this the case, but it was found that the works could be executed at a comparatively trifling cost. The case, indeed, stood upon a very different footing from that which it would have occupied if they had had to deal de novo with the whole of the large area in question. He said this without the least prejudice. If the plan of the Bill had involved the construction of works involving the whole river frontage of the Metropolis, his own opinion would have been against the particular scheme proposed. But that was not the case; and the only question raised by his hon. and gallant Friend who moved the Amendment was, that before the Bill passed an opportunity should be afforded for considering the Government Bill which had come down from the House of Lords in regard to the Conservancy of Rivers. It was perfectly true that the Rivers Bill contained provisions for the prevention of floods; but the River Thames, which was already under the management of a body of Conservators, had been specially exempted from the operations of the Government Bill. He was far from saying that the Act for the Conservancy of the Thames did not require to be amended. On the contrary, he thought it did; but the case against his hon. and gallant Friend's Amendment was a strong one, because not only the Thames Conservancy Board and its functions were specially exempted from the operation of the present Bill, but there was no absolute power taken even in the general measure to override the acts of the Conservancy Boards, even in regard to other rivers where they were doing their work properly. Under the Conservancy Act, it might be, and probably was the case, that the frontagers and occupiers of property had charges placed on them which the Government measure did not impose. He did not think it would be right for every river in England to be placed under the same arrangements by the operation of a general measure. That was not already the case; and it did not at all follow from the fact that a general measure was considered necessary, that other conservancy bodies would be obliged to conform to the general provisions of that measure.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE said, he would also make an appeal to his hon. and gallant Friend the Member for Southwark (Colonel Beresford) not to divide the House. He did so, not on the same ground as the other speakers, but as one who agreed with his hon. Friend. He thought it would be better not to divide in opposition to the decision of the Select Committee. It was quite clear that it would be of no use to divide the House; and he hoped, therefore, that his hon. and gallant Friend would not do so. He had only one other remark to make. His right hon. Friend the Chairman of the Committee (Mr. W. E. Forster) had given a fair account of the matter, except in one single respect. In answer to the hon. and learned Member for Carmarthen (Mr. B. Williams), the right hon. Gentleman referred to the case of Hudson v. Tabor. He thought his right hon. Friend was wrong in saying that that case did not apply to the Metropolis. [Mr. W. E. Forster said, it was not certain that it did.] He would remark that that question was not really gone into by the Committee; and certainly, in the opinion of some of the Members of the Committee, the case of Hudson v. Tabor clearly bore upon the matter.

COLONEL BERESFORD said, that, in accordance with the general wish of the House, he would not press the Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Main Question put, and agreed to.

Bill, as amended, considered; to be read the third time.

QUESTIONS:

INDIA—VILLAGE "PANCHAYETS" OR COURTS OF ARBITRATION.

QUESTION.

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN (for Sir David Wedderburn) asked the Under Secretary of State for India, Whether the attention of the Secretary of State has been directed to the Memorial of the East India Association praying for inquiry—

"Whether the delay, vexation, uncertainty, and expense of litigation might not be materially reduced by restoring the ancient and customary institution of village Panchayets," or courts of arbitration; and, whether any practical measures have been adopted by the Government in reference to this Memorial?

MR. E. STANHOPE, in reply, said, that the question referred to by the hon. Member had been carefully considered; and a Bill on the subject prepared by the Government of Bombay, based on the suggestion of the Home Government, was now before the Supreme Council of India.

SELECT COMMITTEE ON PARLIAMENTARY REPORTING—THE REPORT.

QUESTION.

MR. CHAMBERLAIN asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether, before any steps are taken to carry out the recommendations of the Report of the Committee on Parliamentary Reporting, he will undertake that an opportunity shall be previously given to this House of expressing an opinion thereon?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER, in reply, said, that, as far as he knew, the Committee on Parliamentary Reporting had not yet laid their Report upon the Table—in fact, he believed they had not reported; and he could not, therefore, say what course might be taken with regard to their recommendations. He presumed, however, that any steps they might recommend would be such as would, of necessity, have to come before the House before anything could be done. But, as he had already indicated, he spoke entirely in the dark as to what their Report might be.

MR. CHAMBERLAIN gave Notice that he would ask a Question on the subject when the Report was prepared.

FLOGGING IN THE ARMY.—QUESTION.

MR. HOPWOOD asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether his attention has been drawn to a statement in the number of "Truth" of the 8th instant—"Three troopers of the 1st Dragoon Guards were flogged on their voyage out for gross insubordination ; ” and, if he is aware, or, if not, will inquire, whether such punishment was inflicted ; if so, on board what ship and under what circumstances, whether after trial by court martial, and what was the sentence ?

Mr. Slater-Booth

COLONEL STANLEY: Sir, I did not see the statement referred to ; but I have made inquiry, and have ascertained that three men of the 1st Dragoon Guards were tried by court martial on board the transport ship Spain. The sentence on the first two was that they should receive 25 lashes, and the sentence on the third was that he should receive 20 lashes. I believe these sentences were carried out.

ARMY — COURT OF INQUIRY AT NETLEY IN 1873.—QUESTION.

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether it is true that Colonel Cameron succeeded Colonel Hawley as President or Member of a Court or Board of Inquiry which assembled at Netley in 1873 to investigate certain irregularities ; and, if so, if he will explain how his name came to be omitted from the Return asked for by the House—

“Of the names of all officers who sat as President or as Members of any Court of Inquiry held to investigate the irregularities which led to the trial of Assistant Controller Godrich ; ” and, whether it is true that Colonel Cameron, having sat on the Court of Inquiry which investigated the irregularities above mentioned, was afterwards the President of the Court Martial held for the trial of the person who was thereby implicated ?

COLONEL STANLEY, in reply, said, he was informed that it was not the case that Colonel Cameron succeeded Colonel Hawley as president or member of the Court of Inquiry.

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON said, he would repeat his Question on Thursday, and at the same time would ask the Secretary of State for War if he would take steps to ascertain whether Colonel Cameron did or did not sit on any Court of Inquiry held to investigate the matters referred to. What he wanted to know was whether the officer referred to was or was not a member of such a Court of Inquiry ?

COLONEL STANLEY said, he was sorry if he had not made his former answer sufficiently clear. He was positively informed, and had no reason to doubt, that Colonel Cameron had not been a member of such a Court of Inquiry.

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON said, he would ask, on Thursday, why the Return in question was not in accordance with the terms that had been adopted in the Address moved to the Crown.

SOUTH AFRICA — THE ZULU WAR— TRANSPORT SERVICE IN NATAL.

QUESTIONS.

MR. W. H. JAMES asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether it is true that the transport service in Natal is paying for the hire of waggons at the rate of £80 each per month, besides engaging to pay drivers' wages and to make good any injury done either to the waggons or the bullocks ; whether equally exorbitant prices are being paid for the requisites needed by the troops engaged in military operations in Zululand ; and, whether, having regard to the great expenditure of English money involved in these transactions, it is not desirable that the Commander in Chief should be instructed to “requisition” the articles he needs, and to pay for them at a fair valuation ?

COLONEL STANLEY: Sir, I have reason to believe that the hire of waggons has, in certain cases, reached the amount stated in the first Question of the hon. Member ; but it includes the wages of the drivers, who only draw commissariat. I should add that the waggons convey from two to three tons, and are drawn by from 14 to 16 oxen. With regard to the second Question, it is not the case that equally exorbitant prices are being paid for the requisites needed by the troops engaged in military operations in Zululand. The Departments made such shipments as they thought necessary to give us command of the market, and the prices of the main articles of supply are now very moderate in Natal, so much so that in some cases we are reducing the shipments. With regard to the third Question, the War Department in February last drew the attention of the Colonial Government to the exorbitant charges on account of transport, and requested that measures should be adopted, by requisition, or otherwise, of obtaining the necessary transport on paying reasonable rates. Instructions have been sent, and recently repeated, to Sir Henry Bulwer, that such steps should be taken as might be deemed necessary in order to secure proper provision for transport. It has not been found necessary to resort to requisition for other supplies.

MR. W. H. JAMES asked, if it would be convenient to produce the Papers in connection with the whole Transport Service in Natal?

COLONEL STANLEY said, the House was already in possession of the substance of the Papers. He did not know that it would be convenient to produce all the Departmental Correspondence; but he would look through it to see if there was anything of public interest.

PARLIAMENT — BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE—DEBATE ON THE INDIAN BUDGET.—QUESTION.

MR. W. E. FORSTER: Will the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer state, for the convenience of the House, whether, in case the debate on Indian Finance is not concluded on Thursday, it is the intention of the Government to postpone the discussion until Monday, or to resume it on Friday?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Sir, it would, of course, be more convenient to the House generally that if the debate is not concluded on Thursday, it should be resumed on Friday. The only question is as to the position of those hon. Gentlemen who have Notices upon the Paper for the latter day. The first of those Notices is one by the hon. Member for Roscommon (the O'Connor Don) with regard to Elementary Education in Ireland; and I have been informed by that hon. Gentleman that if there should be a general wish on the part of the House to proceed with the discussion on Indian Finance on Friday, and if those Members who have Notices below him will consent to take a similar course, he will be prepared to waive his right. The next is a Motion by the hon. Member for Hackney (Mr. Holms). I do not know what that hon. Gentleman's view may be; but, as he is present, he will probably tell us. The third Motion is in the name of the hon. Member for Stoke-on-Trent (Dr. Kenealy). That hon. Gentleman is not present; but I presume that if the others give way he will do so also.

Colonel Stanley

THE O'CONOR DON said, he would certainly not stand in the way of the wishes of the House; but if he gave up the first place on Friday, he might possibly ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer for a few hours of Government time on some other day, and he hoped his request might be favourably considered.

MR. J. HOLMS also consented to give way; but stipulated that the Government should help to keep a House for him if he succeeded in getting another night.

MR. A. H. BROWN asked, if there would, under the altered circumstances, be a Morning Sitting on Friday?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, there would not.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

ARMY DISCIPLINE AND REGULATION
BILL.—[BILL 88.]

(Mr. Secretary Stanley, Mr. Secretary Cross, Mr. William Henry Smith, The Judge Advocate General.)

COMMITTEE. [Progress 16th May.]

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Redress of Wrongs.

Clause 42 (Mode of complaint by officer).

Amendment proposed, in page 18, line 2, to leave out from the word "thereon" to the end of the Clause.—(Major Nolan.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Clause."

MAJOR NOLAN said, at the last sitting of the Committee this Amendment was moderately discussed; but its consideration had not terminated when Progress was reported. Hon. Members would see that the clause was divided into two sections. The first was a paraphrase of the 12th Article of War. It gave the officer who thought himself wronged by his commanding officer the right of appeal to the Commander-in-Chief, and to that he made no objection whatever. But the second part of the clause, which punished an officer who knowingly made any false statement affecting the character of any officer or soldier, was entirely new, and so was the sub-section in the next clause which punished any soldier for the same offence, except that the provision was complicated by further and still worse provisions. In every dispute between an officer and his commander there would certainly be something which would come under this head. To say anything about the temper of the commander, or his knowledge of his duties, or anything of that kind, would certainly be to make charges "affecting his character." What, he fancied, would happen under such circumstances, as the dispute would generally resolve itself into a contention regarding matters of fact, would be that the central authority would say—"The complainant stated one thing, and the commander another directly opposite to it. This must be on one side or the other a matter of wilful misstatement. As one side or the other must be making a false statement, we will decide who it is by trying the junior officer." If that were done, the officer would be placed in a very unpleasant position, and the effect would be very perceptibly to keep down complaints, for an officer would not at all care to be transformed from a complainant to a prisoner under arrest. Nine-tenths of the men would not like to be thus tried by court martial, and would prefer to put up with the injustice. He did not think this sub-section was wanted, for there were plenty of other clauses in the Bill under which an officer could be tried if he made a false statement; and he especially thought it was undesirable to insert these words in that particular position, just following the words which gave an officer power to complain.

COLONEL STANLEY could not see anything objectionable in guarding this power of complaint, which might otherwise be very considerably abused, by this Proviso. It did not punish an officer for making a statement not strictly accurate; but punished the officer who wilfully made a false statement, or knowingly or wilfully suppressed any material fact. Whether he had done so or not would be a matter for the court martial to determine; and he felt certain that no court martial sworn to do justice would lightly find an officer guilty of this serious charge. Certainly, if there were any bias in the minds of the court martial, it would be to lean in favour of the officer, where there was any doubt at all in the case. He could not assent to the doctrine laid down, by implication, by the hon. and gallant Gentleman (Major Nolan), that an officer was to be held blameless if he knowingly made any false statement, or wilfully suppressed any material facts.

MR. RYLANDS thought the right hon. and gallant Gentleman (Colonel Stanley) had missed the force of the objection to this clause. It was not for a moment maintained that an officer who made a false charge in this way was not to be punished; but there were one or two clauses in the Bill which, at present, were wide enough to punish this offence. What his hon. and gallant Friend (Major Nolan) objected to was not the punishment, but the placing of this punishment in juxtaposition to the clause giving the power of appeal. It seemed to say to the officer—"If you complain, and if in consequence of that complaint there is a court martial, then, if you have made any false statement in regard to your commanding officer, you shall be put on your trial for that also." The presence of those words would have a very deterrent effect on all complaints. They all knew from their own experience that two parties describing the same transaction would give very different accounts of it. Thus, it might very well happen that an officer, without any intention to deceive, might wilfully state that which afterwards turned out to be a falsehood. He also resisted the insertion of these words in the present place, because he was still more strongly opposed to their appearance in the next clause which dealt with the case of the soldier. It was most important that that sub-section should be resisted, and that a threat should not be held over a soldier in this way, preventing him from taking such steps as he might think right for the promotion of what he believed to be his interests. They ought certainly, if that clause was to be rejected, to put the officer and the soldier on the same basis.

COLONEL STANLEY said, the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Rylands) seemed to have abandoned the position taken up by the hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for Galway (Major Nolan). He did not himself think that the general words in other clauses, and notably in Clause 27, were sufficiently explicit to necessary transport on paying reasonable rates. Instructions have been sent, and recently repeated, to Sir Henry Bulwer, that such steps should be taken as might be deemed necessary in order to secure proper provision for transport. It has not been found necessary to resort to requisition for other supplies.

MR. W. H. JAMES asked, if it would be convenient to produce the Papers in connection with the whole Transport Service in Natal?

COLONEL STANLEY said, the House was already in possession of the substance of the Papers. He did not know that it would be convenient to produce all the Departmental Correspondence; but he would look through it to see if there was anything of public interest.

PARLIAMENT — BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE—DEBATE ON THE INDIAN BUDGET.—QUESTION.

MR. W. E. FORSTER: Will the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer state, for the convenience of the House, whether, in case the debate on Indian Finance is not concluded on Thursday, it is the intention of the Government to postpone the discussion until Monday, or to resume it on Friday?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Sir, it would, of course, be more convenient to the House generally that if the debate is not concluded on Thursday, it should be resumed on Friday. The only question is as to the position of those hon. Gentlemen who have Notices upon the Paper for the latter day. The first of those Notices is one by the hon. Member for Roscommon (the O'Connor Don) with regard to Elementary Education in Ireland; and I have been informed by that hon. Gentleman that if there should be a general wish on the part of the House to proceed with the discussion on Indian Finance on Friday, and if those Members who have Notices below him will consent to take a similar course, he will be prepared to waive his right. The next is a Motion by the hon. Member for Hackney (Mr. Holms). I do not know what that hon. Gentleman's view may be; but, as he is present, he will probably tell us. The third Motion is in the name of the hon. Member for Stoke-on-Trent (Dr. Kenealy). That hon. Gentleman is not present; but I presume that if the others give way he will do so also.

Colonel Stanley

THE O'CONOR DON said, he would certainly not stand in the way of the wishes of the House; but if he gave up the first place on Friday, he might possibly ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer for a few hours of Government time on some other day, and he hoped his request might be favourably considered.

MR. J. HOLMS also consented to give way; but stipulated that the Government should help to keep a House for him if he succeeded in getting another night.

MR. A. H. BROWN asked, if there would, under the altered circumstances, be a Morning Sitting on Friday?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, there would not.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

ARMY DISCIPLINE AND REGULATION BILL—[BILL 88.]

(Mr. Secretary Stanley, Mr. Secretary Cross, Mr. William Henry Smith, The Judge Advocate General.)

COMMITTEE. [Progress 16th May.]

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Redress of Wrongs.

Clause 42 (Mode of complaint by officer).

Amendment proposed, in page 18, line 2, to leave out from the word "thereon" to the end of the Clause.—(Major Nolan.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Clause."

MAJOR NOLAN said, at the last sitting of the Committee this Amendment was moderately discussed; but its consideration had not terminated when Progress was reported. Hon. Members would see that the clause was divided into two sections. The first was a paraphrase of the 12th Article of War. It gave the officer who thought himself wronged by his commanding officer the right of appeal to the Commander-in-Chief, and to that he made no objection whatever. But the second part of the clause, which punished an officer who knowingly made any false statement affecting the character of any officer or soldier, was entirely new, and so was the sub-section in the next clause which punished any soldier for the same offence, except that the provision was complicated by further and still worse provisions. In every dispute between an officer and his commander there would certainly be something which would come under this head. To say anything about the temper of the commander, or his knowledge of his duties, or anything of that kind, would certainly be to make charges "affecting his character." What, he fancied, would happen under such circumstances, as the dispute would generally resolve itself into a contention regarding matters of fact, would be that the central authority would say—"The complainant stated one thing, and the commander another directly opposite to it. This must be on one side or the other a matter of wilful misstatement. As one side or the other must be making a false statement, we will decide who it is by trying the junior officer." If that were done, the officer would be placed in a very unpleasant position, and the effect would be very perceptibly to keep down complaints, for an officer would not at all care to be transformed from a complainant to a prisoner under arrest. Nine-tenths of the men would not like to be thus tried by court martial, and would prefer to put up with the injustice. He did not think this sub-section was wanted, for there were plenty of other clauses in the Bill under which an officer could be tried if he made a false statement; and he especially thought it was undesirable to insert these words in that particular position, just following the words which gave an officer power to complain.

COLONEL STANLEY could not see anything objectionable in guarding this power of complaint, which might otherwise be very considerably abused, by this Proviso. It did not punish an officer for making a statement not strictly accurate; but punished the officer who wilfully made a false statement, or knowingly or wilfully suppressed any material fact. Whether he had done so or not would be a matter for the court martial to determine; and he felt certain that no court martial sworn to do justice would lightly find an officer guilty of this serious charge. Certainly, if there were any bias in the minds of the court martial, it would be to lean in favour of the officer, where there was any doubt at all in the case. He could not assent to the doctrine laid down, by implication, by the hon. and gallant Gentleman (Major Nolan), that an officer was to be held blameless if he knowingly made any false statement, or wilfully suppressed any material facts.

MR. RYLANDS thought the right hon. and gallant Gentleman (Colonel Stanley) had missed the force of the objection to this clause. It was not for a moment maintained that an officer who made a false charge in this way was not to be punished; but there were one or two clauses in the Bill which, at present, were wide enough to punish this offence. What his hon. and gallant Friend (Major Nolan) objected to was not the punishment, but the placing of this punishment in juxtaposition to the clause giving the power of appeal. It seemed to say to the officer—"If you complain, and if in consequence of that complaint there is a court martial, then, if you have made any false statement in regard to your commanding officer, you shall be put on your trial for that also." The presence of those words would have a very deterrent effect on all complaints. They all knew from their own experience that two parties describing the same transaction would give very different accounts of it. Thus, it might very well happen that an officer, without any intention to deceive, might wilfully state that which afterwards turned out to be a falsehood. He also resisted the insertion of these words in the present place, because he was still more strongly opposed to their appearance in the next clause which dealt with the case of the soldier. It was most important that that sub-section should be resisted, and that a threat should not be held over a soldier in this way, preventing him from taking such steps as he might think right for the promotion of what he believed to be his interests. They ought certainly, if that clause was to be rejected, to put the officer and the soldier on the same basis.

COLONEL STANLEY said, the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Rylands) seemed to have abandoned the position taken up by the hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for Galway (Major Nolan). He did not himself think that the general words in other clauses, and notably in Clause 27, were sufficiently explicit to cover this clause; and, therefore, he did not think there was anything unreasonable in his desire that these words should remain.

MR. HOPWOOD very much regretted the decision of the right hon. and gallant Gentleman, for he thought the position taken up by the Mover of the Amendment was a most reasonable one. They pretended by this clause to give the officer the power of appeal; but, at the same time, they accompanied that power by words which seemed to say—"We repent giving you this power of appeal, and, therefore, we will hold over you in terrorem the chance of this charge being made against you if you should resort to that power of appeal, which we affect to ask you to thank us for having granted to you." The mere fact that the one part of the clause was put in juxtaposition to the other was a matter of very serious signification. It was a warning held out to any officer not to appeal if he felt he was suffering from any serious wrong. They were all, of course, agreed that if an officer knowingly made any false statement he should be punished. That was not the question. The point he and his hon. Friends wished to urge was, that the placing of these words in their present position would raise a dread in the mind of a man having a fair right and ground of appeal that he might have some charge made against him. That might easily happen, resulting in the interchange of position between accused and accuser. Take, for instance, a case in which the whole question at issue might turn on the truth of one of two persons. The inferior officer might have very good ground of complaint; but he might have no evidence, except his own statement, and he would have against him the superior rank of his opponent, any services he might have rendered, a hundred things of that kind, which would weigh down, in a matter of this kind, even the truth. There would certainly be temper evolved in a matter of this kind; the charge might even be something in some degree disgraceful to the commander, and then, although there was good ground of appeal, the commander would be able to become the assailant, and to say—"You have knowingly made a false charge against me." The whole question would depend upon the sole word of the commander; and, again, his rank, his services, his position, and a hundred other things, might prevail to secure the conviction. He did venture to say that in any Civil Court of Appeal there was no such provision as that punishment should follow the making of the appeal. If there was false swearing, let it be punished as false swearing, and let the matter be tried independently of whether any appeal had been made or not. There was already power to punish false swearing, which included the wilful suppression of any material fact. He really thought that they had a right to complain of the way in which these words were inserted in the clause, offensively staring in the face of every one who wished to appeal.

MR. FORSYTH asked if hon. Members were contending that an officer or soldier who made a false statement was not to be punished? Surely, there was nothing more worthy of punishment than the offence of an officer or soldier who knowingly made a false statement accusing another. If made on oath, he would be liable to an indictment for perjury; but if not made on oath, still the false statement was a grave offence, and there certainly was nothing which was more deserving of punishment.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, if there was any alteration made in the law which the Committee considered to be in favour of the soldier, it was the change made in this clause. Under the old practice, the soldier was sometimes punished for making statements which, though he himself believed them to be bond fide, yet broke down for want of evidence. It was that state of things which the Committee desired to obviate. The 13th Article of War, after allowing complaints to be made, enacted that if on appeal they should be pronounced groundless and vexatious, the soldier should be sentenced to such punishment as the court might direct. The words in the present clause were much more favourable to the soldier. Before, if a complaint were not proved, it was groundless, and from that it was a very short step to declare it also vexatious, and to punish it. But now the complaint was required to be one which the officer or soldier knew to be false, and which affected the character of some other officer or soldier. It was impossible to make a provision more entirely in favour of the officer. Their object was to give the officer or soldier the widest latitude, and yet to take care that these complaints should not be made for libellous or improper purposes. The great object of this clause was to remove the impression which might have existed in the minds of the soldiers that if they appealed they were likely to be punished, and the words had been chosen with the greatest care with that object.

Colonel Stanley

SIR WILLIAM CUNINGHAME could not help thinking it would be as well to make this offence punishable under a clause by itself. Why could not they have a fresh clause, with another number, making it an offence to make any false statement affecting the character of any officer or soldier. There would be a slight advantage in separating a penal clause from a clause giving the power of appeal, and he hoped the right hon. and gallant Gentleman would consent to make the alteration.

SIR HENRY HAVELOCK marvelled that his hon. and gallant Friend (Major Nolan) should not have seen that this clause was expressly framed by the Committee, at the greatest pains and trouble, for the express purpose of providing that there should be no restriction whatever on the right of appeal, except it was shown that the appellant had wilfully and knowingly made a false statement, or suppressed important facts. What was the effect of the proposal as compared with the present state of the law? A soldier conceived himself aggrieved, and might make a statement which was perfectly bond fide, and which he yet failed in entirely proving. On that, and in connection with it, the court martial had the power to declare, upon the evidence given to establish the appeal, that it was vexatious and groundless, and thereupon to sentence the appellant to two years' imprisonment. Now the law was so altered that the soldier might make any statement, and bring any charge he liked, so long as he did not bring himself within the provisions of this sub-section. There could not be any comparison between the one law and the other. He must say, however, that he did not think any advantage was gained by doing away with the intermediate Court of Appeal. Formerly, there was first an appeal to a regimental Court of Inquiry, and that very often, by doing substantial justice between the two parties, prevented the appeal from going any further. If the hon. and gallant Gentleman would alter his Amendment so as to leave out the last words of the clause, which he could not at all see the use of, and return to the old form of procedure, he should be very glad to support him.

MAJOR NOLAN replied, that that Amendment properly belonged to Clause 43, and he should be happy to accept it, when they came to that. With reference to the suggestion of his hon. Friend (Sir William Cuninghame), that this punishment should be put in a clause by itself further on, he wanted to point out that this matter had been amply dealt with in Clause 27. It declared that—

"Every person subject to military law who . . . being an officer or soldier makes a false accusation against any other officer or soldier, knowing such accusation to be false," &c.

That seemed to him to cover every possible case, and it did not connect the right of complaint with the punishment, as was at present done by this clause. Anyone who committed this offence could also be tried under Clause 25, which provided that any officer who made any false statement, or made any fraudulent omission in any official document, should be subject to punishment. He believed it had also been the custom, where any officer brought a false charge against any other officer, to try him, under Clause 16, for character unbecoming the conduct of an officer and a gentleman. Again, he might be tried, under Clause 40, for conduct contrary to good order and discipline, though he admitted that these two last clauses did not deal so specifically with the offence as the first he mentioned. But Clause 27 did give the fullest power of punishment that it was possible for anyone to want; and he could only suppose that this sub-section was put in as a sort of sub-section to frighten officers from making complaints, which it would be certain to do very effectually. He should also wish to restore the old Court of Inquiry; for, under the old law, a soldier could not be punished for the first appeal, whereas now he could be so punished.

SIR HENRY JAMES thought that Clause 25 would not cover this offence, for the words there were—

"In any report, return, muster roll, pay list, certificate, book, route, or other document made or signed by him, or of the contents of which it is his duty to ascertain the accuracy—(a.) knowingly makes or is privy to the making of any false or fraudulent statement; or (b.) knowingly makes or is privy to the making of any omission with intent to defraud;"

while the words in the remaining subsection, "furnishing any false declaration," were clearly ejusdem generis. Clause 27 only covered the case of a false accusation, and did not deal with the case of a false statement, which was not an accusation; while, in Clause 42, the case of the wilful suppression of any material fact was provided for, which was not met by Clause 27.

MR. HOPWOOD would like to know the construction his hon. and learned Friend put upon the words "or knowingly and wilfully suppresses any material facts." There were no guarding words following, as in the previous case, "affecting the character of any officer or soldier." Any man might have his own opinion, and it must, after all, be always matter of opinion what were "material facts;" so that a man who did not mention a fact which he considered immaterial might be tried if that fact was considered by a higher authority to be material. It was a fair specimen of the way in which military offences were created in an Act like this.

SIR HENRY JAMES replied, that his hon. and learned Friend would know the legal maxim, that suppressio veri might be the same thing as suggestio falsi. If this suppression did not amount to that, it would be no offence.

MR. HOPWOOD said, that it amounted to this—that in making a false statement would be included knowingly omitting anything which ought to have been stated. Without making a legal struggle about the matter, he would crave, in aid, therefore, the legal maxim which his hon. and learned Friend had quoted.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT thought a fair instance would be, if a soldier said he saw the sergeant knock another soldier down, and suppressed the fact that he was at the time setting the barracks on fire. That was what he should call the suppression of a material fact, because, under those circumstances, the sergeant would be perfectly justified against using force, which otherwise would be wrong.

Sir Henry James

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON had no doubt that the Committee had been struck by the remark of the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Oxford (Sir William Harcourt) that the Select Committee carefully considered the wording of this paragraph. Under the circumstances, hon. Members would, no doubt, be surprised to hear that neither this paragraph, nor anything at all like it, was ever before the Committee. If hon. Members would turn to page 147 of the Report, they would see that Clause 44 contained only the first paragraph, and that no reference was made to the second paragraph now before the Committee.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT begged to explain. What he said was that the Committee recommended the introduction of some such words.

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON was quite prepared for that explanation, and if hon. Members would turn to page 6 of the Report, they would be able to see what was the recommendation of the Committee. The words were—

"Care should be taken that complaints should not be visited with punishment under the general clause against conduct in breach of good order and military discipline."

That was the thing against which the Committee recommended that provision should be made. Perhaps the right hon. and gallant Gentleman (Colonel Stanley) would consent to a change in the clause which would make a material difference, and, instead of the words "knowingly makes any false statement," would substitute the words "makes any statement knowing the same to be false." There was an important difference between these two forms of words, although it might not appear so. Complaints to Commanders-in-Chief were always the result of a long course of injustice, often springing from no overt act. An officer might be generally tyrannical; or he might take an objection to some one of his subordinates for some trifling thing, such as not taking his hat off to his wife, and this conduct might have gone on until the officer had to appeal for justice. It then became very difficult to say what was the truth, and what was not. An officer might knowingly make a false statement, believing it to be true; but if it was proved to be incorrect, then, under this clause, he might be tried for making the statement. The alteration he suggested would meet the case, although, at the same time, he would far rather see the whole clause struck out.

MR. PARNELL thought it would be very important if they could induce the Government to separate the threat of punishment from the clause giving the power of appeal. At present, it looked very much as if the Government were giving with one hand what they took away with the other. The evidence before the Select Committee went in the direction of showing how very necessary it was to guard this right of making complaints from punishment. The Committee had evidence to show that soldiers were undergoing imprisonment of 363 days, simply for making a complaint; and the recommendation of the Committee was not that care should be taken that a soldier should be punished for making a false statement, but it was, on the contrary, that care should be taken that a soldier should not be punished merely for making a complaint. This second clause had been introduced by the Government since the Bill was before the Select Committee, and never was before them at all. In fact, any part of their Report which dealt with the matter went directly against the introduction of the clause, for their intention was to guard the soldier against the fear of punishment in making appeals. It was absurd to say that an officer or soldier could not be punished under other clauses for making false statements, for there were many other clauses which provided for this offence. For instance, there was Clause 40, which provided that—

“Every person subject to military law who commits any of the following offences, that is to say, is guilty of any act, conduct, disorder, or neglect, to the prejudice of good order and military discipline, though not in this Act otherwise specified.”

Certainly, an officer making a false statement affecting the character of any other officer or soldier could be tried under that clause if no other provision were made for the punishment of the offence. Besides, by inserting these words in the next clause, they did that which was very dangerous—they made it all important that the officers composing the court martial—though he believed they might have every desire to be fair—should believe the word of the officer against that of the soldier. This provision was a most dangerous one; it was never contemplated by the Select Committee; it was the scheme of the War Office, inserted since the Bill was discussed by the Select Committee, and he hoped the words would not be inserted now.

MR. MEREWETHER thought that they were wasting time in discussing this matter. The hon. Member opposite (Mr. Parnell) did not give them very much of his assistance on the Committee, and it was hardly fair to say that this matter was not before them. It was precisely dealt with as explained by the hon. and learned Member for Oxford (Sir William Harcourt). The question was discussed at great length, not with evidence, but with the assistance of all the military Members of the Committee. They heard the hon. and gallant General opposite (Sir Alexander Gordon), especially, a good many times on the subject; and it was finally agreed that the stringency of the words ought to be reduced, so that the soldier should no longer be able to think he was convicted for making a complaint when, really, he was convicted for making a false statement. The danger to be guarded against was that in making a statement the officer or soldier might take the opportunity of making false statements about other persons. After much discussion that conclusion was accepted, and, as he believed, the draftsman followed the very words suggested by the Chairman. Therefore, it was hardly fair, after several hours had been spent on this discussion, to say that these words were entirely new, and that they were put into the Bill by the War Office, when, in fact, they were put in as the result of the deliberations of the Committee.

MAJOR NOLAN pointed out that hon. Members generally could not be expected to know of that private discussion. They could only judge of what took place by what appeared in the Report of the Committee, and the evidence attached.

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON was very sorry to trouble the Committee again; but he could not allow the erroneous views of the hon. and learned Member for Northampton (Mr. Merewether) to go unchallenged. Before the Select Committee, it was pointed out by Sir Henry Thring that the right of the soldier to appeal under Article 13 was different to the right of the officer under Article 12. The soldier only had the right of appeal to the Commander-in-Chief in matters affecting his pay and clothing; while the officer had the right of appeal upon every subject under heaven. They were urged to put the soldier upon the same footing as the officer; and if hon. Members would look at the Report, they would see that was so. The Report said—"Oh, oh!"—If hon. Members did not like to pay attention, they had better go out into the Lobby. The Report said, page 6—

"The matters dealt with by the 12th and 13th Articles of War under the head of 'Redress of Wrongs' appear to your Committee to require amendment. The 13th Article of War, which applies to non-commissioned officers and soldiers, is restricted to matters affecting their pay and clothing. Your Committee are of opinion that the opportunity to make complaints for the redress of wrongs should be afforded in as full a manner to non-commissioned officers and soldiers as to officers, and that whilst the act of preferring wilfully false charges should be constituted a specific, care should be taken that complaints should not be visited with punishment under the general clause against conduct in breach of good order and military discipline."

That showed the Committee merely wished the soldier to have as free liberty for making complaints as the officer had; but the Committee never thought of putting in the rider they were now considering, and it was the addition of some person after the Bill left the Committee.

MAJOR O'BEIRNE simply rose to corroborate this statement, and to contradict the assertion that this matter received careful consideration. They only took the evidence of the Judge Advocate General, which was to the effect that he had only found one case in which wrong was done, and he examined 800 courts martial in a year.

SIR HENRY HAVELOCK doubted if the hon. Member for Meath (Mr. Parnell) quite saw the effect of what he proposed? His objection to the introduction of this sub-section was that many other clauses would punish this offence, and they were referred to the 40th clause; but they heard a great deal about that clause when it was under discussion, and the objection to it was that it was so exceedingly vague in its nature that any offence might be tried under it. The result would be that, instead of trying the officer for making a false statement, knowing it to be false, as provided by this clause, they would, if these words were omitted, try the officer for making the false statement, without requiring the allegation that it was wilfully false. In fact, the charge could be as loose and vague as possible. Surely it would be better for the officer to be tried under this clause than under Clause 40, which put him at much greater disadvantage. It had been objected, again, that under this clause the court martial would unite two conflicting functions, and would settle at once the appeal and the punishment. That was the very thing the Committee desired to avoid. The case, cited to them by Mr. O'Dowd, of a soldier who, because he misconceived the functions of the court martial before which he was tried, and appealed, was sentenced for making a groundless and vexatious appeal, did seem very startling, and the Committee desired to avoid such a thing for the future. Yet some hon. Gentlemen were apparently so enamoured of the old law that they desired to retain it, although the Committee recommended the change.

MR. A. H. BROWN begged to call the attention of the right hon. and gallant Gentleman to an omission in the wording of the clause, which certainly required rectification. Under the clause, there were two offences provided for. The first was "knowingly making any false statement;" and then followed the governing words, "affecting the character of any officer or soldier." Then came the second offence—"or knowingly and wilfully suppresses any material facts." After those words, there surely ought to be inserted the same words as followed the enunciation of the first offence—"affecting the character of any officer or soldier," because, otherwise, the offence would not be limited, as the governing words at present only limited the first offence.

GENERAL SIR GEORGE BALFOUR was sorry that the hon. and learned Member for Northampton (Mr. Meredith) had commented on the absence from the meetings of the Select Committee of the hon. Member for Meath (Mr. Parnell), because he remembered at the time that hon. Member was appointed that he urged he was already upon another important Committee, and could devote very little time and attention to this one. He was himself very anxious to see a full and thorough inquiry into the condition of their military law; but he was bound to say that, in his opinion, the Select Committee by no means carried out the clear intention of the House in appointing it. He fully admitted the great ability displayed by the hon. and learned Member for Oxford (Sir William Harcourt), as Chairman of that Committee; but the very Report showed that they were hurried for time, and did not make the inquiry so full as it should have been. It was much to be regretted, also, that no changes were made in the Bill. It was no use bringing forward Amendments, for they were all rejected; and he was not quite sure that the discussion had not degenerated into a Party fight, which was much to be regretted for the sake of the Army. The Bill was by no means a good one, and it required great improvement. ["Oh, oh!"] Hon. Members might grumble; but he should speak frankly, and he did say that he viewed with dissatisfaction and alarm the state of the Army. He did not blame the present Government alone for that; others must take their share of it. The two things which were essential in an Army were—first, that all officers and men should be convinced of the necessity for obedience; and, next, that they should all feel that their grievances would be listened to. He had never known any harm come of listening to the complaints of officers or soldiers, and, so far from preventing them, it would be a wise and prudent thing if a Court of Inquiry were ordered to meet once a month in every regiment to receive complaints. [Laughter.] Hon. Members might laugh; and, perhaps, at first they might have a great many complaints; but they would soon disappear, and then the officers and men would certainly be a great deal more contented. Had there not been cases in which officers had been told that their complaints were unfounded, and yet they had maintained their complaints in the face of the highest authorities? The House of Commons had almost unanimously resolved that the complaints of those officers were well founded. Yet, for five years, they had been trying to make themselves heard, while the authorities had been trying to put them down. If the authorities had had the power, would not some of those officers have been sent before a court martial, and was not one of them actually put upon half-pay? He was, of course, quite willing to punish the making of false statements; but that might be done by adding a few words to Clause 27, and then the Government would have got all they could possibly want.

Sir Alexander Gordon

Mr. PARNELL said, the hon. and gallant Gentleman (Sir Henry Have-lock) thought him very illogical for wanting this Proviso omitted; but he wished to point out to him that if that were done, the officer or soldier was not any more liable to the punishment. The intention of the Committee was to prevent the soldier from suffering any consequences from making a complaint, unless he knew it to be false; and it was perfectly useless to quote them in support of the additions which were never before them, and had been tacked on since. He did hope that the right hon. and gallant Gentleman would re-consider his decision.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT, as they were fighting about a thing of no importance, would venture to suggest that the views of the hon. and gallant Gentleman could be met consistently with the objects of the Bill. The second paragraphs of Clauses 42 and 43 might be omitted, subject to making provision a of Clause 27 apply, by the addition of a few words. If hon. Gentlemen really wished to have the clauses separated, he did not see why it should not be done, and he thought his suggestion would obviate their objections.

COLONEL COLTHURST said, if the words—

"Knowingly makes any false statement affecting the character of any officer or soldier, or knowingly or wilfully suppresses any material facts," were inserted in the first paragraph of Clause 27, after the words "knowing such accusation to be false," all that was desired would be obtained, because, of course, everybody wished false statements or wilful omissions of material facts to be punished.

COLONEL STANLEY thought anything coming from his hon. and learned Friend (Sir William Harcourt) was worthy of his attention, especially as he was Chairman of the Committee, and he would accept the suggestion, although he could not, technically, do at that moment what was advised. The matter could, however, be considered between that time and the Report, and be dealt with on the Report. The main point to be borne in mind was that the power of complaint was to be freely used, but not abused.

COLONEL MURE inquired what was the use of giving concessions with one hand, and taking them away with the other? He was sure some protection was required from unwarrantable complaints, and suggested the insertion of a Proviso which he thought would meet the case.

MAJOR NOLAN did not wish to divide the Committee unnecessarily, and was willing to agree to the suggestion of the hon. and learned Member for Oxford (Sir William Harcourt). He did not wish to have connected the making of a false statement and the making of a complaint.

MR. HOPWOOD thought the Secretary of State for War had made a real concession, which obviated the necessity of any further delay.

COLONEL STANLEY, said he was perfectly willing to assent to what the hon. and learned Member for Oxford had proposed, provided the words in question were transferred to another place in the Bill.

MAJOR NOLAN was quite willing that everything should be transferred, except the word "complain," in Clause 27; but he did not want to connect the making of a complaint and punishment. He was quite willing that the making of a false complaint should come within the general principles of the Bill.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT remarked, that if the words in question were left out the Committee could get on.

Question put, and agreed to; words struck out accordingly.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 43 (Mode of complaint by soldier).

MAJOR NOLAN said, he had an Amendment on the Paper; but he did not intend to move it, in consequence of what the hon. and learned Member for Oxford (Sir William Harcourt) had stated; but he would move that the last paragraph be omitted.

Colonel Stanley

THE CHAIRMAN said, the hon. and gallant Member would be in Order in making that statement when his Amendment was reached; but there were others before it.

MR. J. BROWN said, he did not intend to move his Amendment, on the understanding that the last portion of the clause was to be omitted. His Amendment related to frivolous complaints regarding the necessities and provisions supplied to the soldier. That was a very common complaint in the Army, and was referred to in the Queen's Regulations, and he wished to call to it the attention of those who were in charge of the Bill.

MR. PARNELL said, he had an Amendment, in line 9, after "officer," to insert the words "or non-commissioned officer."

COLONEL STANLEY thought the hon. Member for Meath was not present during the earlier discussions, in which the same point arose, as to whether, in the Definition Clause, the word soldier included, for certain purposes, non-commissioned officer; and it was thought convenient to postpone the question until they came to the Definition Clause.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MAJOR NOLAN called attention to the words "every officer shall cause such complaint to be inquired into," and observed that the old Articles of War provided that there should be a Court of Inquiry, which he thought much better. An officer might inquire into the matter in many ways that would not be satisfactory to the soldier; and if the Secretary of State for War would restore in some way the old Courts of Inquiry, it would be a great advantage. He was quite content to move that the last paragraph be struck out.

Amendment agreed to.

Paragraph struck out accordingly.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Punishments.

Clause 44 (Scale of punishments by court martial).

MR. PARNELL said, he had an Amendment, in page 18, to leave out line 35. He had a very strong opinion that penal servitude was not a punishment that should be awardable by court martial. The nature of the court martial process was so summary, the number of offences against discipline was comparatively so limited, that he did not see any just or sufficient reason why the power of awarding penal servitude should be given to courts martial. He regretted that during the earlier stages of the Bill he was unable to be in his place. Otherwise, he should have raised the question at a time when he thought it would have been more properly raised—namely, upon any of the Clauses 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 12, and 17, where the power was given to courts martial to award penal servitude for certain offences; and he did not know how far the fact of the Committee having already given courts martial that power would prevent him from insisting upon the Amendment—from taking the opinion of the Committee upon the subject on the present occasion. In the clauses he had referred to, the power to award penal servitude was given for a variety of offences against discipline, and also for offences of a criminal character, such as embezzlement, and so forth. Again, in Clause 12, he found the power to award penal servitude as a punishment for desertion. He thought this was in excess of the old Army Regulations, and when formerly penal servitude could not be awarded for desertion. Then they found, in another clause, that penal servitude might be awarded for striking a superior officer; and there were a variety of offences and breaches of discipline, of a more or less serious character, for which the court martial was entitled to award penal servitude. He might mention that he had placed an Amendment on the Paper diminishing the term of penal servitude to be awarded from five to three years; but he found that he could not move that Amendment, because it would be contrary to some other Acts which regulated the power of all courts. He thought that, as a punishment for breaches of discipline, penal servitude ought really never to be insisted upon. He was of opinion that in every case a term of imprisonment for two years would be amply sufficient, and considered that all ordinary criminal offences were triable by ordinary courts, and not by courts martial. They had, by a preceding clause, excepted certain offences, such as high treason, murder, and manslaughter—altogether, five offences had been excepted by Clause 41 from the jurisdiction of courts martial—and he thought it would have been very much better if a soldier had been left, in a case of any other offence against the criminal law of the land, to the ordinary courts, where it was possible to bring him to trial before such courts. He would be in favour of giving courts martial the right of trying those offences in times of war; but he saw no sufficient reason why, in times of peace, soldiers should not in any case be brought before the ordinary court for such offences as theft, embezzlement of public money, and so forth; but, by the clause, they had passed, these offences could be tried by courts martial. He was afraid it was rather late to raise the question then; but, in the view of raising it, he begged to move to omit line 35, which gave the courts martial power to award penal servitude. He did so on two grounds—firstly, that all offences against discipline might be sufficiently punished by sentence of imprisonment for two years; and, secondly, that offences against the ordinary law of the land should be tried by the ordinary courts, and not by courts martial.

COLONEL STANLEY said, that the hon. Gentleman summarized his objections to this part of the clause under two heads—first, he thought that these crimes would be sufficiently punished by two years' imprisonment; and, secondly, he thought that all ordinary crimes should be taken to the Civil Courts. Well, if the hon. Gentleman would look at the last sub-section of Clause 41, he would see that a person subject to military law, when in Her Majesty's Dominions, could be tried by any competent Civil Court for any offence for which he was not liable to military law; and in the majority of cases of theft, and so forth, the prisoners were tried by Civil Courts. With regard to the latter proposal of the hon. Gentleman, he (Colonel Stanley) was afraid that he must join issue with him. The fact was this—if it had been possible to deal sufficiently with crimes by sentences of imprisonment only, there would have been no man more willing to have made that proposal than himself; but after careful examination, and the best information he could procure, and after consultation with his Colleagues, who helped him in framing this Bill, he came to the conclusion that it was impossible to leave out the sentence of penal servitude, and that, in certain cases and under certain circumstances, sentences of imprisonment would not suffice. He believed that was undoubtedly the case in India some years ago. Imprisonment seemed to produce no effect whatever in checking the gross cases—of insubordination, striking officers, and so forth; but when it was directed by General Napier that penal servitude should be more often enforced, that produced an almost entire cessation of these crimes. The Committee had considered this matter in connection with other things; and though they regretted to see penal servitude inflicted, in his opinion it was necessary to retain it in the clause.

GENERAL SIR GEORGE BALFOUR could confirm what the right hon. and gallant Gentleman had said as to what took place in India, and he earnestly urged the hon. Member for Meath (Mr. Parnell) not to press his Amendment. There were many parts of the Bill to which he objected; but now they had got upon a clause in which he was very happy to say that he agreed with the Secretary of State for War. In his own regiment, two years ago, an officer was sentenced to penal servitude, and the same thing had occurred in many instances with regard to soldiers. Even the punishment of death had been resorted to in extreme cases.

MR. MORGAN LLOYD objected to this clause on a different ground. Even assuming it was right to give to courts martial power to sentence to penal servitude in such cases, there was no sufficient reason for limiting the minimum term to five years. There might have been reasons for fixing that minimum at the time it was done, because he believed that at that time the cost of the prisons fell upon the counties, and the expense of keeping the men in penal servitude fell upon the Consolidated Fund; and the Government, in order to limit the amount payable out of the general taxes of the country, fixed that limit. But now that all prisons were supported by the State the reason failed.

THE CHAIRMAN called the hon. and learned Member to Order, stating that his observations related to a later Amendment.

COLONEL ALEXANDER said, that the hon. Member for Meath (Mr. Parnell) expressed a doubt as to whether, under the Mutiny Act, a soldier who deserted, or attempted to desert, could be sentenced to penal servitude. He would rather refer him to the 15th clause of the Mutiny Act, which provided that any person who should desert, or attempt to desert, should suffer death, penal servitude, or not exceeding two years' imprisonment, as by court martial awarded. The general rule had been that when a soldier had been tried three or four times by a garrison court martial he was then tried by a general court martial, with the view of punishing with penal servitude; and he had seen a soldier sentenced to 14 years' imprisonment under the old Transportation Act for a case of desertion.

MR. PARNELL did not wish to take a Division, because he was sensible that the principle of the Amendment would not be favourably entertained at this stage of the Bill. He was sorry he was not able to raise the question at an earlier stage, when it would have been more properly raised. He begged to withdraw the Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. PARNELL said, he was not quite sure whether there could really be introduced into the Bill a provision limiting penal servitude to three years instead of five. The law governing the duration of sentence of penal servitude was very explicit upon this point; but he had heard that it was possible for an Act of Parliament to do anything, and it was quite possible that they might change the present law by means of the alteration which was suggested by his Amendment. He would be very glad if one of the hon. and learned Gentlemen on the front Opposition Bench could have been present on this occasion to give them the assistance which they had been so kind as to give all along in this matter, because he thought this was a question for the lawyer. If they could really do it, he should like to move an Amendment which stood in his name—namely, in page 18, line 35, to leave out the word "five," in order to insert the word "three."

MR. ASSHETON CROSS hoped the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Parnell) would not press that Amendment, for this reason—they heard last night that the Penal Servitude Commissioners were going to report very shortly. It was one of the special things that he was always anxious that the Commissioners should ascertain as to the difference between the effect of penal servitude and the effect of imprisonment; and he had never been able to see why a court should not have the power to pass a sentence of penal servitude for less than five years. That had always been a great mystery to him. Of course he said nothing, although he might know a great deal, as to the wishes or the feelings of the Penal Servitude Commissioners; but the offer he made to the hon. Member for Meath was this—if the Penal Servitude Commissioners reported in favour of the reduction of the term of penal servitude from five years to three years, he would immediately adopt it, and he thought he could undertake that the military and naval authorities would do the same. That being so, and the Bill being a very long one, he would suggest that they need not waste any time in discussing the point then.

MR. PARNELL said, it occurred to him, after the statement of the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Home Department, that they might leave out all reference to the term of penal servitude from this clause, because, manifestly, that term would be governed by the general Acts regulating the sentence which might be imposed. For instance, as the Acts at present stood, the courts martial could not award a less sentence than five years; therefore, it appeared to him to be entirely unnecessary to introduce the term into this Bill. Even supposing the Government decided to alter the term of penal servitude to three years, a general Act would have to be passed for the purpose.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS said, that what he stated was this—that if the Commissioners reported that the minimum term of penal servitude should be less than five years, he would undertake, on behalf of his right hon. and gallant Friend the Secretary of State for War, that it should be put into the Bill before it became law.

MR. MORGAN LLOYD was very glad to hear what had fallen from the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary. He did not, however, see any objection to the proposal of the hon. Member for Meath—namely, to leave out the limit from this clause.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. PARNELL, in moving, as an Amendment, in page 18, line 36, to leave out “with or,” explained that its object was to limit the term of imprisonment with hard labour to one year; and he hoped the Committee would agree with in thinking that a sentence of two years’ hard labour was really too much for a man to undergo, unless he happened to be exceptionally strong. Hard labour in the military prisons was very different from that in the convict establishments, and was performed in the following manner:—A man stood in the middle of the house where the labour was done, turning a crank or winding up a weight; he was stripped, except as to his trousers; there was water running down the walls of the room in order to keep it cool, the labour being so intense; and this might go on for ten hours at a time. It would be seen that this was labour of no ordinary character, and of a kind that no man ought to be called upon to perform for any considerable time; for, even if he should happen to live through his sentence, he would be utterly broken down for life. He thought that, in view of the large amount of imprisonment which unfortunately appeared to be necessary in the Army, care should be taken to see that the constitutions of our soldiers were not injured by sentences of imprisonment thoughtlessly inflicted by courts martial who did not fully understand the consequences of their acts, and that they should draw a distinction between the criminal classes and the soldiers of the Army. He, therefore, begged to move the Amendment of which he had given Notice.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS said, the description of the hard labour in the prisons, as given by the hon. Member, was hardly correct. There was no doubt whatever that two years’ imprisonment with hard labour was a very hard sentence; but, at the same time, it was one that was very seldom given. The amount of hard labour performed in military prisons became less and less, until the offender reached the highest class; and the Committee must not think that people were kept working at the crank for a period of two years. He hoped the Committee would allow the words to stand in the Bill.

GENERAL SIR GEORGE BALFOUR said, he was not aware how the limitations and precautions referred to by the Secretary of State for the Home Department as having been made against the severity of hard labour could be brought to bear in the case of India. Many parts of the Act appeared at variance with the Indian system, and he was afraid that the new clause might have the effect of punishing soldiers in a hot climate more severely than they were punished in a cold one.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS agreed with the hon. and gallant Member that there should be some security against this; and as the clause in that respect did not seem to be sufficiently clear, he would have the matter looked into.

MR. PARSELL pointed out to the Committee that the general labour in military prisons was very much harder than in the convict establishments, and that the diet was not nearly so good. He wished to bring to the notice of the Committee the fact that the scale of diet had been very considerably reduced since the Home Secretary came into Office. The scales of diet recommended by the Committee were considerably lower than those in force in many of the prisons throughout the country. Of course, the right hon. Gentleman would know that the scales in force throughout the country were not entirely uniform in their character, and that they varied very much according to locality in England, Ireland, and Scotland; at the same time, the scales recommended by the Committee appointed to consider this subject were very much lower than those adopted in other prisons. He had visited one of the prisons recently, and found that they had adopted a higher dietary scale than the one sanctioned by the right hon. Gentleman, which they evidently considered too low. He was not prepared at that moment to go into the scales, and, therefore, only mentioned the matter incidentally as one which might be open to correction; but his strong opinion was that the scales in question were very inferior to those in force in convict establishments. Under such circumstances, therefore, it was impossible that a man should undergo a period of two years' imprisonment with hard labour without suffering in health and being incapacitated from doing useful work when he came out of prison. Our soldiers should not be submitted to treatment of that kind; and if it was desired to get any good out of a man, he should not be subjected to punishment which would make him useless afterwards. Although he did not think himself justified in taking a Division, he should record a very strong protest against the system of giving soldiers in the Army long terms of hard labour, more especially for offences against discipline. There was evidence that soldiers had been sentenced to cumulative sentences amounting to five years; but that had been done away with. Still, practically, a soldier might be sentenced to cumulative sentences under this Act up to five years, and there was little doubt that courts martial would adopt that practice in future.

MR. MITCHELL HENRY asked the Secretary of State for War, whether it was the intention of the military authorities to assimilate the diet and punishment in military prisons to those which existed in convict and other prisons throughout the country? He had heard it over and over again stated that a soldier going out from a term of hard labour was utterly unfitted to perform regimental duties for a length of time. It was well known that the dietary scale was very much lower in the military prisons than that in use in ordinary prisons, and the fact had been brought before the House several times during the last few years. The hon. Member for Hythe (Sir Edward Watkin) had, three years ago, brought a case under the notice of the House which had excited a great deal of attention and horror.

COLONEL STANLEY said, when the Bill passed, it was the intention to take this very point into consideration; that was one reason why he had asked his right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Home Department to put his name on the back of the Bill.

COLONEL MURE said, the new scale of diet had proved to be all that could be desired, and that the standard of health continued to be highly satisfactory in the military prisons. He did not think that the power to sentence to hard labour should be withdrawn.

MR. MITCHELL HENRY desired to know if the hon. and gallant Gentleman who had just spoken wished the Committee to understand that the dietary in military prisons was equal to that in ordinary convict establishments, or that the hard labour imposed in them was the same as in the latter? because it was well known that such was not the case.

COLONEL STANLEY wished to point out that the present discussion should relate to the future and not to the past. As far as circumstances would admit, it was the intention to assimilate both the diet and hard labour in military and other prisons.

MR. HOPWOOD said, a matter had been pressed upon his attention by a military correspondent, about which he desired to ask the question, whether, in future, military delinquents would be kept separate from the civil criminal class?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS said, it was absolutely impossible to allot a separate part of a prison to military prisoners; but, as far as possible, they would be kept distinct from ordinary prisoners.

MR. J. HOLMS suggested that the Bill might, perhaps, remain as it was, inasmuch as the clause spoke of imprisonment "with or without hard labour." He wished to point out that if the power of giving sentences of two years, with or without hard labour, was taken away, the courts martial might be found to incline to the infliction of terms of penal servitude. Everything, however, would depend upon the formation of the court martial, which, in his opinion, ought to be radically changed.

GENERAL SHUTE assured the Committee that officers of the Army were not predisposed to give long terms of imprisonment; quite the reverse. There was a strong objection to losing the services of soldiers from their regiments, which, in their absence, would have to be performed by other men. Long sentences were avoided, whenever it was possible, especially in Cavalry and Artillery, in which services the imprisonment of the bad entailed so much extra duty on the good soldiers, and it was most unusual to give more than one year's imprisonment. He wished that hon. Members opposite would not constantly imply that the officers of the Army were a set of military tyrants. The officers of the Army took the greatest interest in the welfare of the soldiers, and far more so in the English Service than in any Army in Europe.

VOL. CCXLVI. [THIRD SERIES.]

MR. RYLANDS assured the hon. and gallant Member for Brighton (General Shute) that he had the highest opinion of the officers of the Army generally, and believed many of them to be of high character, certainly not men disposed to act in an unjust or cruel manner; but he was bound to tell the hon. and gallant Member that that tribute was not universally paid to the consideration and kindness of military officers. Unfortunately, cases could be referred to of officers exercising their powers in a manner detrimental to the Service and unjust to individual soldiers. The Paper which he held in his hand, for instance, stated that a man had received 336 days' imprisonment in an Indian military prison, simply for making a complaint against his commanding officer to the Commander-in-Chief in a respectfully-worded letter. At the same time, he wished to say that he had not risen for the purpose of supporting the Amendment before the Committee; and, inasmuch as the Bill gave a discretionary power to courts martial, he thought the clause might be fairly allowed to remain in its present form. However, in granting great powers to officers, he thought that those powers should be surrounded by safeguards.

GENERAL SIR GEORGE BALFOUR drew attention to the new punishment of imprisonment to be inflicted upon officers of the Army, to which he felt the strongest objection, inasmuch as he did not think it at all fitted to an officer who had misdemeaned himself. Imprisonment, he found, was a substitute for corporal punishment in the case of soldiers, and he, therefore, strongly objected to this application of it to the military offences of officers. If hon. Members would refer to the Defining Clause of the Bill, they would find that corporal punishment might be awarded to soldiers in lieu of imprisonment. He therefore appealed to the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War, with the hope that some modification might be introduced throughout the Bill to do away with the imprisonment of officers. He quite admitted that imprisonment must be awarded for many acts done by officers in India.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. HOPWOOD hoped that the Committee would accept him as the representative of the hon. Member for Leicester (Mr. P. A. Taylor), on whose behalf he begged to express regret that he should be absent from the House and the performance of his duty, in moving, as an Amendment, to leave out from line 5, page 19, the words "or corporal punishment, subject as in this Act mentioned." In doing this, he was aware that he would be repealing to the Committee an old story and an old complaint. But the complaint and the defence were equally old, and had begun many years ago. In moving the omission of the words "corporal punishment," he thought he might almost as well have asked to substitute the word "torture." A few years ago, an old punishment for almost every act was death, and in those days hon. Members, no doubt, held up to scorn any endeavour to alter that bloody and ferocious system; and it was thought, no doubt honestly and conscientiously, that to take away that violent sanction would be to upset the framework of society. But some of their Predecessors had seen the necessity of repealing and altering that state of things; they were persistent and successful, and he (Mr. Hopwood), and other hon. Members who entertained the same opinions upon this subject, hoped to be as persistent and as successful in the work of repealing the law which authorized the infliction of corporal punishment upon the soldiers in the Army. In 1811 the number of lashes which might be inflicted was unlimited, and it was sometimes measured by the extent to which the unhappy offender could hold out; but, at that time, some merciful person, in spite of terrible warnings as to the mischief that might ensue, proposed that it should not exceed 300. Shortly after this the number was limited to 200 lashes. Lastly, the hon. Member for Rochester (Mr. Otway) succeeded in inducing the House of Commons to carry the abolition of this punishment. But the Government of the day, and it happened to be the Representatives of the same Party now in power, clung to the old notion. It was not till the year 1868 that the clause was adopted as it now stood in the annual Mutiny Bill, and which was mainly incorporated in the Bill now before the House. Such was the history of the strenuous endeavours by which, in spite of the strongest official opposition, in spite of great prejudice, in spite of alarming appeals and endeavours to terrify nervous people, the salutary law was enacted by which at the present moment it was unlawful, in time of peace and on land, to inflict upon any soldier the punishment of the lash. But there was a modification of that law, and the punishment might still be inflicted in time of peace on active service and on board ships not commissioned by Her Majesty; and there was unfortunate evidence that the exceptions in the Act were being made use of most readily by some people wedded to the old state of things. The House had just learned that three troopers of Her Majesty's First Dragoon Guards on the way to the Cape had been subjected to this most severe punishment, which might, unhappily, be still inflicted on board ships not commissioned by Her Majesty; and the opportunity of time and place seemed to have suggested themselves to the officer in command, who accordingly had these men triced up and lashed. As the men were on board ship, they could not possibly desert. What on earth, then, could be the necessity for resorting to this abominable and degrading punishment? He understood that they were guilty of gross insubordination—and gross insubordination they might be guilty of on land, but they could not be flogged for it; therefore, he said that those who had chosen that punishment merely from the accident that gallant men were being carried from this country to serve Her Majesty in another place had made a gross mistake, which they would have done better to avoid. Hon. Members ought to endeavour to remove this blot and stigma from the British Army and Navy. He now turned to the evidence of some of the military men who spoke on the occasion of the debate, after which the House of Commons abolished for ever this punishment in time of peace and on land. Captain Vivian supplied an illustration in support of the hon. Member who moved the abolition of the punishment by saying that—

"Corporal punishment was not inflicted in the Household Cavalry regiments, but that was owing to the fact that it was considered the greatest disgrace that could happen to a man to be turned out of his regiment. They should, therefore, endeavour to teach the whole Army that it was a glory to belong to the Profession, and a disgrace to be driven from it."

Mr. Hopwood

Glory!—to belong to a profession in which every man might, under some circumstances, be subjected to this disgraceful punishment! It was made a crime to flog an ancient Roman, and he could not see why the Committee should not make a similar protection for the backs of Englishmen, and not allow them to be whipped as one would whip a dog. The other military testimony went to show that corporal punishment deterred persons from entering the Army who would otherwise have enlisted, and that it was clear that flogging could be done away with; because, in 1811, when the number of lashes was first restricted, the men were worse in point of character than at the present time. Again, it had been shown that its retention was not necessary to enforce the authority of the non-commissioned officers, who, in the case of one battalion, on being asked whether they thought that flogging was necessary to maintain their authority, had one and all replied that they "should be sorry to maintain it at that price." It would have been well if one of the infernal implements used for the infliction of this punishment could have been brought into the House for the inspection of all hon. Members, some of whom, he feared, through seeing them used, had to a certain extent come to look upon them as necessary. He wondered the right hon. and gallant Gentleman did not produce one—to show how soft it was, and speak of it as not conveying torture. He (Mr. Hopwood) doubted whether this implement had been properly described in legislative enactments. As far as he had learned, however, with one stroke it produced nine cuts; and, besides, its nine lashes were furnished with a number of knots, for the sake of producing the largest amount of human suffering that could be inflicted for the purposes of this Act of Parliament. The labours of some ingenious artist had clearly been expended in the production of this fearful instrument, the use of which, if they still claimed to be men of tenderness and generous feeling towards their fellow-creatures, should be at once abolished. He was not aware that medical men could estimate suffering better than others; but they could give better expression to it, and this was the description given by medical authority—

"As to the strokes, we can only describe them to be combined—bruising, cutting, and tearing of the most horrible description; and, familiar as we are with surgical operations before the days of chloroform, we are obliged to conclude that not the most serious and protracted operations, including amputation, tooth-drawing, or all put together, were ever so painful as flogging."

Again, the testimony of Mr. Abernethy was that—

"One of the severest operations of surgery is for stone, which, when skilfully performed, is not upon the average of more than a few minutes duration. In flogging every lash is, perhaps, equal to the incision through the skin in the operation for stone; and, further, no surgeon could answer for the ultimate or immediate consequences of this species of corporal punishment."

He had now proved, upon the highest authority, that he was correct in describing this punishment as torture. Supposing it was proposed to put into the Act the words, "or torture by raising the skin by pincers, or by raising weals or blisters by hot irons," would anyone fail to recoil from the proposal as one to be avoided with horror? Yet such was represented, in gentlemanly words, to be "corporal punishment." The punishment of the lash produced infinite and horrible torture; one skin might bear its effect, and one constitution endure it, but not another; the extremest pain must be felt by the sensitive patient; and yet the House was about to pass the enactment that corporal punishment was to be renewed, in the shape of torture by the lash, by tearing the skin, and by producing suffering equal to that endured under the most terrible surgical operations before the use of anæsthetics. He contended that, under no circumstances, should the House be a party to such a thing, and he equally resisted the application of this punishment to all those cases and situations described in the present Act. Apologizing for the length at which he had spoken, but for which his own arguments and the desire to represent his absent Friend would be his excuse, he moved that the words, "or corporal punishment," down to the end of line 5, be omitted from the clause.

Amendment proposed,

In page 19, line 5, to leave out from the word "years," to the word "mentioned," in line 6, inclusive.—(Mr. Hopwood.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Clause."

COLONEL STANLEY said, that the Committee had under its consideration one of the most serious punishments that could be inflicted under the Act; and he hoped that the Committee would endeavour, as far as possible, to clear away from their minds all matters except those strictly relevant to the Bill. What the Committee had to consider was whether, in the circumstances of the present day, this punishment should be retained. Had he, upon any evidence or otherwise, been able to conclude that the time had arrived when this punishment could be omitted, he should at once have thought it his duty to have framed the Bill accordingly, and to have submitted it in that form to Parliament. But having regard to the circumstances under which the Service had to be carried on, and to the nature of the crimes occasionally arising under the discipline of the Service, he had not found himself enabled to eliminate corporal punishment from the Bill. He trusted the Committee would, therefore, pause before adopting the Amendment of the hon. and learned Member for Stockport (Mr. Hopwood). He could not question the feeling with which that hon. and learned Member had just addressed the Committee. No doubt, he entertained very strong opinions upon the subject; but when he spoke of the "careful contrivance of an instrument for producing the largest amount of personal suffering," he (Colonel Stanley) was bound to say that he differed entirely from the hon. and learned Member's conclusions. With regard to the medical opinions cited, he would like to have the date of those opinions, and to know whether they were expressed at a time when corporal punishment could be extended to 800 or 1,000 lashes? So far as he had heard, officers were always reluctant to inflict this punishment, except in the gravest instances, or when it was absolutely necessary to make an example and to save further crime. But, fenced about as it was with limitations which Parliament had imposed, he did not think that the discipline of the Army could be maintained by its removal, without leaving an hiatus in the punishment to be inflicted, which would oblige the authorities to resort to even more severe measures than corporal punishment. It would be observed that corporal punishment was now limited to circumstances under which it was difficult or impossible to inflict imprisonment. As to the infliction of corporal punishment on board ships, the Committee would understand that the limitation, in Sub-section 7, of ships not in commission by Her Majesty, was merely put in to cover the case of ships in the merchant service, for the reason that on board ships bearing the pennant the provision of the Mutiny Act was temporarily suspended, and discipline carried on under the Naval Discipline Act. He desired to add that his hon. Friends and the right hon. Gentleman who had considered this Bill had also carefully considered the subject of corporal punishment; and they had not considered it their duty to Parliament to recommend that it should be eliminated from the measure, because they felt that if this had been done, resort would be had, in many cases, especially on active service, to a more severe penalty, and because they felt that, wherever imprisonment could not be given, some punishment that could be promptly inflicted was absolutely necessary. They had endeavoured to fence round the punishment with every possible safeguard. He, therefore, hoped the Committee would not agree to the Amendment of the hon. and learned Member for Stockport.

MR. SULLIVAN said, he had hoped that some hon. Member connected with the Military Profession, of whom he saw several in the House, would have risen at once to say that he believed the British soldier worthy of being placed on the same footing, as regarded punishment, with the soldiers of every other State in Europe, and that he should be freed from the disgrace and torture of the lash. Looking round him, he saw many officers who held, or who had held, high positions in the Army; and he would ask them whether they did not think that, as in the Armies of France, Germany, and Italy, discipline was admirably maintained without having recourse to flogging, it might not also be maintained in the Army of this country without so brutal and degrading a punishment? He was not sure whether he was libelling the Russian Army, when he said that he believed Russia only shared with England the use of the knout for the purpose of preserving discipline among her troops. For his own part, he begged to protest in the strongest terms against the continuance of flogging, and he did so the more especially, because his own countrymen contributed a large quota to the Army. To those who contended that the infliction of physical pain and torture was necessary to keep the men in order, he would reply that, if that was really the case, some more decent system of physical punishment than the lash ought to be adopted. The thumb-screw would be found quite as efficient for the purpose. Why, he would ask, was not it used, instead of the cat-o'-nine-tails? Why should the Scavenger's Daughter be allowed to remain idle in the Tower of London, if hon. Members were so enamoured of a system of physical torture? Was it not a source of shame and indignation to them that it should be proclaimed to the world that England stood in need of the infamous lash to keep her soldiers out of trouble? The flag of France had been planted by the Armies of France on the ramparts of almost every city in Europe. It had been carried in triumph to Leipsic, and to Moscow, and to Berlin. [Laughter.] Hon. and gallant Gentlemen in that House might laugh at the record, and England, it must be admitted, had done great things in Ashantee and Abyssinia; but she had not, as France had, borne her arms victorious over the Continent of Europe, and that without inflicting the disgrace of the lash upon her soldiers. The British Army was composed, no one could deny it, of brave men. The personal courage of the British soldier had never been impugned. It had been proved upon many fields. Why, then, should the Committee hesitate to raise the British soldier to an equality with the soldiers of France? Let them give up this emblem of a barbaric age, when the soldier was scourged, not unfrequently, until he reached the battle-field. In the name of the British soldier, in the name of common humanity, in the name of the country which was proud of its civilization, he begged of hon. and gallant Gentlemen, some of whom might to-morrow or the next day have to lead their men to the cannon's mouth, to wipe away the stain which the use of a brutal instrument of torture cast upon our Military Code.

SIR WALTER B. BARTTELOT said, he had seen the hon. and learned Member for Louth (Mr. Sullivan) get up on many occasions in that House, and had heard him denounce its Members in the same unmeasured language in which he had thought fit to indulge on the present occasion. He would, however, venture to remind the hon. and learned Gentleman of the desirability of taking a little more pains to know something of the business he was talking about than he seemed to have done with regard to the question of flogging in the Army. It was clear that the hon. and learned Gentleman knew nothing about the subject, and he ought to be aware that there was not a Member of the House who was not just as anxious that the punishment of flogging in the Army should be done away with, if that could possibly be done without injury to the Service. There was no man in that House who would desire to see a single soldier flogged; but it was necessary to look a great deal further than that. The hon. and learned Gentleman would make it appear that a soldier might absolutely be flogged in this country. He had drawn no distinction, and had not discriminated in any way as to the real state of the case. He ought, however, to have been aware, and must have been aware, of the fact that soldiers were not flogged in this country; and if he knew it, he ought not to have spoken as he had done. Sentimental speeches, such as that which the hon. and learned Gentleman had just delivered, scarcely did him any credit, he thought. He should not, however, have risen to reply to that speech, but that he did not like to remain silent when he heard the character of the officers of our Army being taken away in that sort of manner. No one, he was sure, felt more kindly disposed towards our soldiers than the officers by whom they were commanded; and it was only in cases of absolute necessity, on board ship, or in the field, that the lash was resorted to. He felt certain, he might add, that the hon. and gallant Member for Galway (Major Nolan), would not rise in his place and tell the Committee that there were, in his opinion, no occasions when flogging was necessary for the maintenance of discipline.

GENERAL SIR GEORGE BALFOUR said, he had no doubt that when that House provided the means by which the Army might be made a more attractive profession to a higher class of men, and the condition of the soldier improved, flogging might be dispensed with without detriment to the Service. Even under the present system, he must admit that there were occasions when the lash was improperly applied, and he had seen the men in nearly three regiments disqualified for service in consequence. There were, however, some cases in which, he regretted to think, it was necessary to have recourse to corporal punishment; although, as he said, he believed it might be done away with under an improved system. He need not say that he would have great pleasure in supporting any measure which the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War might bring forward calculated to have that object.

MAJOR O'BEIRNE expressed his strong objection to the brutal manner in which the punishment of flogging was sometimes inflicted on board ship. He had himself witnessed cases, he might add, of flogging for petty theft, and half the number of lashes awarded had to be remitted, because the men could not endure the full number. He would support the Amendment, believing that the use of the lash might be dispensed with in the English, as it was in the French and German, and other Continental Armies.

MR. SULLIVAN said, he congratulated himself on having performed a miracle, for he had succeeded in making the dumb speak. It was very evident, from what had occurred in the course of the present discussion, that someone's withers were wrung, for the hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for West Sussex (Sir Walter B. Barttelot) had not found himself able to preserve silence any longer; and he (Mr. Sullivan) was glad that he had spoken, in order that the country might know what the opinions of military men were about the practice of the knout. The hon. and gallant Baronet, who, he believed, was a post colonel, was good enough to say that he (Mr. Sullivan) had denounced hon. Members of that House; but what he denounced was propositions made in that House, and hon. Members who hesitated to say what they thought on a subject upon which, in his opinion, they were called upon to speak, for he could not help regarding it as discreditable to the military Members of the House that they should allow the Vote to pass in silence. He (Mr. Sullivan) was as free to speak as the hon. and gallant Baronet, and he would tell him that he was not a bit afraid to get up in his place and to give expression to that opinion. With no wish in the world to press the matter to greater length than fair argument would admit, he would venture to tell the hon. and gallant Member that the question which was raised by the Amendment of his hon. and learned Friend beside him (Mr. Hopwood) was a more serious one than they seemed to suppose. There were some hon. Members, at all events, who felt most keenly and deeply upon the question of the preservation of the punishment of the knout. Why, he would ask, should a law be kept upon the Statute Book, by which it was proclaimed that the British soldier ceased to be a Briton because he did not happen to be staying within the limits of these Islands? Let the advocates of the lash come forward and answer the arguments which had been urged against it. He had succeeded in bringing one of them out, and he hoped a few more of them would favour the Committee with their views on the subject. Let there be no silent voting on their part. He ventured to say he knew more about the matter than the hon. and gallant Gentleman (Sir Walter B. Barttelot) seemed to suppose. He also felt more about it than the hon. and gallant Gentleman appeared to do. He had, he might say, almost seen the horrors of the lash. It was barely a few years ago that reporters who had been in his own establishment in the City of Dublin returned with their faces spattered with the blood and flesh of those unfortunate soldiers who were the victims of this degrading punishment. ["Oh, oh!"] He rejoiced to find that the House of Commons shuddered at the fact, and that they were ashamed of it. That it was a fact there could be no doubt, because it was borne testimony to by the Press of Dublin at the time; and to the horror of it no greater tribute could be paid than the ebullition of feeling to which the mention of it had just given rise. If any hon. Member thought he exaggerated the story, let the Government, in whose presence he had stated that disgraceful fact, get up and contradict him. If his statement were true, as it most undoubtedly was, could the Committee wonder that he should feel deeply and keenly on the subject? He had no seat in the House when the circumstance occurred; but he had then made a vow that if ever he did succeed in obtaining a seat in it, he would tell the military men in it how disgraceful it was that they should seek to perpetuate this dreadful indignity inflicted on the British soldier.

General Sir George Balfour

MR. MITCHELL HENRY said, that whatever might be the opinions which hon. Members entertained on the subject of flogging in the Army, he did not think those who advocated the abolition of corporal punishment would serve the cause which they professed to have at heart by the course which they had taken on the present occasion. For his own part, he hoped and believed he was as much influenced by feelings of humanity as any hon. Member who desired to have flogging done away with; but he also hoped that he had sense enough to see that, irrespective of the question of the expediency of maintaining it in the Army, the subject was not at all to be approached by the same arguments as it was years ago, when the brutal punishment of the lash was the normal punishment of our Criminal Code. He had never been able to go with his hon. Friend the Member for Leicester (Mr. P. A. Taylor) in his desire to abolish flogging in the case of such offenders as wife-beaters and garotters. It was, in his opinion, nonsense, and nothing but nonsense, for hon. Members to indulge in such talk as he had heard about the effect of the cat-o'-nine-tails, in the infliction of some 25 or 50 lashes, which were every week inflicted in our prisons in all parts of England, in the same way as they were inflicted upon the soldier, and which were constantly witnessed and described by the reporters of the newspapers, who never stated that they had been spattered by the blood or flesh of any of the victims. Very brutal scenes had, no doubt, been enacted in past times; but his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Louth (Mr. Sullivan) seemed to be carried away by his feelings far beyond the extent which the real state of the case would justify, and to forget that the horrors of which he complained had long since been done away with. The truth of the matter was that the punishment of flogging in the Army had been abolished for years, except when a soldier was being conveyed on board a ship not belonging to the Fleet, and where there were no means of preserving discipline such as existed on board a man-of-war, or when troops were in the field. In those cases, an offender might be subjected to a limited number of lashes with a cat-o'-nine-tails. What hon. Member, he would ask, was not aware that some years ago it was actually unsafe to walk in the streets of London? Who did not recollect the case of an hon. and respected Gentleman who sat on his own side of the House, and who was seized by a garotter as he was walking through Pall Mall and very nearly strangled? It was in consequence of that offence that the punishment of flogging with a cat-o'-nine-tails to the extent of 25 or 50 lashes was adopted in regard to the perpetrators of such outrages, with the result that the streets of London shortly became safe to walk in again. He had never felt a greater sense of shame at the conduct of his fellow-countrymen than during the time of which he was speaking, when many persons thought it was necessary to carry arms in the streets for the purpose of protecting oneself against those assaults. He recollected very well a conversation which took place among hon. Members as to the best mode of protection, and that one very shrewd old gentleman had provided himself with a weapon in the shape of two knives, admirably adapted to the purpose of freeing himself from the grasp of a garotter, if he should happen to be attacked by one. The law was not then strong enough to protect peaceful citizens, and, as he had said, it was only by having recourse to flogging that garotting was put down. ["No, no!"] He at once admitted that any hon. Member had a right to form his own opinion as to the causes which had led to the disappearance of that offence; but his own belief was that it had been extinguished by the specific infliction of a particular form of punishment—and that was the use of the cat-o'-nine-tails. Everybody, he might add, was aware that in Russia the knout was the normal mode of punishing criminals, and he believed that even in the German Army the use of the cane was not unknown. There was, it was perfectly true, no flogging in France; but then there were other punishments inflicted there, which produced physical torture quite as much open to objection as that which was caused by the lash. In America, it had been seriously proposed to employ electricity as a means of producing physical hoped the Committee would allow the words to stand in the Bill.

GENERAL SIR GEORGE BALFOUR said, he was not aware how the limitations and precautions referred to by the Secretary of State for the Home Department as having been made against the severity of hard labour could be brought to bear in the case of India. Many parts of the Act appeared at variance with the Indian system, and he was afraid that the new clause might have the effect of punishing soldiers in a hot climate more severely than they were punished in a cold one.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS agreed with the hon. and gallant Member that there should be some security against this; and as the clause in that respect did not seem to be sufficiently clear, he would have the matter looked into.

MR. PARNELL pointed out to the Committee that the general labour in military prisons was very much harder than in the convict establishments, and that the diet was not nearly so good. He wished to bring to the notice of the Committee the fact that the scale of diet had been very considerably reduced since the Home Secretary came into Office. The scales of diet recommended by the Committee were considerably lower than those in force in many of the prisons throughout the country. Of course, the right hon. Gentleman would know that the scales in force throughout the country were not entirely uniform in their character, and that they varied very much according to locality in England, Ireland, and Scotland; at the same time, the scales recommended by the Committee appointed to consider this subject were very much lower than those adopted in other prisons. He had visited one of the prisons recently, and found that they had adopted a higher dietary scale than the one sanctioned by the right hon. Gentleman, which they evidently considered too low. He was not prepared at that moment to go into the scales, and, therefore, only mentioned the matter incidentally as one which might be open to correction; but his strong opinion was that the scales in question were very inferior to those in force in convict establishments. Under such circumstances, therefore, it was impossible that a man should undergo a period of two years' imprisonment with hard labour without suffering in health and being incapacitated from doing useful work when he came out of prison. Our soldiers should not be submitted to treatment of that kind; and if it was desired to get any good out of a man, he should not be subjected to punishment which would make him useless afterwards. Although he did not think himself justified in taking a Division, he should record a very strong protest against the system of giving soldiers in the Army long terms of hard labour, more especially for offences against discipline. There was evidence that soldiers had been sentenced to cumulative sentences amounting to five years; but that had been done away with. Still, practically, a soldier might be sentenced to cumulative sentences under this Act up to five years, and there was little doubt that courts martial would adopt that practice in future.

MR. MITCHELL HENRY asked the Secretary of State for War, whether it was the intention of the military authorities to assimilate the diet and punishment in military prisons to those which existed in convict and other prisons throughout the country? He had heard it over and over again stated that a soldier going out from a term of hard labour was utterly unfitted to perform regimental duties for a length of time. It was well known that the dietary scale was very much lower in the military prisons than that in use in ordinary prisons, and the fact had been brought before the House several times during the last few years. The hon. Member for Hythe (Sir Edward Watkin) had, three years ago, brought a case under the notice of the House which had excited a great deal of attention and horror.

COLONEL STANLEY said, when the Bill passed, it was the intention to take this very point into consideration; that was one reason why he had asked his right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Home Department to put his name on the back of the Bill.

COLONEL MURE said, the new scale of diet had proved to be all that could be desired, and that the standard of health continued to be highly satisfactory in the military prisons. He did not think that the power to sentence to hard labour should be withdrawn.

MR. MITCHELL HENRY desired to know if the hon. and gallant Gentleman who had just spoken wished the

Mr. Assheton Cross

Committee to understand that the dietary in military prisons was equal to that in ordinary convict establishments, or that the hard labour imposed in them was the same as in the latter? because it was well known that such was not the case.

COLONEL STANLEY wished to point out that the present discussion should relate to the future and not to the past. As far as circumstances would admit, it was the intention to assimilate both the diet and hard labour in military and other prisons.

MR. HOPWOOD said, a matter had been pressed upon his attention by a military correspondent, about which he desired to ask the question, whether, in future, military delinquents would be kept separate from the civil criminal class?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS said, it was absolutely impossible to allot a separate part of a prison to military prisoners; but, as far as possible, they would be kept distinct from ordinary prisoners.

MR. J. HOLMS suggested that the Bill might, perhaps, remain as it was, inasmuch as the clause spoke of imprisonment "with or without hard labour." He wished to point out that if the power of giving sentences of two years, with or without hard labour, was taken away, the courts martial might be found to incline to the infliction of terms of penal servitude. Everything, however, would depend upon the formation of the court martial, which, in his opinion, ought to be radically changed.

GENERAL SHUTE assured the Committee that officers of the Army were not predisposed to give long terms of imprisonment; quite the reverse. There was a strong objection to losing the services of soldiers from their regiments, which, in their absence, would have to be performed by other men. Long sentences were avoided, whenever it was possible, especially in Cavalry and Artillery, in which services the imprisonment of the bad entailed so much extra duty on the good soldiers, and it was most unusual to give more than one year's imprisonment. He wished that hon. Members opposite would not constantly imply that the officers of the Army were a set of military tyrants. The officers of the Army took the greatest interest in the welfare of the soldiers, and far more so in the English Service than in any Army in Europe.

VOL. CCXLVI. [THIRD SERIES.]

MR. RYLANDS assured the hon. and gallant Member for Brighton (General Shute) that he had the highest opinion of the officers of the Army generally, and believed many of them to be of high character, certainly not men disposed to act in an unjust or cruel manner; but he was bound to tell the hon. and gallant Member that that tribute was not universally paid to the consideration and kindness of military officers. Unfortunately, cases could be referred to of officers exercising their powers in a manner detrimental to the Service and unjust to individual soldiers. The Paper which he held in his hand, for instance, stated that a man had received 336 days' imprisonment in an Indian military prison, simply for making a complaint against his commanding officer to the Commander-in-Chief in a respectfully-worded letter. At the same time, he wished to say that he had not risen for the purpose of supporting the Amendment before the Committee; and, inasmuch as the Bill gave a discretionary power to courts martial, he thought the clause might be fairly allowed to remain in its present form. However, in granting great powers to officers, he thought that those powers should be surrounded by safeguards.

GENERAL SIR GEORGE BALFOUR drew attention to the new punishment of imprisonment to be inflicted upon officers of the Army, to which he felt the strongest objection, inasmuch as he did not think it at all fitted to an officer who had misdemeaned himself. Imprisonment, he found, was a substitute for corporal punishment in the case of soldiers, and he, therefore, strongly objected to this application of it to the military offences of officers. If hon. Members would refer to the Defining Clause of the Bill, they would find that corporal punishment might be awarded to soldiers in lieu of imprisonment. He therefore appealed to the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War, with the hope that some modification might be introduced throughout the Bill to do away with the imprisonment of officers. He quite admitted that imprisonment must be awarded for many acts done by officers in India.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. HOPWOOD hoped that the Committee would accept him as the

of the Bill. The true facts of the case were, he believed, understood by everyone who took any pains to consider the subject; and he must protest against the allegation being made with regard to hon. Members, who were as humane as his hon. Friend himself, that if they were in the Army they would take every opportunity of inflicting the punishment of flogging on the soldiers—as the hon. Gentleman had kindly insinuated some hon. and gallant Officers sitting on both sides of the House did or would be prepared to do. He should be very glad to see corporal punishment abolished altogether; but that was a millenium which would not, he was afraid, be speedily brought, notwithstanding the arguments of his hon. Friend.

MR. HOPWOOD congratulated the Government on having the support of his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Oxford (Sir William Harcourt), who had assumed a great responsibility for the Bill throughout the discussions upon it. But with all the regard which he entertained for his hon. and learned Friend, he felt obliged, from no want of good feeling towards him, to decline to act upon his advice. His hon. and learned Friend asked what punishment those who supported the Amendment would substitute for flogging; but he denied that they were in any way called upon to supply an answer to that question. It was not for them to furnish information to the military authorities as to how discipline might be best maintained among the troops who were under their rule. His Amendment was directed against a particular mode of punishment which met a man face to face when he entered the Army, and which had a most blighting effect. There was not an Army in Europe, he believed, in which the system of flogging was now adopted—not even the Russian. Let English officers ponder on that fact, and say whether they could sit still and hear this punishment cracked up as necessary, and actually supported on the ground that, as it was useful in the case of the garotter and the wife-beater, so it was useful for the English soldier—a man who was charged with the defence of his country, whose courage and endurance were so constantly the theme of praise in that House. But, whatever might be the decision of the Committee on the present occasion, he felt sure that the time would come when, for very shame, so degrading a punishment would be given up in the English Army. It was said that in foreign Armies men were shot for such offences as those against which the clause was intended to provide. Who was the authority for that statement? Who was prepared to give the Committee chapter and verse for it, impugning, as it did, the honour of foreign nations? Something had been said about caning being resorted to in the German Army. The Germans would, he could not help thinking, be astonished when they learnt that such a statement had been made in the House of Commons in connection with their great and fine Army. He implored our military authorities to give up a punishment which was as useless as it was degrading, and to adopt some other means of maintaining discipline.

MR. PARNELL was sorry to be obliged to impugn the accuracy of the hon. Member for Galway (Mr. Mitchell Henry); but he wished to remind him, in justice to himself, that it was not in conversation with him that the hon. Gentleman had made the statement to which he had referred, but in a speech which he had publicly delivered in that House some 12 months ago. The hon. Gentleman then told him that if he desisted from opposing the passing of the Mutiny Bill, he would be prepared, when the question again came before the House, to divide with him against every lash.

MR. MITCHELL HENRY said, he never regretted until now that there was not a verbatim report of everything which was said in that House. He would only add that he was not one who changed his opinions easily, or who was in the habit of expressing opinions diametrically opposed to one another. He, as a matter of fact, never had entertained the opinion which his hon. Friend attributed to him; nor did he entertain it at the present moment. His hon. Friend must, he could not help thinking, have misunderstood what he said, or he must have expressed himself so unfortunately as not to have made his views clear to him.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 239; Noes 56: Majority 183.—(Div. List, No. 104.)

Mr. Mitchell Henry

MR. RYLANDS said, he would move that Progress be reported, on the sufficient ground that he had an important Amendment to move upon the next Order on the Paper—namely, the Report of Supply. It was altogether out of the question to take the Report of Supply at the very end of a Morning Sitting. There were a number of Amendments to the clause of the Bill under discussion, and there was no chance of getting through them all at that time. It could not, therefore, interfere with the Business on hand, if the Government agreed to report Progress.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."—(Mr. Rylands.)

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON found it would be impossible to take the Report of Supply, if any discussion was to be raised as indicated by the hon. Member for Burnley (Mr. Rylands).

MR. RYLANDS said, if the hon. Gentleman would give a promise that the Report should be taken at a convenient hour in the evening, he should be willing to withdraw his Motion.

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON said, he should propose to take the Report of Supply on Thursday.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON pointed out that the punishment of reduction to the ranks of a non-commissioned officer was omitted from the clause; but that in Clause 173 it was mentioned as a punishment to be given by the commanding officer. It was his opinion that this power was likely to be greatly abused, and he was at a loss to understand from what source the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War obtained the information which induced him to omit this punishment from its proper place in the Bill, where it was subject to court martial. It certainly did not come from the Select Committee, who generally had to bear the burden of all the changes which had been made in the measure. He would move, after line 7, the insertion of the words, "reduction to the rank of private soldier."

COLONEL STANLEY could not see any advantage in the insertion of the words proposed at that stage of the Bill. If the words were added, he thought objections of the same kind would have to be taken to various other clauses of the Bill, where the punishments referred to under this section were included. He suggested that the point should be dealt with when they came to Clause 173; of course, with the understanding, if necessary, that these matters should be brought into closer harmony on Report.

SIR HENRY HAVELOCK thought that the proper place for the introduction of the words of the Amendment was in the present clause, and it appeared to him that if they were not inserted at that point, the opportunity of doing so would be lost. He thought that the reference to the punishment of reduction to the ranks by order of the commanding officer had been made in Clause 173 under a total misapprehension of certain views urged by the hon. and gallant Member for Galway (Major Nolan). He entirely concurred in the proposal of the hon. and gallant Gentleman (Sir Alexander Gordon) to introduce at this place a recognition of the principle that a non-commissioned officer should not be reduced to the ranks, except by court martial.

COLONEL STANLEY did not object to the insertion of the words in principle; but was not certain as to whether they must be considered in reference to other parts of the Bill.

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON could not understand why the great power given to the commanding officer to reduce non-commissioned officers to the ranks had been placed among the definitions in Clause 173. He should certainly divide the Committee upon his Amendment.

MR. RYLANDS hoped the hon. and gallant Member (Sir Alexander Gordon) would persist in his Amendment. He considered Clause 173 a most objectionable one; and when it was reached, he hoped the Committee would look to the particular point in question, and oppose the clause as strongly as possible.

Amendment agreed to; words inserted accordingly.

And, it being ten minutes before Seven of the clock, the Chairman reported Progress; Committee to sit again upon Thursday.

CUSTOMS AND INLAND REVENUE BILL.

(Mr. Raikes, Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Sir Henry Selwin-Ibbetson.)

[BILL 150.] COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

Resolution [5th May], read as followeth :—

“That it is expedient to amend the Laws relating to the Customs and Inland Revenue.”

Instruction to the Committee on the Customs and Inland Revenue Bill, That they have power to make provision therein pursuant to the said Resolution.

Bill considered in Committee.

Committee report Progress; to sit again upon Thursday.

The House suspended its Sitting at Seven of the clock.

The House resumed its Sitting at Nine of the clock.

Notice taken, that 40 Members were not present; House counted, and 40 Members being found present,

MOTIONS.

PROBATE, LEGACY, AND SUCCESSION DUTIES.—RESOLUTION.

Mr. DODDS*, in rising to call attention to the Probate, Legacy, and Succession Duties, and to move—

“That, in the opinion of this House, it is expedient that in lieu of Probate and Administration Duty, which is now payable according to unequal rates, upon the personal estate of deceased persons, and in lieu of Legacy Duty, which is now payable at various rates and various times in respect of each separate gift by will, and each separate share of an intestate's estate, one Duty only should be levied, at a uniform rate, upon the value of the personal estate of every deceased person,”

said: Mr. Speaker,—Sir, I have ventured to give Notice of the Resolution which it is my intention to move on the present occasion, because, during a somewhat lengthened professional experience, I have had constant opportunities of witnessing the absolute injustice in many cases, the great hardship, expense, and inconvenience in almost every case, occasioned by the present anomalous system of levying the probate, administration, and legacy duties upon the estates of deceased persons. During last Session, my hon. Friend the Member for Forfarshire (Mr. J. W. Barclay) submitted a Motion to the House, to the effect that the present system of taxing succession to property is partial and unjust, and, in the opinion of this House, ought to be re-adjusted. Sir, in much of what was then advanced by my hon. Friend I entirely concur; but he dealt with the subject on more general grounds than I propose to do on the present occasion. My wish is to point out the anomalies, intricacies, and difficulties of the existing system of taxing personal property under the Probate and Legacy Duty Acts, and to show how these may be entirely averted by a simple combined duty, with advantage alike to the public Exchequer and to the taxpayer. In many respects, the arguments of the hon. Member last Session resembled those used in 1853, when the late Mr. Williams, then Member for Southwark, proposed that real property should be made to pay the same probate and legacy duties as are now payable in respect of personal property. The Amendment of which my right hon. Friend the Member for the Montrose Burghs (Mr. W. E. Baxter) has given Notice to-night—namely, proceeds very much in the same direction. Now, Sir, I do not propose to touch the great question raised by my right hon. Friend's Amendment. The question whether or not real and personal property should be placed upon the same footing is one of great importance; but it is also one upon which there is great diversity of opinion in this House, and I will merely at the present time say with reference to it, that the scheme I am about to propound will apply equally to any charge it may hereafter be determined to levy upon real estate as to the probate and legacy duties which are now charged only upon personal estate. Nor do I, Sir, propose to discuss on this occasion the succession duties, or to deal with them further than as they affect leasehold property; but, of course, any argument relative to the duties on legacies would be equally applicable to duties on succession, should Parliament at any future time determine to place them upon the same footing. And now, Sir, in the first place, I desire to call the attention of the House to the probate duty. The history of a tax is more or less important when the incidence of that tax is under consideration; and the history of the probate duty forms no exception to that rule; but, on the contrary, appears to afford an apt illustration of it. The stamp upon probates and letters of administration was first imposed in 1694 by an Act of 5 & 6 William and Mary, c. 21. By that Act a sum of 5*s.* was payable throughout England, Wales, and Berwick-on-Tweed upon every skin, or piece of vellum, or parchment, or sheet or piece of paper upon which any probate of will or letters of administration for any estate above the value of £20, should be engrossed. In 1698 this duty was increased to 10*s.*, and was made perpetual by the Act of 9 & 10 Will. III. At that amount the tax remained until the year 1779—a period of 85 years from its first imposition. In this year the 19 Geo. III., c. 66, imposed throughout Great Britain an additional duty of 20*s.* for estates of or above the value of £100, and 40*s.* for estates of £300 and upwards, thus making the total duty in each case 30*s.* and 50*s.* respectively, and introducing for the first time an ascending scale. Further additional duties were imposed, and the limits of the ascending scale were extended by various subsequent Acts—one in 1783, by which the scale was increased to £1,000; another in 1789, whereby it was increased to £5,000; and a third in 1797, whereby it was increased to £10,000. In 1804, by the 44 Geo. III., an end was put to the existing system in England; the duties previously levied were repealed; and one uniform rate of duty, ascending by scale as high as to estates of £500,000, was imposed upon probates and letters of administration in England, and upon testament, testamentor, testament dative, or eik thereto, which I understand to mean probates or grants of administration respectively in Scotland. In 1774, a stamp duty of 5*s.* on any grant of probate or administration was imposed in Ireland by an Act of the Irish Parliament; and in 1844 the English rates of probate and administration duties were extended to Ireland, and were made permanent in that country in 1853. Up to 1815 no distinction was made in the duties payable in respect of grants of probate under will, or letters of administration of intestates' effects; but in that year the Act of 55 Geo. III., which may emphatically be termed the Probate and Legacy Duty Act, repealed all existing probate and administration duties as from the 31st August in that year, and imposed one complete scale of duty in respect of probates in England and inventories of testament testamentor in Scotland, and the duties were made to extend to estates of the value of £1,000,000 and upwards. It likewise imposed another scale of duty upon letters of administration, 50 per cent more in amount than upon probates, or in the proportion of three to two; and, in like manner, these additional duties were imposed upon confirmations of testament dative, practically grants of administration, in Scotland. These duties so imposed in 1815 still remain unchanged, except that, in cases where the whole value of the estate amounts to £1,000,000 or upwards, which was previously the limit of the ascending scale, an Act, passed in 1859, imposed for every additional £100,000, a further duty of £1,500 upon probates, and £2,250 letters of administration, and except, also, that in 1864 an Act was passed exempting altogether from these duties estates between £20—which was the previous limit—and £100. Now, Sir, it is not a little remarkable that when these duties were imposed in their present form, the then Chancellor of the Exchequer, Mr. Vansittart (afterwards Lord Bexley), proposed them as taxes which would soon undergo Parliamentary investigation with a view to their re-arrangement. The language then used was most remarkable, and with the permission of the House I should like to read the whole of Mr. Vansittart's observations, which, by the way, are very short. He said—

“That Probate, Legacy, and Succession Duties upon real estate should be placed on the same footing as real estate,”

“The next subject was the duty on probates; and as it had been considered a hardship that it should operate on the whole of the effects of the deceased instead of on the balance after the debts were paid, he intended to propose a drawback to remedy this grievance for the present, although he felt that this subject was one which must soon undergo Parliamentary investigation with a view to a general arrangement of it.”

Hansard's Debates gives us no further information of the views of the Chancellor of the Exchequer than those I have quoted. Now, Sir, it appears to me that the legacy duties imposed at the time, and under the circumstances I have mentioned, contain a great many very glaring anomalies; but there are three to which I desire especially to call the attention of the House. The first is that the duty is charged at a higher rate on small estates than on large estates; and, second, that it is levied on groups of estates between certain amounts, and not by an equal percentage; and the third is that intestate estates are charged at a higher rate by 50 per cent than testate estates. Now, as to the first of these anomalies, the fact is proved by a glance at the table of duties imposed by the Act of 1815. I will only trouble the House with one or two illustrations from that scale. An estate of £200, for instance, under a will, is charged with probate duty amounting to £5, and in the case of an intestacy, an administration duty of £8, being rates of $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent, and 4 per cent respectively. An estate of £1,000 under a will pays probate duty of £30, under an intestacy administration duty of £45, being respectively 3 per cent, and $4\frac{1}{2}$ per cent, and these are the highest rates imposed by the scale. A testate estate of £2,000 pays £50, an intestate estate £75, or $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent and $3\frac{1}{2}$ per cent respectively; whilst an estate of £30,000 pays a probate duty of £450, or administration duty of £675, being $1\frac{1}{2}$ per cent and $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent respectively, and all estates of a higher amount pay at these rates. The effect of this scale may be very briefly illustrated by reference to estates of the value of £1,000. Thirty estates of £1,000 each, making £30,000, pay, in the case of wills, probate duty amounting in the aggregate to £900; in the case of intestacies, administration duties amount to £1,350, or 3 and $4\frac{1}{2}$ per cent respectively; whilst a single estate of the same amount, £30,000, pays only £450 probate duty, or £675 administration duty, or $1\frac{1}{2}$ per cent and $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent respectively, or exactly half the rates which the smaller estates pay. Now, Sir, I submit that a principle which leads to such results is altogether radically wrong, and opposed to every principle of common justice and sound legislation. Inequality in either direction would be objectionable; but when it happens that the higher rate is charged on the smaller and poorer estate, and the lower on the larger and richer estate, instead of levying a uniform rate upon all, it becomes additionally objectionable. I come next, Sir, to the second anomaly—namely, that the tax is levied in groups, and not by an equal percentage. I will again illustrate the effect of this by a few references to the tables of duties attached to the Act of 1815. The first amount in that scale is charged upon estates of £100 and under £200. Go a little higher in the scale, and we find the step is from £2,000 to £3,000. Again ascending a little higher, it passes from £100,000 to £120,000, then from £400,000 to £500,000, and so on, the steps in each case on large estates being steps of £100,000. Now, what is the result of this? Why, simply that whilst an estate of £100, which, where there is a will, pays probate duty of £2, and where there is no will, administration duty of £3, very considerable portions of every large estate, it may be to nearly 1,000 times the amount of the small estate of £100, altogether escape taxation. Take, for instance, the various sums I have mentioned. Thus, an estate under £3,000 pays duty upon £2,000 only, and £990 may altogether escape; an estate under £35,000 pays duty upon £30,000 only, and £4,990 may possibly escape; an estate under £120,000 only pays duty on £100,000, and thus £19,990 may escape; whilst an estate under £500,000 in value only pays upon £400,000, and so £99,999 19s. 11d. may entirely escape payment of duty; or, as I have already said, nearly 1,000 times more than the smallest estate upon which duty is payable. The same remark applies to every estate exceeding £400,000 in value. Can this system, Sir, I ask, be defended for a single moment? Will any hon. Gentleman in this House venture to stand up in his place and endeavour to justify it? Will the House desire that a system which produces such results as these should be perpetuated, especially when, as I hope to be able to show conclusively, it can be so easily avoided? I venture to think not. I now come, Sir, to the third anomaly to which I have referred—namely, that intestate estates are charged a higher duty by 50 per cent than testate estates. Now, Sir, for more than 120 years, from the first imposition of this tax in 1694—namely, down to 1815—no such distinction existed. It seems to have been drawn at that time without the least reason, so far as I have been able to discover, being assigned for the imposition of the increased tax by Mr. Vansittart. At all events, no record of any reason is to be found in the pages of Hansard. The distinction simply means that if a man makes no will his estate is subject to a tax of 50 per cent in excess of what it would have been subject to had he so made a will. Why, I venture to ask, is such a state of things allowed at the present time? Some persons entertain a very strong objection to making a will at all, and in my own experience it has often happened that persons have been induced to make a will solely on account of its being represented to them that if they did not do so their estates would be subjected to the payment of increased duty, and with no other object whatever. Very frequently no harm at all arises from the omission to make a will where the estate consists merely of personal property. The Statutes for the distribution of the estates of intestates effect a very reasonable and fair distribution, and one which I have seldom heard complained of; and if there were any just ground of complaint, the law might easily make any needful alterations. The mischief of intestacy arises where there is real property, and where, as not unfrequently happens, an infant succeeds to the entire property, to the exclusion of brothers and sisters, who, sharing only in the personalty, have to bear the increased taxation; whereas this penal tax, as I venture to designate the administration duty, does not touch real estate at all, inasmuch as the tax only applies to personal property. An eminent professional friend of mine, whose opinions I hope we shall hear before the close of this debate, said to me a few days ago—"A man who neglects to make a will should be made to pay for it." Why, Sir, this is exactly what does not occur. The man who neglects to make a will has gone to heaven, and, so far from his being made to pay the additional tax, it not unfrequently falls upon innocent persons, and, worst of all, on those who suffer most by intestacy—namely, the younger children who by it have lost any real property, and have thus increased burthens cast upon the personal estate, in which alone they participate. Now, Sir, my contention is that the power to make a will is a privilege conferred by the laws of this country, wherein our laws differ from those of many foreign countries; and, in my opinion, if a higher duty is to be imposed in one case or the other, it would be more reasonable to charge the higher duty upon probates where the testator has exercised the power the law has given him than in the case of intestacy, where he has not so availed himself of the privilege. Another reason I have heard assigned for this increased duty is that the Court of Probate appoints the administrator, whilst the executor is appointed by the testator himself. But, Sir, this makes no practical difference whatever. The Court assumes no additional duty in the case of an intestacy, except that it requires the person who is entitled to and obtains the grant of administration to enter into an administration bond, with two sufficient sureties; besides which it is to be remarked that when executors die in the lifetime of the testator, or, as occasionally happens, when they refuse to act, and the Court is called upon to grant administration with the will annexed, probate duty only is imposed, and not the higher duty, which, according to some, is imposed in consequence of the appointment of an administrator being made by the Court. This reason, therefore, cannot for a moment be maintained. Now, Sir, another great objection to this tax is that the higher duty on letters of administration presses very heavily upon the poorer classes, for it is amongst these, for the most part, that intestacies occur. The statistics of Somerset House show that, in estates under £300, about one-third are cases of intestacies, and two-thirds of wills; whilst in estates of upwards of £1,000 only one-twelfth are intestacies. Now, Sir, neither in the Parliamentary History of the Records of this House, nor in Hansard, have I been able to find any single reason why this distinction was originally made, and I shall be very curious to hear whether any reason whatever can be advanced for a state of things which I consider is anomalous, and which, in my opinion, ought not to be longer continued. Now, on account of these great and, as I venture to think, indefensible anomalies, and for very many other reasons which I could adduce did time permit, I submit that the probate and administration duties demand and ought to be reformed. But, Sir, I am able to cite some very high authorities in support of the opinion I have thus ventured to express. I have already quoted the opinion of Lord Bexley, expressed when the Act of 1815 was passed, and I now beg to refer to an authority which I am sure will command the respect of hon. Members on the other side—that of the noble Lord the present Prime Minister. In December, 1852, when the noble Lord introduced his annual Financial Statement in this House, he is reported to have made the following observations:—

Mr. Dodds

“The late Government had not neglected carefully to examine the question of the Stamp and Probate Duties, and they thought it not impossible to bring forward, on the right occasion, a duty that would reconcile contending interests, and terminate the system so much complained of.”

I would also beg leave to refer to an authority which I venture to think is the highest authority in the land on financial matters, an authority which will be generally admitted, I think, on both sides of the House—I mean that of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich. When he introduced his Budget in the month of April, 1853, he made the following remarks on this subject:—

“With respect to the probate duty, at the present moment we do not venture to deal with it. The probate duty itself, I grant you, calls for reform; and if the Government had the means of carrying into effect that reform in the present year, it would have been satisfactory to have done so. As it is, we are obliged at present to postpone it; but we hope that in a future and early year it will come under consideration.”—[3 Hansard, cxxv. 1395.]

Now, Sir, notwithstanding Lord Bexley's opinion in 1815, and notwithstanding these authoritative opinions expressed upwards of 25 years ago, not one single step has been taken in the direction of reforming this tax. It is true, I referred in a somewhat perfunctory way to the subject when the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer introduced his Financial Statement last year, and again during the present year, and the subject was introduced by my hon. Friend the Member for Forfarshire, as I have already mentioned, but nothing else has been done. I think my hon. Friend proved, on that occasion, the necessity for a reform of this tax. The hon. Baronet the Secretary to the Treasury replied for the Government; and after referring to the question of the relative taxation upon real and personal estates, which, as I have already explained, I do not on the present occasion propose to touch, he said—“With respect to the duties on small estates compared with large ones, it was worthy of consideration how far they might be equalized. If any inducement could be wanted, it would be the bait thrown out that a re-adjustment would produce an increase of £4,000,000 to the Revenue. The question as to the difference made between properties of large amount and others of small amount really did require consideration. The subject ought not, however, to be dealt with hurriedly, or by a Resolution of that kind, which he could not support.” Well, Sir, I do not wish the subject to be dealt with hurriedly; but if I am right in saying that the existing system is, as I contend and as I think I have shown it is, unequal and unjust; and if it exempts, as I think I have shown it does, large estates to a considerable extent, and taxes small ones much more heavily; and if this state of things now exists, as I have endeavoured to show it has since 1815, long before most hon. Gentlemen in this House were born; if the necessity for reform has been admitted by the Leaders on both sides of the House since the year 1853; then I think the time has arrived when reform should be no longer delayed, and I hope the House will, by adopting my Resolution to-night, emphatically assert this, and declare that for the purpose of remedying injustice no time can be more opportune than the present. I now pass to the other branch of my subject—namely, the question of legacy duties. Legacy duty was first imposed in 1780 by the 20 Geo. III. c. 28. This was at first nothing more than a stamp duty upon a receipt given by a beneficiary in respect of personal estate under a will or intestacy. It had not been long in operation before it was discovered by one of the Judges that it was not a tax upon the legacy, but merely upon the receipt, and that where no receipt was given no duty was payable. In 1783 and in 1789 respectively, the amount of duty was increased; but the interest of a wife, children, and grandchildren was exempted from the additional duties imposed in these years, and the principle of taxation remained otherwise unaltered. The rate of duty was regulated by the amount of legacy. For legacies not exceeding £20 two stamps of 2s. 6d. each were required; for legacies above £20 and under £100 two stamps of 5s. each; and so on. In 1796, however, the liability to duty was transferred from the receipts to the benefit itself. This Act is an important one, because it introduced, for the first time in the history of the tax, rates of duty varying according to the degree of consanguinity existing between the deceased and the legatee or next of kin. It does not contain any provision for taxing lineal ancestors or lineal descendants, and it expressly exempts the husband and wife of the deceased from payment of any duty. In the first Act—that of 1780—there were no exemptions on account of relationship. The second and third Acts of 1783 and 1789 exempted the wife, children, and grandchildren from the increased duty, but not from the duty originally imposed in 1780. In the Act of 1789 lineal ancestors and the husband were added to the privileged classes, and they were exempted as well as the wife and the lineal descendants from duty. In 1805, children, or descendants of children, were again brought under the tax; and in 1815, by the Act to which I have already referred in connection with the probate duties, the duty was extended to the father or mother or any lineal ancestor, the wife or husband, as before, being exempted from the duty. When these various rates were first introduced they were upon a much smaller scale than at present. Brothers or sisters were charged 2 per cent, brothers or sisters of the father or mother of the deceased or their descendants 3 per cent, brothers or sisters of the grandfather or grandmother and their descendants 4 per cent, other relatives or strangers 6 per cent. In 1804, when lineal descendants were subjected to a tax of 1 per cent, the other rates were increased to 2½, 4, 5, and 8 per cent respectively; and in 1815, the tax upon lineal descendants and lineal ancestors being then fixed at 1 per cent, the other rates were increased to 3, 5, 6, and 10 per cent respectively, husband and wife remaining exempt. At these rates, and subject to the same exemptions, the duties have ever since been, and still are levied. I would here remark, Sir, that these were essentially war taxes, having been first imposed in 1796 by Mr. Pitt at a time when this country was engaged in that costly war with France which rendered it necessary for Mr. Pitt to treble the assessed taxes, and to increase the burdens of the people in various directions; but it is not a little remarkable that, whilst every other tax has since been repealed or reduced, and in many instances entirely abolished, these legacy duties, imposed in 1815, have remained unchanged. The incidence of this tax contains many anomalies. In the first place, the duty is payable when the benefit is paid to or retained for the legatee or beneficiary; it attaches to all personal estate of any deceased person domiciled here, wherever the property may be situate. Thus, personal property situate in Australia is subject to duty here; but, on the other hand, personal estate in this country, belonging to a foreigner domiciled abroad, entirely escapes the duty. Simple as this tax would appear to be from the description I have given of it, I hope by a very few remarks to show that it is in reality quite the contrary. In its present incidence I submit that it altogether falls short of what may be termed a good tax—that is, a tax levied upon sound principles, and principles that are generally accepted. I do not profess to be an authority upon the principles of taxation; but I venture to submit that there are a few general principles which ought to distinguish all taxes, and amongst these I may mention the following:—First, that they shall fall equally on all according to their means; second, that all taxes ought to be certain and not arbitrary; third, that they shall be levied in the most convenient way; and fourthly, and lastly, that they shall take out of the pockets of the people as little as possible beyond what they bring into the coffers of the State. I think, Sir, it will be generally admitted that that system of taxation is best which most nearly conforms to the principles I have mentioned. In its inception very little fault could be found with the legacy duty when tested by these principles—it was, as nearly as possible, a money payment over the counter, and nothing more; it was a stamp upon the receipt levied upon every subject without distinction according to his means. All this is now totally changed—the rates of duty regulated by consanguinity have destroyed the equality of the tax, and have imposed a grievous expense upon the taxpayer. To satisfy the tax as it now stands, the taxpayer has, in a great majority of cases, to resort to legal advice in the preparation of his accounts and receipts. Most hon. Members have probably received those printed instructions from Somerset House which are addressed to executors, and comprised in three closely-printed pages of miniature type, and have, I dare say, very often endeavoured in vain to comprehend all the details of them. In scarcely any case can the duty be satisfied by one payment; in innumerable cases it becomes payable many years after the death of the testator, and has to be levied from the representatives of the persons who were originally responsible. There is no limit of time within which the duty need be claimed, and the liability exists whether application be made for payment or not. The variety of circumstances under which payments are to be made are almost infinite—there is a payment to be made on a determinable interest, such as an annuity; there is a payment to be paid, year by year, on an interest not capable of being accurately measured; payment on the capital of a fund now, and another payment on the same account hereafter. There may be bequests—and these are very common cases indeed—of furniture, more or less ancient in its character, to a young widow, say of 20, for her life. Legacy duty becomes payable upon these at her death, which may be when she has attained the venerable age of 90. In like manner, there may be a bequest of income, say upon £1,000, to the widow for life. It is exempt from duty during her life; then, possibly, the interest passes to a son of the testator for his life, duty is now to be assessed and paid at the rate of 1 per cent. At the son's death, the interest goes, probably, to a nephew for his life; the process of assessment and payment of duty, now at 3 per cent, is again to be gone through. Then, at the death of the nephew, the interest may again pass to a more distant relative, when the duty is again to be assessed, and paid, this time, at the rate of 6 per cent. Finally, the surplus of the fund, it may be 50 or 60 years afterwards, passes to a stranger, or more distant relative, when duty becomes payable upon it absolutely. Now, Sir, this last-mentioned case is a very common one, and I would point out to the House that there may be many such under one and the same will; indeed, I have known many such under one will in my own experience. Now, let the House consider the cost of all this. I have no hesitation whatever in saying that in small bequests of this kind the aggregate cost to the State of the clerks employed in recording these bequests, and in assessing and collecting the duty, and the cost incurred by the taxpayer in obtaining the assessment and paying the duty, amounts to a sum larger in the aggregate than the whole of the duty paid to the State. I am sure every gentleman of the legal Profession, and, indeed, probably almost every Gentleman in this House, must know from experience that there is an almost infinite variety of circumstances under which an infinite variety of assessments and payments of duty are to be made, and an almost endless variety of cases where a man avails himself of the power which the law confers upon him, of making a settlement by his will, and thereby escapes the higher administration duty, and does not leave the law to make his will for him. How few men are there who have not, at some time, been surprised to find, through an application from the Legacy Duty Department of the Inland Revenue Office, that they are liable for duties which ought to have been paid long years before. A claim may be now first brought under their notice which has been entered in the Inland Revenue Register so long ago as 1815; the duty claimed may have become due in 1855, and thus may be demanded 25 years after; the liable party may be the executor of some representative of the deceased, and not unfrequently it occurs that the unfortunate recipient of this notice, having no funds of the trust, has to pay the duty out of his own pocket. These cases are well known in my own professional experience, and were the risk the executors run in this respect generally known, few persons would be found willing to undertake the duties of a trustee. The legacy duty, I contend, as now levied, is a most costly one to the taxpayer, and it is equally costly to the State to collect. A large and increasing staff is kept in the Legacy Duty Department—it appears from the Civil Service Estimates for the present year, that there are nearly 150 officials in that Department, and that the cost to the nation is from £40,000 to £50,000 a-year. I was for some years in the habit of attending personally at Somerset House for the purpose of passing difficult and intricate accounts, and I am able to speak with experience of the character of the staff in the Legacy Duty Department; and I have no hesitation in saying that from Mr. Hanson, the intelligent, efficient, and courteous Controller downwards, and especially amongst the gentlemen immediately under him, there is an amount of intelligence, attention, and courtesy which justifies me in saying that the Crown does not possess a more trustworthy and valuable set of civil servants than those in the Legacy Duty Department. The examination of accounts of a most complicated and difficult character, the determining of intricate and important legal questions devolves upon them; and, besides, they have to cope with the constant attempts that are made to evade payment of the higher duties. Opportunities for this evasion frequently occur, and are only prevented by the intelligence of those to whom this duty is assigned. Then the unfortunate taxpayer has to render residuary accounts, frequently of very complicated character, as well as legacy and other receipts, which are, in fact, now almost accounts in themselves. Then this large and complicated system has to be controlled; and if hon. Gentlemen have ever been to Somerset House, they will be able to form some conception of the magnitude of the Department and complexity of the system. In my own case, in moving for a Return for the purposes of the present Motion, a communication was sent to me by the hon. Baronet the Secretary to the Treasury from the Chairman of Inland Revenue, wherein he stated that to supply the information for which I had asked would entail a search through every register from 1805 to 1879, and that there were 64 registers for every year—in short, there were something like 5,000 volumes to be searched. Now, let the House consider the fruitful source of complaint and vexation and annoyance to the taxpayer which must result from such state of things. These, as years roll on, must be ever increasing in volume and magnitude, and the difficulty of dealing with them must daily increase. Letters are constantly appearing in the newspapers complaining of the system, and, with the permission of the House, I should like to read a short extract from the Report of the Commissioners of Inland Revenue, presented to the House in 1870—

Mr. Dodds

Mr. Dodds

“With respect to the reversionary and contingent legacies, it appeared to have been the custom to send out notices to executors and other accountable persons at the end of 10 years, and it was suggested that this should be done in future at the end of five years after the first inquiry, and so on continuously every five years until the cases were exhausted.”

The Report proceeds to say—

“But another very important work has been going on. Apart from the review of the books at periods of five years which has been adopted, a number of experienced clerks have been employed in reviewing the old books, commencing with 1812, for the purpose of clearing the registers. We may give, as an example of this work, the year 1814, which has been worked through. There were in the books of this year 242 open accounts; of these some have been cleared by payment of duty, others have been discharged as altogether irrecoverable, and the result is, that there remains 21 cases, and no more, which, being still reversionary, will require further operations. In all the other cases, the executors or their representatives will be set free from the often-repeated but fruitless applications with which they were being periodically disturbed under the old system, and it is hoped that all reasonable ground of complaint will be removed.”

I think, Sir, I need not say more in condemnation of the system which necessitates such a state of things as that just described. Then, Sir, another great objection I have to the legacy duty as now levied is that it is inquisitorial in its character, and that in the very worst sense. It is absolutely necessary to make frequent inquiries, or the duty would be forgotten or altogether lost, as it nevertheless very often is. Is it a rational thing that a husband should be receiving letters continually, asking if his wife is alive, and if not, when she died? Is it a rational thing that a child should be inquired of in a similar manner about his father, or a father about his child? And yet all these are evils necessarily attendant upon the existing system, or the Revenue would be defrauded to a much greater extent than it is at present, and the question of duty overlooked. Is this a tax, I would ask the House, which ought to be maintained in its present form on any other ground than necessity, or unless that necessity cannot by some means be averted? Then, another objection to the legacy duty is that it is so nearly allied to the probate duty. Probate duty is barely paid before the taxpayer is reminded by the missives from Somerset House, to which I have already referred, that legacy duty is also to be paid. The taxpayer, in many cases, not unnaturally thinks that a double tax is being imposed upon him, and that, having paid probate duty, legacy duty should not be demanded. Both should, in my opinion, be reformed out of existence, and one simple amalgamated tax levied in substitution for them. There are two obstacles, and only two at present, in the way of this amalgamation, and these are the difference between the probate and administration duties, to which I have fully referred, and the consanguinity rates, to which I have also just called attention. Neither of these anomalies are indigenous to the respective taxes—in each case the tax was imposed without these anomalies. The varying rates were first imposed, as I have shown, at a recent period; and in the absence of any information as to the grounds upon which they were imposed, I think it may be fairly assumed that the necessities of the Chancellor of the Exchequer of that day—Mr. Pitt—influenced him. The tax seemed capable of increasing to meet the requirements of the times without offending anyone. The principle upon which it seems to have been imposed was that of expediency. No one objected probably then, and probably no one would object now, to receive a heavy legacy, perhaps unexpectedly, from a distant relative or from a stranger, merely saddled with the responsibility of paying 10 per cent duty on it. A close examination, I think, Sir, of the various changes that have been made in the legacy duties clearly shows the spirit in which these varying rates have been imposed; but I think the House will agree with me that an unsound principle cannot be rendered sound, or an unjust tax made a just one, because it was found expedient during the time of our Continental Wars to levy it. The consanguinity rates occasion many anomalies. The child of the millionaire pays 1 per cent—the orphan nephew of a struggling mechanic is called upon to pay 3 per cent; aunts and uncles are charged 10 per cent upon bequests from nephews and nieces—nephews and nieces pay 3 per cent upon what they receive from uncles. An adopted child, or aged dependent, pays 10 per cent, whilst a wealthy father succeeds to a son, or vice versa, and pays 1 per cent. A man leaves property to his wife's relatives, and they pay 10 per cent—another man takes a bequest from his wife's relatives, and pays at the rate of 1 per cent. A man's wife's sister is his sister-in-law, and, as we know from frequent debates in this House, he cannot legally marry her. Notwithstanding this, we know that the law is frequently disregarded, and when the husband dies, the widow, his second wife is charged 10 per cent upon the property she acquires from him. On the other hand, the wife—the sister-in-law dies, and the husband pays duty on her property at 3 per cent only. A man gives to his father's widow—his stepmother—a legacy, and she is subjected to 1 per cent duty—a stepmother gives a legacy to her stepson, and he is subjected to a duty of 10 per cent. Two sisters may take legacies out of the same fund, and payable at the same time, and one becomes subjected to 3 per cent, and the other to 10 per cent legacy duty. Thus, a testator gives his personal estate to his widow for life, and, at her death, one-half to one of his nieces, and the other half as his widow may appoint. The widow appoints accordingly to the other niece of the testator, the sister of the legatee—the one sister pays 10 per cent, the other 3 per cent. Can any good reason be assigned for any one of these anomalies? Is it rational that such an anomalous system should be permitted to continue? And these, Sir, are but a few examples. I could multiply them almost indefinitely; but these are sufficient to illustrate the absurdities and vagaries of the existing law, and the desirability of its being radically reformed. There is another and more painful aspect in which the consanguinity rates of legacy duty must be noticed. I refer to that connected with illegitimacy. How many are there of both sexes, who have attained manhood and womanhood, and probably would have descended to the grave in that happy ignorance which in such cases may surely be said to be bliss, but for this inquisitorial tax? Nearly everyone knows in his own experience of at least one such case. In my experience, I regret to say, I have known several. Many years ago, two ladies, who had attained womanhood, the daughters of a leading retired surgeon, were told by their professional adviser that they must pay 10 per cent legacy duty upon their father's estate. They were, in the first place, incredulous; afterwards, indignant. Of course, the duty was paid eventually, but they ceased to employ their old and trusted professional adviser; and the knowledge that they had just acquired embittered their remaining days and hastened their deaths, which occurred soon afterwards. Another case, was that of a married woman, who was supposed to be the legitimate child of her father, but who, upon his death, had the unwelcome truth forced upon herself and her husband, and the result did not contribute to their future happiness. Since my Notice appeared upon the Order Book of the House, I have received a short communication from a sufferer, which I will take the liberty of reading. It is in these terms:—

Mr. Dodds

"Sir,—I am glad to find from the newspapers that you are going to bring forward the legacy and probate duty question. I was, I consider, unjustly charged with 10 per cent duty, when my father died, whilst my brothers and sisters were charged 1 per cent only. I have been discarded and insulted by them ever since they became aware of my illegitimacy, which only became known to them since my father's death. I hope some good change will be done by you as to this unjust duty.—Yours, &c., A SUFFERER. P.S.—I hear the law of Scotland is different after the parents are married."

Now, Sir, I could multiply cases of this kind; but I will content myself with this general observation, that the unfortunate results to which I have referred are attributable, solely and entirely, to the consanguinity rates upon legacies, and that these cases afford, in my opinion, a strong additional reason for their total and entire abolition. One peculiar feature of the consanguinity rates is, that they exist only with respect to the legacy duties, and their sister rate, the tax upon successions. If the principle involved in these rates is right it ought to be extended. A man upon the marriage of two children—one legitimate and the other illegitimate—makes a settlement upon both. Each is subject to the same rate of stamp duty; if he dies, both are subject to the same rate of probate or administration duty; but when a stage further is reached, and the legacy duty is payable, then one pays 1 per cent, and the other 10 per cent. Conveyances are dealt with in the same way precisely. Everything, in short, that is subject to stamp duty is assessed upon equal rates, regardless of consanguinity, except the legacy and succession duties, and these, I submit, ought to follow the general rule, and ought to be charged upon all persons alike. One objection has been advanced to my proposal as to levying a combined duty, and that is, that widows would be brought into the tax; but I would point out to the House that widows are not now exempt as widows, but merely as the widows of donors, and I can see no reason why this exemption should exist even under such circumstances. A widow pays the same probate or administration duty as other persons; she pays the same income tax upon the income of any fund that may be left to her by her husband or anyone else, and why should she not pay the same rate of legacy duty? Moreover, if my suggestion of a combined duty be adopted, it would really not impose any very substantial burden even upon the widow. If the estate be a small one—say £100 in the case of an intestacy—the administration duty is 4½ per cent. The combined duty I propose should be levied is 4 per cent only, and in such a case the widow would be a gainer. In the case of a will she would pay a little additional tax. In the event of a life interest, the additional duty would be very inconsiderable, and the children who succeeded her would, in fact, be gainers. Legacies coming to a widow from any other source than from her own husband are now liable to the ordinary duty; and I would only say, in reference to the exemptions now extended to widows, that exemptions of every kind are, as a rule, bad and indefensible. Looking then, Sir, at all the circumstances of the case, I think the objection as to widows being taxed in future fails equally with the other objections to which I have referred, and I think the legacy duties should be reformed in this as in the other respects to which I have called attention. Well,

Sir, if I have established my premises—namely, that in lieu of probate or administration duty, one uniform charge should be imposed upon the estate of every deceased person, and if the House agrees with me that the differential rates of duty upon benefits under wills or intestacies should be abolished, then I am brought to my third proposition—namely, that these duties should be amalgamated, and that there should be levied one duty only at one uniform rate upon the personal estate of every deceased person. Proposing, as I do, to abolish all the existing probate, administration, and legacy duties, it occurs to me that many modes of supplying their place are practicable and simple. I will, however, sketch one, in order to show how comparatively easy it is to supply the place of what I propose to abolish. In Scotland and in Ireland an inventory is now recorded at the time of taking out probate or administration. I would make such an inventory the basis for the new tax throughout the United Kingdom. Let the inventory be first tendered as an account, either at Somerset House or to an officer appointed by the Commissioners of Inland Revenue at each district registry of the Court of Probate, and let him examine it or compare it with the proper valuations of furniture and other like effects, and with the proper certificates of the value of shares, stocks, &c.; and having satisfied himself of the accuracy of the inventory, let him then certify the amount of duty. Such inventory should, in my opinion, form an integral portion of the probate or letters of administration, and any persons owing moneys to or holding moneys or effects of the deceased should only pay over or deliver the same upon ascertaining that it is included at its proper amount in the certified inventory. A precedent for this principle is to be found in the 47th section of the 48th Geo. III., and it would, in a slightly extended form, apply to a case of this kind. Then the situation of the property ought alone to regulate its liability to duty, and accordingly an estate should not be taxed, as it often is now, both in Australia, for instance, and in this country, upon the same item. In the event of any item being omitted, an eik, or additional inventory, might be recorded, and further stamp duty paid. A slight mistake in the original inventory might be corrected by a certificate of the Commissioners of Inland Revenue upon their being satisfied that the error arose from a mistake. I do not wish, Sir, that by my proposal the amount derived from the probate and legacy duties should either be increased or diminished. My Resolution does not contemplate any direct increase or remission of taxation; but I am satisfied that there would be a great individual gain by reducing the cost necessarily incurred, not merely by the taxpayer, but also by the Exchequer. The cost of collecting the duty would be very much diminished, and the official staff at Somerset House reduced. It appears, as I have already mentioned, that there are nearly 150 officials, at a cost of from £40,000 to £50,000, employed in the Legacy Duty Department at Somerset House. I have no accurate or precise information as to the number of those who are engaged upon the old accounts, and in assessing and collecting the old duties; but I have reason to believe that at least three-fourths of the whole is to be attributed to the old accounts, the whole of which would in time be got rid of. If the present system continues, the expense now being incurred must be perpetually increasing; but, on the other hand, if my system be adopted, the present staff would be required for a time to collect the old duties, and as the present officials retire upon their pensions or superannuated allowances, it would be unnecessary to fill up their vacancies. In this way a considerable saving would eventually be effected. One objection has been alleged to my proposal, and that is, that the change might throw all the duty upon the residuary legatee; but I contend this would not necessarily follow—the testator might either give his own directions, as he now gives directions whether the legacy is to be paid free from duty or not, or the law might itself enact that, as in cases of intestacy, there is a distribution of the intestate estate, so under wills each beneficiary should bear an aliquot share of the original stamp duty. With regard to the mode of collection, my hon. Friend the Member for Forfarshire suggested that the tax should be collected as the legacy duty now is, but that, I submit, would only remove one of the present inconveniences, and would perpetuate delay in collection. Indeed, as regards the probate duty, it would in many cases cause that to be deferred which is now generally paid almost immediately after the testator's death. The objects I have in view are very plain and precise. In the first place, I desire to simplify the present complex system; secondly, to have one equal charge upon all personal property alike; thirdly, to make the payment fixed and certain; and, fourthly, to encourage the payment at an early date and in one sum by an equitable and liberal scale of discount or rebate. Facilities might be given to executors and administrators, who frequently experience difficulty in obtaining the means for paying probate or administration duty. Indeed, it not unfrequently is necessary for the solicitor to advance the amount himself for a time. Now, if the Legacy Duty Department were empowered to issue, with a certificate of the amount of duty payable, an authority for payment of it, either by the Bank of England, where the deceased was possessed of Government Stock or Funds, or by any bank holding money belonging to deceased, or any insurance company, or to anyone in possession of the personal estate of the deceased, the payment would be very greatly facilitated, and an inconvenience now very frequently experienced in practice would be entirely removed. My proposal involves no change of the law other than the repeal of the existing probate and legacy duty rates except one or two trifling ones. First, an alteration of the Succession Duty Act as regards leaseholds, which are now in an anomalous position, being subject to probate duty in the first instance, and to succession duty afterwards. I think these should be made either one or the other, and I would let them revert to the position in which they stood before the Succession Duty Act of 1853, and treat them altogether as personalty and subject to my proposed combined duty. In the next place, it would be necessary to repeal so much of the Act 45 Geo. III. cap. 28. section 4, and thereupon real estate directed to be sold, and legacies charged upon real estate, would fall under the Succession Duty Acts. These two changes would simplify the existing system, and I believe in no other way would my Resolution affect the laws relating to real estate. I do not, as I have already said, advance any plea for remission of taxation. I propose, in fact, that the Chancellor of the Exchequer should realize as much under my proposed system as he would do under the existing system. Now, the probate and legacy duties, taking 1877-8 as a basis—for I have not been able to procure precisely accurate returns for the last year—may, for 1878-9, be estimated at £4,789,724. The capital upon which probate or administration duty was paid in 1878-9 was, roundly, £138,000,000, and duty at 4 per cent upon this sum would produce £5,520,000, showing a surplus over the probate and legacy duties upon the last year of £720,000. Under the existing system the legacy duty upon wills proved during the current year may become payable at any time over the next 50 or 60 years. Should my proposed system be adopted, every tax would be paid once for all; and hence there would be no doubt or suspense, as there is at the present time. I have been unable to procure details of payments of legacy duty during the last two years, distinguishing the amounts paid under old and under recent wills, owing to the cost and delay that would have been occasioned by making such a Return. During the first collection of the combined duty, large sums would still be coming in in respect of legacy duties under old wills, and at a low estimate, in the absence of precise data, I estimate that that would realize at least half the annual sum paid during the preceding year—namely, £1,500,000, and this would continue, although of a gradually diminishing amount, which would form no despicable item in the Budget of Ways and Means for many years to come. Now, Sir, a surplus of £750,000 from the proposed direct tax of 4 per cent, together with £1,500,000 for duties under old wills, would make £2,250,000—a sum which, I venture to think, ought to have some considerable attraction for the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer, especially in these times. There would be no actual addition to the taxation upon the people, but merely a rearrangement of duties, and making immediate instead of deferred payments, for which the taxpayer would have an equivalent in an immense saving of cost and vexation and risk and loss. There are 5,000 voluminous registers, of which we have heard as being at Somerset House, would not be increased, as they necessarily would under the existing system; the staff, also, instead of increasing, would be gradually diminished, and great saving would be effected, economy of collection would be combined with an increased Revenue; and all this would be attended by a certainty of assessment and saving of great expense by the sweeping away of vexatious regulations. There would be no very great increase in the taxation of any class, and even the class paying 1 per cent would not find the amount payable by them very much increased. At present the probate duty varies from $1\frac{1}{2}$ to 3 per cent, and the average may be taken at 2 per cent. Administration duty varies from $2\frac{1}{2}$ to 4 per cent, and the average may be taken at about 3 per cent; so that even the most privileged class, who are now subject to legacy duty at 1 per cent only, pay, including probate duty, 3 per cent, and, including administration duty, about 4 per cent. All other payers of higher rates, as a rule, would gain by what I suggest; and, generally speaking, I cannot doubt that the change would be of the greatest possible advantage alike to the taxpayer and the nation. Another advantage, and it is the only other one I shall venture to mention, is the elasticity of the system I propose, as compared with the existing system. Since 1815 the probate and legacy duties have practically been incapable of expansion or contraction. Under my system they would be capable of increase to meet the exigencies of the State, and I can conceive no reason why, whilst the Income Tax is being increased, some increase should not be made upon the probate and legacy duties. On the other hand, should the good time coming ever arrive when we shall again witness a remission of taxation, then the probate and legacy duties could be diminished in their due proportion. On every ground, I feel that I may safely urge the adoption of my Resolution upon the House, satisfied as I am that it will be to the benefit of all parties. Before I sit down, Sir, I must refer to the Amendments that have been placed upon the Paper. The first is that of my hon. Friend the Member for East Sussex (Mr. Gregory), who proposes to re-consider and revise the progressive rates of probate and administration duty, and to give greater facilities for assessment and settlement of legacy and succession duties upon future or contingent events, and for the relief of executors, administrators, and trustees, in respect of the same. Now, Sir, I venture to think that my hon. Friend will find it impossible so to deal with future or contingent events; and if he goes into the matter fully, I believe he will arrive at the same conclusion that I have, and will find that his object cannot be better effected than by the adoption of the system suggested in my Resolution. Under these circumstances, I confidently hope that I may rely upon having my hon. Friend's support. There only remains the Amendment of my right hon. Friend the Member for Montrose (Mr. Baxter), which he proposes to make to my Resolution. This proposition involves a new principle, upon which, as I have already said, there would be a great diversity of opinion on both sides of the House. My proposition involves no new principle, and, therefore, I am reluctantly compelled to ask my right hon. Friend not to press the addition of which he has given Notice. I merely propose to combine certain existing duties, and I do not think this at all warrants the introduction of the larger question as to the taxation to be imposed upon real estate. I now beg to move, Sir, the Resolution of which I have given Notice.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That, in the opinion of this House, it is expedient that in lieu of Probate and Administration Duty, which is now payable according to unequal rates, upon the personal estate of deceased persons, and in lieu of Legacy Duty, which is now payable at various rates and various times in respect of each separate gift by will, and each separate share of an intestate's estate, one Duty only should be levied, at a uniform rate, upon the value of the personal estate of every deceased person."—(Mr. Dodds.)

MR. J. W. BARCLAY: Sir, my hon. Friend has dealt so exhaustively and so ably with the matter before the House in the speech which he has just delivered, that I shall not detain the House but for a few minutes in supporting the Resolution. I wish especially to call the attention of the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer to how hardly these probate duties fall upon small estates, not only in respect of the large amount of duty charged on these estates, but in the form of legal expenses caused by this duty. A Return placed before this House at the beginning of last Session showed that the total number of estates dealt with during the year 1877-8 was 40,906. Of that number 13,749, or one-third, were estates under £300 each, and the total amount of duty levied on them was £48,831. Now, the average amount of duty paid by these small estates, I find, was almost 2 per cent on the whole. The same Return shows that estates of £30,000 each and upwards paid only something less than $1\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. But to these percentages must be added the charge on the estates caused by the duty. I find that the average sum paid by the estates under £300 was no more than £3 10s. each; but anyone who has any experience of the expenses in such matters, will be of opinion that the legal expenses involved by the payment of this £3 10s. were very likely nearly twice that amount. Therefore, it will be seen that these small estates had to pay 2 per cent probate duty, and further legal expenses of between 2 and 4 per cent in making up the statements required with the payment of the duty. The hon. Member who has just addressed the House has referred to the large expenditure which might be saved at Somerset House if these duties were simplified. I venture to suggest to the Chancellor of the Exchequer, in dealing with this subject, that estates under £300 might be altogether exempted from duty. I venture to think that in so doing the Revenue would suffer very little loss, because, as I have already mentioned, one-third of the whole of the estates consists of the smaller estates under £300, and these must necessarily involve a very large proportion of the work at Somerset House. I think that estates of deceased persons of less than £300 per annum might fairly be considered to correspond with an income of £150 a-year, and ought to be exempted from probate duty, as the small incomes are exempted from Income Tax. For reasons of economy as well as of equality, I hope that the right hon. Gentleman will consider the propriety of exempting estates under £300. I hope that the very able and lucid speech which my hon. Friend has addressed to the House will be productive of a very satisfactory division, should one be necessary, and that the House will, by a large majority, strengthen the hands of the Chancellor of the Exchequer in dealing with this subject in his next year's Budget.

Mr. Dodds

MR. GREGORY, in rising to move, as an Amendment, to leave out from the word "expedient" to the end of the Motion, in order to insert the words—

"To reconsider and revise the progressive rates of Probate and Administration Duty, and to afford greater facilities for the assessment and settlement of Legacy and Succession Duties upon future or contingent events, and for the relief of executors, administrators, and trustees in respect of the same;"

said, he concurred with the hon. Member for Stockton (Mr. Dodds) so far as progressive rates were concerned; they were unequal in their operation, and objectionable in their assessment, large estates paying less in proportion than small ones; but his hon. Friend went further than this, and proposed to assimilate the duties on probates and administrations. He, on the other hand, thought there should be some difference between the two. The making of a will was an imperative duty; and if a man choose to leave his property to the disposition of the law, he did not see why those who benefited by the administration of the law should not pay something for it. With regard to legacies, the proposal of his hon. Friend amounted to this—he would equalize the duties on all legacies, and charge the whole duty on the general estate. All parties were to be assessed to the same duty in respect of the bounties they took under a will, but he thought it was a natural and just principle to regulate the duty according to the consanguinity of the beneficiary. His hon. Friend was driven to this dilemma, either to charge the whole duty on the residuary estate, or to apportion it among the legatees. As to the proposition that a testator himself should regulate the portion of duty to be paid by each legatee, it would impose a duty on a testator which would very seldom be performed; but he thought that further facilities should be afforded for the payment of legacy duties and for discharging executors and trustees in all cases in which one party was entitled for life and another in remainder. It might be said that in cases where the duties would be assessed at different rates, some hardship would accrue to the remainderman in the duty being levied on the whole legacy in the first instance, but he believed that this would be so small in effect as to be inappreciable. Again, he thought, executors or trustees should have the power of giving notice to the Inland Revenue Office that they were about to distribute the funds in their hands, and require the Office if they had any claim upon such funds, to make it within a limited time, and if the Office did not make such claim, that the trustees or executors should be discharged. Again, with regard to succession duties, a case had occurred in which the trustees had elected to pay the succession duties by instalments, but, unfortunately, one of them forgot to pay the last instalment. The thing was undiscovered for years; but when the owner came into succession, he was called upon to pay all the instalments with interest at 4 per cent for 14 years. In a case of that kind, he thought that the principal alone ought to be recoverable. If the changes he had suggested were made, he did not think any more was required. He begged to move the Amendment of which he had given Notice.

MR. GOLDNEY, in seconding the Amendment, said, he agreed with his hon. Friend that, on the whole, the present law worked very well, and was a just law. It was a law which prevailed in all civilized States, and was first adopted in this country under William III., when it was brought from Holland. In 1780, the tax was simply 1 per cent upon legacies above £100; in 1783, it was increased to 2 per cent; and in 1789, to 3 per cent. In 1796, a proposition was brought before the House to increase the duties; and a very long debate followed. On a division, as to whether real estate should be brought under the same rule as personal estate, the numbers were equal, and the Speaker gave his casting-vote against the proposition, so that there might be further time for consideration, and the subject dropped. In 1805, differential duties were introduced; and in 1815, it was established that children who had a natural claim should pay a smaller amount than those who had not the same natural claim. It was manifestly unjust, that those who had a natural right to be maintained should pay the same duty as those who had no such right. The argument in the case of the probate and succession duties were similar. Again, it might be argued, that if too large a duty were imposed on children, who were the immediate objects of the testator's bounty and care, parents would be induced to make provision for them before death, and would thereby evade payment of the percentage to the State. As a matter of fact, that happened rather frequently, even with the existing low duties. He believed that the legacy duty could not be increased without detriment to the State, and that, as it stood, it was based on fair principles, of which the advantages outweighed those of the fixed duty which had been suggested. No doubt, the present system caused considerable expense; but he had never heard of any injustice done in the whole great establishment of Somerset House. He believed the differential duty was better for the public than a fixed duty would be, inasmuch as it did not offer any temptations to the Chancellor of the Exchequer to levy those increases which the hon. Member seemed to think desirable. The total value of personal property had largely increased of late years, till it now amounted to 80 per cent of the whole. That was a circumstance which seemed to have escaped the attention of the hon. Member for Stockton (Mr. Dodds). It was surprising that only the remaining 20 per cent was liable to contribute to local taxation. That fact was an answer to many of the arguments they had heard; and, taking it together with other facts, he had no difficulty in giving his vote against the Resolution.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "expedient" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "to reconsider and revise the progressive rates of Probate and Administration Duty, and to afford greater facilities for the assessment and settlement of Legacy and Succession Duties upon future or contingent events, and for the relief of executors, administrators, and trustees in respect of the same."—(Mr. Gregory.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

MR. BAXTER said, he wished to say a very few words with regard to the Notice which he had placed on the Paper, and which was as follows:—

"To move to add to Mr. Dodd's Motion—'and that with respect to the Probate, Legacy and Succession Duties real estate should be placed on the same footing as personal estate.'"

Mr. Gregory

The first remark he would make was to express his surprise at the total inconsistency between our practice in regard to these duties and our practice with regard to other taxation. With regard to other taxation there was a practice, which he very much regretted to see, of exempting the lower portion of the middle classes from taxation. This practice was, he considered, carried very much further than the benefit of the State justified. The principle adopted in the case of the Income Tax was directly opposite to the principle which they were now discussing with regard to the duties touched upon in the Motion. There was another singularity with regard to the succession duties, and that was that no defence of any kind, good, bad, or indifferent, had ever been made from the Treasury Bench by any Chancellor of the Exchequer of the anomalies or inequalities so ably pointed out by his hon. Friend the Member for Stockton (Mr. Dodds). There had been some defences made from time to time by some independent Gentlemen; but it was a remarkable thing that the Chancellor of the Exchequer, speaking with authority, had never been able to defend these duties. It appeared to him that it was utterly impossible to justify the taxing of small successions at a higher rate than large ones, and the taxing of testate and intestate estates at different charges, and the taxing of real estate where it was used for the purposes of trade, whilst, where it was not used for the purposes of trade it got off scot free. These anomalies and inequalities in the present system had not only been frequently pointed out, but they had been proved to demonstration time and again in that House. To his mind, it was most surprising that no Chancellor of the Exchequer had ever had the courage to grapple with this matter; and the more especially so because it was perfectly evident that any honest, logical attempt to remove these anomalies and put on a uniform duty, as proposed by his hon. Friend the Member for Stockton, would add, he believed, something like £1,000,000 sterling to the Revenue of the country. The present system appeared to him to be radically defective, and he thought it was no use attempting to patch it up in the manner proposed by the hon. Member for East Sussex (Mr. Gregory). He should, therefore, give his support to the Motion of his hon. Friend the Member for Stockton. But he was most desirous of saying that he did not think the House of Commons would be satisfied with stopping here. He claimed, in the interests of justice, that real heritable property should be placed on precisely the same footing, with regard to these duties, as property which was moveable. He was afraid that the country—the electors—were not sufficiently aware of the gross inequality of the law in this respect. He had an abstract of the Parliamentary Return, issued in February, 1878, for the year 1876-7, from which he found that on personal or moveable estates the probate or inventory duty was £2,260,176, and legacy duty £2,846,054, making together £5,107,130; whilst the succession duty on real or heritable estates was only £849,340, making a difference of £4,257,700. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich calculated, some years ago, that if the real property were taxed it would add £2,000,000 to the Exchequer; but the Conservative Party insisted that it would involve a tax of a much greater extent, and Lord Cairns said that the landed property of the country, if that alteration were made, would pay £8,000,000 a-year. He had gone into a calculation himself, but, at that late hour of the night, would not trouble the House with it. It would be sufficient for him to say that he thought any person who had studied this subject thoroughly must come to the conclusion that the exemption of landed property from these duties cost the country not less than £4,000,000 a-year. He had never been able to see why they should not be placed on the same footing, and every great financial authority, who had written and spoken on this subject, took the same view. Many years ago, Mr. Gwynne, the Comptroller of the Duties, addressing the Commissioners of Stamps and Taxes, said—

“It is a matter of surprise that the legacy and probate duties have not yet been extended to real as well as personal estate. Clearly, there is no distinction between them which on any sound principle of finance should exempt one description of property and not the other.”

In Mr. M'Culloch's article on taxation in The Edinburgh Review for 1860, he read as follows:—

"We cannot but think that the mode of charging the duty (meaning the three duties before specified), as well as the duty itself, should be identical on all parts of property; and that if an individual succeed to an estate or other real property which would sell for a certain sum, the duty should be imposed on that amount. This would be a plain and, apparently, an equitable proceeding; for it is not easy to see why one variety of property should be dealt with in one way, and another in a different way.

... The result of the present system of assessing the tax on real property is such that it is not supposed to yield a third part of what it would yield were it assessed in the same way that it is assessed on money and other personal property. It would require very conclusive reasons to justify a distinction of this sort, and, as we have seen, none such really exist. The sooner, therefore, that this discrepancy is terminated, and the duty assessed in the same way on all descriptions of property, the better it will be for all parties. Anything like even the appearance of favouritism in taxation should be carefully guarded against. It is uniformly productive of the worst results, and is especially objectionable when, as in the present case, it is manifested on the side of the richer and more powerful classes."

Now, the only argument he had heard against the taxation of real and personal property was the old theory of peculiar burdens on the land of the country. As a landowner himself, he denied that theory, and he felt persuaded the time would come when the House would have to free itself from the charge that the landowners took very good care of themselves in the matter of the succession duties. ["Oh, oh!"] Hon. Gentlemen cried "Oh, oh!" but he wished to remind them that the Land Tax was based on a valuation made some 200 years ago which now was merely nominal. He entirely agreed with his hon. Friend who had just sat down (Mr. Goldney) in what he said about Corporations. He could see no reason why Corporations should be exempted. This subject was occupying more attention than many hon. Gentlemen believed, and he himself had presented several Petitions, very much to his surprise, in favour of this Motion. He thought that the Government had now an excellent opportunity, before the Budget of next year, of allaying the feeling of discontent which existed, and, at the same time, adding a very considerable amount to the national Exchequer.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, the Amendment, or rather rider, which the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Montrose (Mr. Baxter) had placed upon the Paper was not before the House, and the few observations which the right hon. Gentleman had made showed that they were not to be called upon on that occasion to discuss that Amendment. He thought the right hon. Gentleman had exercised a wise discretion in not inviting them to enter upon so large and difficult a discussion as that which would have been raised if the House had been asked to consider the Amendment. He protested against some of the assumptions which the right hon. Gentleman had made, and he thought that if the question were argued out, it would be easy to adduce very good arguments against the doctrine of the right hon. Gentleman, that real estate should be taxed as regarded legacy duty upon the same footing as personal estate. The right hon. Gentleman had given an inadequate view of the difference between the burdens which fell upon real estate and upon personal estate. He thought that if the right hon. Gentleman would analyze his estimate of the value of real property, and correct it by deducting charges in the nature of mortgages and other charges, he would find that that value was not as large when compared with the wealth of the country as he would have the House believe. He, however, proposed to confine his observations to the question raised by his hon. Friend the Member for Stockton (Mr. Dodds), and to treat his Motion from a purely practical point of view. He understood that the object of his hon. Friend was to bring to the cognizance of the House the anomalies which undoubtedly existed in the present system under which probate and legacy duty upon personal property was levied. The charges which the hon. Gentleman brought against that system were three—namely, that the smaller estates were charged with the highest rate of duty, that the scale of assessment proceeded by jumps, instead of by regular percentage, and that an objectionable difference was made between the charges on testate and intestate estates. In the justice of the first of these complaints he entirely concurred, it being perfectly clear that the scale as it stood at present bore more heavily upon the smaller estates than upon the larger. This was a matter which called for attention, and, at the proper time, for remedy. As to his hon. Friend's second charge, he thought it would be far more convenient that the scale should be in the nature of a scale by steps, than in the nature of a percentage duty, because of the great difficulty that there would be in assessing the duty by percentage if stamps were to be used for the purpose. It would be extremely inconvenient to keep stamps of every variety necessary to meet the peculiar incidence of a strict and accurate percentage duty. The hon. Gentleman might say, "Why should you use stamps? Why should you not adopt my principle of having an uniform tax to take the place both of the probate duty, which is raised by stamps, and the legacy duty, which is raised by percentage? Why not substitute for these two an uniform percentage duty?" But if this suggestion were adopted, if the same amount of revenue was to be raised, and he assumed that that was intended, it would be necessary to substitute for a tax which was levied partially by stamp upon probate, and subsequently by percentage upon legacy duty, an uniform amount which would cover both those charges. This would be to place a very heavy charge upon successors to property, who probably in many cases would not find it very convenient to bear it. The hon. Gentleman had referred to the fact that it often happened that persons coming into property were unable to pay probate duty without inconvenience. How great, then, would be the inconvenience to which they would be subjected supposing they were compelled to find the full amount, as would be the case if the hon. Gentleman's suggestions were adopted. And for this reason, that it provided a self-acting machinery by which the amount of the property was ascertained by the probate stamp which the person who was entitled to the property was anxious to obtain, and who would, therefore, not attempt to evade the duty. He thought that it was more convenient and more secure for the Revenue, and certainly more convenient for the person who had to pay the duty, that the duty should be levied partly in the form of probate duty, and partly in the form of legacy duty. He fully admitted, however, that the scale on which the duty was levied should be re-considered. But, in re-adjusting the duty, he did not think that the proposal of the hon. Member would be advantageous, either to the Exchequer or to those who had to pay it. The third complaint which had been made was that a difference was made between the duty on intestate estates, and those which were bequeathed by will. Upon that subject, however, he should wish to reserve his opinion. He was by no means prepared to say that he should not admit the force of the argument which had been used in reference to it; but, at the same time, he did not wish to pledge himself to anything until he had given further consideration to the matter. In order to place the two classes of estates upon an equal footing, it would be necessary to raise the amount of the duty upon testate estates. He admitted that these were all matters that required consideration, and since last year he had given some attention to the subject. The hon. Member, however, must admit that this was a very difficult question, which had been for a number of years under consideration by the ablest financiers, who, down to the present time, had been unable to see their way to a solution of the problem. In these circumstances, he did not think he was open to any serious charge for not having as yet succeeded in satisfactorily settling the question. Dealing with the subject of consanguinity, he must remark that if too high a duty were exacted in respect of property bequeathed from father to son, or from husband to wife, the Revenue would lose largely by means of inter vivos arrangements, while a good deal of ill-feeling might be roused by adopting that course. With regard to the subject of the descent of property to illegitimate issue, while he admitted that many hard cases might result from the operation of the present system, he doubted whether it would be wise to disturb an arrangement which had existed for so long. Though he admitted the justice of much that had been said by the hon. Gentleman, he should demur entirely to the acceptance of such a proposal as that he had placed on the Paper. It would be altogether unwise to commit the House to such a proposition as that there should be an uniform rate of the value of personal estate. General questions of taxation were open to considerable doubt; but, with regard to this, it was a proposal of a different character. It asked the House to commit itself to a specific plan which he could not admit to be the right, or best plan even, to attain that which the hon. Member wished, and he, for one, would not agree to it. If the House were to pass any Resolution at all, he thought the Resolution as it would stand with the Amendment of his hon. Friend the Member for Sussex (Mr. Gregory) would be harmless and, to a certain extent, beneficial. He should prefer that no Resolution should be passed at all, and that the House should be contented with the discussion, which had been of a very interesting and suggestive character; but, if a division were taken, he should be prepared to negative the Motion of the hon. Member for Stockton, and to support the Amendment of the hon. Member for Sussex.

Mr. Baxter

MR. DODDS said, he had no wish to detain the House, but he must beg leave to say a few words in reply. With reference to the remarks of his hon. Friend the Member for East Sussex (Mr. Gregory) as to the desirability of making a man pay for the administration of his estate by the law in the event of his dying intestate, he thought the hon. Member could scarcely be serious in putting such a proposal forward. The Act for the distribution of intestate estates imposed no duty on the State. The representatives of the man who died intestate were responsible for putting it in operation. He could not conceive the smallest reason for the differential duty being paid on that account. As to the suggestion about an estate with a life interest and remainder over to somebody else, the difficulty could be got over in the simplest possible way by taking the whole duty out of the corpus of the fund, by which arrangement everybody would pay equally from the commencement. The tenant for life would have £100 reduced by 4 per cent, and would receive the interest upon 96 per cent. Then it was said that the duty would be thrown entirely upon the residuary legatee, if the testator did not make a proper provision for the duty in his will. But the hon. Member must know very well that a solicitor, in drawing a will, always took the instructions as to whether duty was to be charged upon a particular legacy or not. It was the duty of the solicitor to see to that in drawing a will; while, in the case of an intestacy, the difficulty would not arise, because each would take his share out of the portion. Then it was suggested that it was very hard to charge interest upon the duty, where it had not been paid for a long time. He quite admitted that it did sometimes seem hard, and in one case recently, within his own experience, where the duty was £1,000, the interest was between 20 or 30 per cent of that amount. But he could see no hardship in the arrangement. The duty was due, and if it had been paid, the State would have had the benefit of it; while, on the other hand, the person having the money, had no doubt been making more of it than the 4 per cent the State charged him. He must beg pardon of the hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Goldney) for interrupting him. He thought the hon. Member was mixing up the probate and legacy duties. The probate duty certainly was brought in in 1694; but the legacy duty was not imposed till the year 1780, in the time of George III. With regard to the case of a man selling property, he must remind the hon. Gentleman that there was no difference whether a man sold to a relative or to a stranger. Therefore, he failed to see any answer to his proposal in that objection. It must be remembered that he was not suggesting for a moment that there should be any increase in these duties. The Chancellor of the Exchequer had clearly defined that; his proposal simply was that the same duty should be levied in a different form. He thanked the Chancellor of the Exchequer for the way in which he had accepted some of his propositions, and he hoped now that the question was clearly before the House, that the Government would take it up another year. He might add, as to the difficulty of raising money, that if a certificate were granted at the Inland Revenue Office of the amount payable, and that certificate were made a voucher to the insurance companies, or the bankers, anyone having any part of the estate could easily get money. If that was not done, then they might make a portion payable after a certain time. He had heard nothing during the debate to impair or weaken his case, and he must therefore ask the opinion of the House upon it, feeling quite sure that the time was not far distant when his proposition, or something very like it, would be agreed to by some Chancellor of the Exchequer.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer

Question put.

The House divided:—Ayes 59; Noes 131: Majority 72.—(Div. List, No. 105.)

Words added.

Main Question, as amended, put.

The House divided:—Ayes 131; Noes 24: Majority 107.—(Div. List, No. 106.)

Resolved, That, in the opinion of this House, it is expedient to reconsider and revise the progressive rates of Probate and Administration Duty, and to afford greater facilities for the assessment and settlement of Legacy and Succession Duties upon future or contingent events, and for the relief of executors, administrators, and trustees in respect of the same.

SUGAR INDUSTRIES.

NOMINATION OF SELECT COMMITTEE.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Select Committee do consist of 17 Members."—(Mr. Ritchie.)

MR. ISAAC said, that he should like to ask the attention of the House while he made a personal explanation on the matter, and he trusted no hon. Member would object to his doing so. He would refer to two matters—1st, to the debate that took place on the 2nd April last, on a Motion of his own, in which he called the attention of the House to the formation of the Select Committees on Public Business; and, secondly, to the debate raised by the hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets (Mr. Ritchie), on the question of the sugar industries. He was bound to revert to those two questions, for the purpose of showing that he had a reasonable, proper, and Constitutional right to oppose the nomination of this Committee of 17 Members, and that he did not raise his objections for the purpose of obstruction. It had been allowed that every hon. Member of the House was entitled of right to comment upon all matters of Public Business that came before it, and he might say that, although his name appeared in the Division List in support of this Committee, he went into that Lobby by mistake; but he did not think that it was of sufficient importance to go to the Table with the Tellers for the purpose of rectifying his error. In his own justification, he might say that he told the hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets of his intention to raise an objection to the Committee, and that he called his attention to the Standing Order of the 25th June, 1852, by which the number of Members to be nominated on any Committee was limited to 15, unless by special consent of the House. So far, he had done all that one hon. Member should do in giving Notice of his intention to object to the Committee. But the names did appear on the Paper after he intimated his intention to object to the nomination, and when the names appeared on the Paper, his objection was very much stronger, and in that objection he was joined by several hon. Members of the House, and a Notice of objection by another hon. Member appeared on the Papers of the House at the same time that his own did. His hon. Friend the Member for Swansea (Mr. Dillwyn) put an objection on the Paper; but, for some reason of his own, he had withdrawn it. But that did not interfere with his (Mr. Isaac's) objection. He entertained a strong opinion with respect to the number of names submitted for nomination on these Committees, and he contended that he was within his Constitutional right in objecting to the Committee consisting of 17 Members. In answer to a Question that was put to him, the Chancellor of the Exchequer had appealed to him to withdraw his opposition. He could not answer the Chancellor of the Exchequer that evening, nor could he express his views upon the subject on the occasion without putting the House to great inconvenience; but he left it in the hands of the Chancellor of the Exchequer to arrange the matter, and had agreed with the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer that if the number of the Committee were limited to 15, he would no longer raise an objection. The only stipulation he made to that offer being that the two names last put on the Paper—namely, the hon. Member for Liskeard (Mr. Courtney), and the hon. and learned Member for Kildare (Mr. Meldon), should remain part of the 15. He was bound to say that he had heard nothing of any kind from the hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets (Mr. Ritchie) with respect to the matter, and in the absence of any communication from him asking his views, he did not consider that he had any right to take notice of the agitation made both inside and outside of this House; indeed, to so great an extent had the agitation been carried, that it was even threatened to send a deputation to Nottingham, and thus induce the working men there to unseat him. He was bound to say that he still objected to the number of the Committee being more than 15, and he thought that, in justice to himself and his case, the number should be reduced. He made those observations in order that hon. Members might know the reasons for his opposition, and in order that he might not be accused of obstruction. In the future, it was his intention during the rest of the Session to oppose the nomination of any Select Committee where the names exceeded 15 in number. He trusted that the explanation he had given would be satisfactory to the House. He might say that he should not oppose any further delay in the nomination of the Committee; but he hoped that the hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets would meet his objection by reducing the number to 15.

MR. RITCHIE said, he must place before the House his version of what had taken place, as it differed materially from that described by the hon. Member for Nottingham (Mr. Isaac). No doubt, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Clackmannan (Mr. Adam) and his hon. Colleague (Sir William Hart Dyke) were very much obliged to the hon. Member for the interest he took in the nomination of Select Committees. He should not question the right of any hon. Member to oppose the names proposed to be nominated on a Committee. But the effect of the opposition of the hon. Gentleman had been to prevent this matter from coming on at all even for discussion. He ventured to think that opposition of that sort was unjustifiable, for the House, having resolved upon the Committee, there remained the further step to nominate the Members to serve on the Committee, and the effect of the opposition of the hon. Gentleman was to prevent the House from carrying out its own Resolution. The hon. Gentleman said that he had never asked him as to his views upon the matter, and that no Question on the subject had ever been put to him. The House would, no doubt recollect that when he asked a Question of his right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer on the subject, the right hon. Gentleman expressed a hope that the hon. Member for Nottingham would withdraw his opposition to the appointment of the Committee. He then immediately asked the hon. Member whether, after what had been said by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, he would consent to do so? The hon. Member did not pay him even the ordinary courtesy of replying to his Question, although in the House. After that, he did not feel justified in again mentioning the matter to him. The hon. Gentleman had stated that he had originally told him of his intention to object to the Committee, on the ground of the Standing Orders, unless he limited his Committee to 15; but after the Committee had been appointed, the hon. Gentleman stated to him that he had changed his mind and that unless he limited his Committee to 13, he should object to it. On further conversation with him, he (Mr. Ritchie) told the hon. Member that the Standing Orders permitted 15 Members to be nominated, and he (Mr. Ritchie) proceeded to obtain the names of hon. Members in the usual way. It was useless for the hon. Member to come forward now to say that he objected to 17 names; for what he really objected to at first was that 15 Members should be on the Committee, the other two were added after the hon. Member had put his Notice of objection on the Paper. In respect to the opposition of the hon. Member for Swansea (Mr. Dillwyn), it was based upon a sound and intelligible principle—namely, that the Committee ought to be strengthened by the addition of the hon. Member for Liskeard (Mr. Courtney). He quite agreed that the hon. Member for Liskeard ought to be on the Committee, and he was sure that that hon. Member would acknowledge that he was one of the first he had applied to, but he was then unwilling to serve. It was his great anxiety that the Committee should be a strong Committee, and when he complied with the request of the hon. Member for Swansea, his opposition was immediately withdrawn. He hoped that he had now satisfied the House that the course he had taken was a usual one; but he ventured to think that the course taken by the hon. Member for Nottingham had been altogether unusual and unprecedented upon a question of the nomination of a Select Committee. If the hon. Member had objected in the first instance to the Committee being composed of more than 15 Members, he should have paid every attention to his representations; but as he had now obtained the names of hon. Members and placed them on the Committee, he did not see how he could ask any hon. Gentleman to have his name taken off. He, therefore, hoped that the House would support him in nominating 17 Members to serve upon the Committee.

Mr. Isaac

MR. DILLWYN observed, that he placed a Notice upon the Paper with reference to the number of this Committee, though he could not agree with the hon. Member for Nottingham (Mr. Isaac) that the Committee should be limited to 15. He was opposed to the Committee in toto—he did not like it, and did not think it would lead to good results; but when he saw the names of the hon. Members whom it was proposed to nominate to serve on the Committee, he considered that there was an undue preponderance of Gentlemen likely to be biased—not improperly—but still biased on the subject, and, therefore, he objected to the nomination of the Committee. His hon. Friend the Member for the Tower Hamlets (Mr. Ritchie) very frankly and fairly met his views, and named two other Members—the hon. Member for Liskeard (Mr. Courtney), and the hon. and learned Member for Kildare (Mr. Meldon). He did not altogether like the Committee being raised from 15 to 17; but still, as his hon. Friend had met his views so fairly, he did not think he could do otherwise than withdraw his opposition, and he, therefore, felt bound now to support the nomination of the Committee as he proposed it. He did not like the Committee at all; still, as his hon. Friend had done his best to meet his views, he should accept what he proposed.

Question put, and agreed to.

Select Committee to consist of Seventeen Members:—Mr. Bourke, Mr. Alexander Brown, Mr. Sampson Lloyd, Mr. Bell, Mr. Thornhill, Mr. Stewart, Mr. James Corry, Mr. Norwood, Mr. Balfour, Lord Frederick Cavendish, Sir James McGarel-Hogg, Mr. Collins, Mr. Orr Ewing, Mr. Morley, Mr. Onslow, Mr. Courtney, and Mr. Ritchie:—Power to send for persons, papers, and records; Five to be the quorum.

House adjourned at One o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Wednesday, 21st May, 1879.

MINUTES.]—PRIVATE BILL (by Order)—Considered as amended—Lansdowne Road, Rathmines, and Rathgar Tramway*. PUBLIC BILLS—Ordered—First Reading—Entail (Scotland)* [193]. Second Reading—University Education (Ireland) [183], debate adjourned. Committee—Report—Local Government (Ireland) Provisional Orders (Waterford, &c.)* [133]. Third Reading—Consolidated Fund (No. 3)*, and passed.

COMMITTEES.

Ordered, That Committees shall not sit Tomorrow, being Ascension Day, until Two of the clock, and have leave to sit until Six of the clock, notwithstanding the sitting of the House. —(Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer.)

ORDER OF THE DAY.

UNIVERSITY EDUCATION (IRELAND) BILL.—[BILL 183.]

(The O'Connor Don, Mr. Kavanagh, Mr. Shaw, Mr. Mitchell Henry, Lord Charles Beresford, Mr. Parnell.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

THE O'CONOR DON, in moving that the Bill be now read a second time, said: Sir, I do not intend to criticize the Amendments that have been put down by the hon. Gentleman the Member for Kirkcaldy (Sir George Campbell), the hon. Member for the City of Edinburgh (Mr. M'Laren), and the two other Amendments which amount to a direct negative of this Bill; but I would most earnestly appeal to the hon. Gentlemen who are about to take part in the discussion on this measure that they will confine themselves as much as possible to the real principle involved in the Bill which I now ask the House to read a second time. I make this appeal, especially because I am afraid that some of the Amendments are of a character that might lead us into discussions which I should regard as very wide of the real objects and intentions of the measure. The hon. Member for Kirkcaldy has given Notice of an Amendment which, with all respect to him, I would venture to say is one that would be more appropriately made to a Vote in Committee of Supply on the question of primary education. Considering the nature of the Amendment, I have thought it desirable to make the appeal that, in discussing the second reading of the Bill, we should, as far as possible, confine ourselves to the real subject-matter of the measure. The real questions at issue are — Is there a want in Ireland of further facilities for higher education? If that question be answered in the affirmative — is the mode proposed by this Bill for meeting that want one that ought to commend itself to the approval of the House? If these two questions be answered in the affirmative, I do not think the House of Commons will be inclined to refuse the necessary amount of money for the carrying out of the objects of the Bill, and I may say at once that it is no essential part of our proposal that the money shall come from the fund mentioned in the Bill. We have selected that particular fund, because it was that which was selected by the Government in relation to the measure of last year; but if Parliament should think it advisable to have recourse to any other fund in order to meet the requirements of the measure, there is not the slightest objection to such a proposal being accepted, and the question whether primary education in Ireland is sufficiently met, and whether the money wanted for the purposes of this Bill should be provided out of the fund which is referred to in the measure, or in any other way, are issues entirely outside the present question, and ought not to be discussed on the second reading of this Bill. As to the second Amendment on the Paper, which is to be moved by my hon. Friend the Member for the City of Edinburgh, I would say a few words. The hon. Gentleman is much opposed to this Bill, and he says in his Amendment that the measure is opposed to the principle of civil and religious equality, by proposing to endow mainly the members of one Church and their Colleges with £1,500,000 of public money. Well, but I would ask the hon. Gentleman what is the present state of affairs in Scotland? Are there not in that country four Universities fairly endowed, and are they not far more denominational than the University we now propose to establish in Ireland? Are not the benefits conferred by those Universities far more for the members of one Church and profession, one particular creed, than will be the case if this Bill be passed into law? ["No, no!"] An hon. Gentleman behind me says "No, no." I would ask him, is there not a Chair of Theology in each of the Scotch Universities, are not the Governing Bodies of those Universities largely composed of Presbyterian clergymen, and are they not mainly attended by Presbyterian students? If my hon. Friend the Member for the City of Edinburgh, or any other Scotch Member, could point out a so-called non-sectarian University in Scotland, the chief Professors in which were Roman Catholic priests, in which University there was a school of Roman Catholic theology, and could show that such University was attended largely by Presbyterian and Protestant students, then he might come to this House, and say to the Irish Roman Catholics — "You have no right to complain, because you have a Protestant University in Dublin, in which there is a Chair of Protestant Theology, and a College in Belfast to which you can send Irish Roman Catholics." I deny that there is anything contrary to the principles of civil and religious liberty in what we are asking to-day, and assert that those who refuse to aid us are acting contrary to those principles which they so loudly profess on so many different occasions. I have only one word more to say, and that is on a topic which no doubt will be often raised, and that is the objection taken in some quarters that we are asking for the second reading of this Bill so soon after the introduction of the measure. This, no doubt, is thought unreasonable, and I have seen statements in the papers to the effect that we are desirous of rushing this Bill through the House. At the very outset, I wish most distinctly to disclaim any wish to take such a course. We have no desire whatever either to rush the Bill through the House, or in any way to shirk the discussion of its principles; and I would venture to add that, in proposing the second reading of the measure to-day, we are doing nothing that is at all unreasonable. I stated the other night, in introducing the Bill, that I did so in the sincere desire that it might be passed into law this Session as a practical measure, and not one to be thrown down upon the Table of the House for the mere purpose of raising a discussion. If it is to be regarded as a practical measure, I ask the House what other course is open to us than proposing the second reading to-day? Hon. Gentlemen will remember that this is the 21st of May, and that in a few days we shall adjourn for a fortnight. This being so, hon. Members must be aware that, in the usual course of procedure, it would be impossible, if we were not able to take the second reading of the Bill to-day, to again submit it to the House for at least a month, or about the middle of June, and in that case I ask what chance should we private Members have of passing the Bill this year? Therefore, if there be anything unreasonable in our seeking to have the Bill read a second time to-day, it applies to our desire to have it passed at all. But even if we desired to rush the Bill through the House, it would be impossible to do so. We all know the many stages a Bill has to go through before it can become law; and even if the House were to-day to approve the second reading of the measure, and if it subsequently should turn out that its provisions are such as the majority of the House thought they ought not to approve, there are many other opportunities on which opposition could be raised. We appeal to hon. Members to allow us to have a decision taken on the second reading to-day; and if it should subsequently turn out to be desirable to raise any question as to the principle of the Bill on the next stage, we not only would not object—of course we could not prevent it—but we will undertake that the next stage shall not be taken until an ample opportunity has been given for considering every detail of the Bill, and obtaining opinions from all parts of the Kingdom on the measure. Under these circumstances, I venture to move the second reading of the Bill, and to hope that hon. Gentlemen will confine their remarks to the real merits of the measure, and not wander into discussions that will be wide of the main issue.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
 "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(The O'Conor Don.)

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL, in rising to move the following Amendment:—

"That while this House recognizes that the funds set free by the disestablishment of the Irish Church should be devoted to the benefit of the people of Ireland, provided they are not again applied to the support of any sectarian religion, it is not desirable to devote additional public funds to the further promotion of higher education in Ireland till adequate provision is first made for elementary teaching in that Country, without aid from Imperial funds exceeding that given to other parts of the United Kingdom," said, he was not surprised that his hon. Friend the Member for Roscommon (the O'Conor Don) should be anxious to limit the scope of the discussion upon this Bill; he was ready to meet his hon. Friend in debating the positive merits of the Bill; but, before they passed it, its merits, not only positive, but comparative, should be shown to them. He was surprised when his hon. Friend said it was not essential to the passing of the Bill where the money should come from. But the providing of the money was the essence of the measure. If the hon. Member for Roscommon could find liberal Roman Catholics who would endow a University from their private funds, he had no objection in the least to their doing so. His objection to this Bill was that the hon. Member meant to dip very largely into public funds for the endowment of his University. He, therefore, altogether declined to exclude the question of money from the discussion of this Bill, and insisted rather on that question being put in the very forefront of the discussion. The hon. Member for Roscommon said the Scotch Universities were more denominational than anything that was proposed to be established by this Bill. He (Sir George Campbell) ventured to deny that; but his hon. Friend the Member for Edinburgh (Mr. M'Laren) would answer the hon. Member for Roscommon better on this point. All the education in these Scotch Universities, except some special theological classes, was now absolutely unsectarian. There was no objection whatever, either legal, social, or in any other way, to any student of any denomination pursuing his studies in all the classes of the Scotch Universities; and it was the case that many not only might, but actually did, so follow them. If the theological departments were to be deemed a fault in an otherwise excellent system, all he could say was that two blacks did not make a white, and there was no reason why the fault should be re-introduced in Ireland also. It would, he admitted, be very desirable if the theological departments could be separated from these Universities; but there was no reason why their Irish Friends should copy what was bad and reject what was good in the Scotch system. He looked with very great suspicion upon the circumstances under which this Bill had been brought into being. It was a very suspicious fact that when they were suddenly told that the hon. Member for Roscommon wished to introduce a Bill on Irish University Education, Her Majesty's Government, in a singular and unexpected manner, immediately made way for it. Her Majesty's Government were not in the habit of giving such extreme facilities to private Members who had been disappointed in bringing on their Bills, and it seemed to him that the action of the Government had shown a singular benevolence towards, if not connivance with, the hon. Member for Roscommon with regard to the first stage of his Bill. He trusted that the support of the Government was not to be extended to the subsequent stages. Another singular fact was the way in which the other Bills down on the Order Book for second reading to-day had been cleared out of the way in an almost unprecedented manner in order to give the hon. Member for Roscommon the first place. Irish Members had singular good fortune in obtaining the first place for their Bills upon Wednesday, and the unanimity with which they had all given way on this occasion to the measure of the hon. Member for Roscommon was remarkable. Such action on their part seemed to indicate a unanimity of which he confessed he was a little suspicious. The House was not accustomed to see such perfect unanimity among them. There was usually a good deal of division amongst them, except on subjects that gave them a hope of touching public money. This Bill was one of those subjects. The Government having exhibited so much benevolence towards this Bill, in regard to which the Irish Members were so singularly unanimous, he could not help thinking that at best or at worst a General Election was not far off, and that there might be parties in this House who would not be sorry—God forbid that he should say that they would bid for the support of the priests!—but who would not be sorry to have their support in the Irish elections. Putting this and that together, he was suspicious of this Bill. He suspected the presence of the cloven foot, which his hon. Friend the Member for Edinburgh saw more distinctly. Therefore, he said, let them not press this Bill forward with indecent haste, but discuss it thoroughly, so that they might know what were the bearings and intentions of the Bill, and what were the opinions of the public with regard to it. The more he looked at the Bill the less he liked it. Public attention was gradually being directed to the Bill, and the organs of public opinion were pointing out, he thought very justly, various points in which the Bill was open to the animadversions of the hon. Member for Edinburgh. He not only disliked what was in the Bill, but he also disliked a great deal that was not in the Bill. He disliked the reticence that was shown as to making its objects and intentions more clear and distinct; he disliked the proposal for leaving the rules and procedure for carrying out its provisions to a Senate which was to be so largely composed of elected members. He disliked also the exclusion from the University of the members of all Colleges otherwise provided for; and he could not help thinking that the new University was intended to be mainly a Catholic University, and that its graduates, who would exercise the voting power, would mainly be Catholic graduates. If that were so, whatever might be the intentions of the hon. Member for Roscommon, the end would be that the elected members of the Senate would be Catholic members, and the rules and procedure left to them would be rules and procedure drawn up, he would not say in the interests of Catholics, but, at least, in deference to the prejudices and honest opinions of these Catholic members. The Bill ought, therefore, to be very cautiously looked at before they proceeded too far. In reference to this subject, he had during the last two or three days looked at the communications and articles in the public Press, and he had been struck by one which appeared this morning in the shape of a letter in The Times from a Protestant Nobleman, Lord

Sir George Campbell

Portarlington, in support of the Bill. He did not know whether there were any Protestant Jesuits; but if there were any such persons, he was inclined very much to suppose that Lord Portarlington was one, and that, in professing to favour this Bill, the noble Lord had put forward the most favourable arguments that could be used against it, for his Lordship, noticing a previous letter against the Bill from Lord Longford, said—

“Will you allow another Irishman, likewise a Protestant, to express the great satisfaction with which he has learned the proposals of the O’Conor Don, as some return and compensation to our fellow-countrymen of the Roman Catholic faith in Ireland, for all those iniquitous years during which tithes were wrung from the people for the support of the clergy of a Church with which they had no concern.”

That was the statement of Lord Portarlington; and it was because he (Sir George Campbell) believed that that was the honest intention of those who promoted the Bill that he, for one, was opposed to it. He had said before that two blacks did not make one white; and it was no reason because we had done injustice to Ireland in the past that we should now do injustice to ourselves—returning injustice for injustice. Having got rid of the injustice which Lord Portarlington described, let them not introduce again injustice of the same kind by attempting, directly or indirectly, to endow Roman Catholics with public funds. It was on that ground that he sought for delay; and it was on that ground, as it seemed to him, that the opinion of the country was rising very rapidly against the Bill. He was very much inclined to look for guidance in regard to his conduct with respect to such a Bill to the opinion of the Roman Catholic hierarchy. If they approved of, or did not disapprove of it, he should say it would be a wise course for the House to disapprove of it. That hierarchy were wedded to unreasonable principles, especially on the subject of education, and anything on that subject that satisfied them must be unreasonable. On that ground, he had been somewhat exercised by observing what he could not help regarding as the suspicious silence of the Roman Catholic hierarchy on the Bill. He had seen a letter from a source not hostile to the Bill remarking upon that extraordinary silence—indeed, it seemed as though it had been thought better to induce the Roman Catholic Bishops and the great power in Rome to hold their tongues and say nothing about the matter. He should think the approval of the Roman Catholic hierarchy a suspicious circumstance, which would tend to set him against such a Bill as this; but he drew a distinction between the Catholic hierarchy and the parish clergy. When he was in Ireland, some time ago, he went into this matter, and was struck by the fact that elementary education in Ireland was far more denominational than people in England and Scotland had the least idea of. It was, in fact, almost as much Roman Catholic in its character as the most ardent Catholic could desire. Under the character of managers and patrons of the elementary schools paid for by British money, the priests had set up a denominational system. But the priests were not under the Bishops in that matter; they were under the Board of Education. The priests were satisfied, but the Bishops were not; and he repeated, that anything that would satisfy a Roman Catholic Bishop must be so extreme that those who did not hold with those Bishops must be opposed to it. He wished it to be understood that he was not speaking under the influence of what might be supposed to be Scotch prejudice. Most of his life was spent out of Scotland; he had seen a good deal of the world; he had seen a good many phases of the Christian religion, and of other religions also, and his own opinions had been rather favourable than otherwise to the Catholic religion. He had found that on the field of battle, and in the midst of difficulties and dangers, the priests of the Church of Rome had done very good service; and notwithstanding much that was objectionable in it, he recognized the fact that there was a great deal of the true fire of Christianity in the character of the professors of that religion. But when they came to the political character of that religion, not only from what he had read and heard, but from what he had seen, especially in recent years, on the Continent of Europe, he was thoroughly convinced that, in regard to civil matters and administration, and especially in regard to education, the Roman Catholic hierarchy were irreconcilable. In every country in Europe in which the Governments had attempted the plan of levelling up, by gratuities from the public funds, in the hope of coming to terms with the Catholic Bishops, those Governments had invariably come to grief. They had found that the cure they attempted was worse than the disease. That was the state of France and Germany, and it would be the state of Italy were it not for the fact that Italy had, to a great extent, broken herself loose from the priests. Taking a wide and an historical and philosophical view of the case, he was deliberately of opinion—and his opinion was not influenced by Scotch prejudice—that it was not desirable to attempt to come to terms with the Catholic hierarchy in this matter, or to pass this Bill in the hope of reconciling them. The House ought to treat them as irreconcilable, and exclude sectarian religion from the question of education in Ireland. He had no doubt that when the hon. Member for Edinburgh came to make his speech, he would give excellent reasons for the strong terms of the Amendment he had put on the Paper. He (Sir George Campbell) had thought it better to be content with the milder terms of which he had given Notice, and, as far as possible, avoid matter of a controversial character. He bore in mind the sublime poetry of his youth, which he might adapt thus—“Let certain Members bark and bite,

For 'tis their nature to.”

And he would suggest to the hon. Member for Edinburgh—

“But, Scotchmen, you should never let Your angry passions rise.”

Therefore it was that he had drawn his Amendment in a somewhat negative form, only hinting at that denominational question which the hon. Member for Edinburgh had tackled more boldly and decidedly. He did not think the hon. Member for Roscommon (the O'Connor Don) had made out a prima facie case for his Bill. As to the source from which it was proposed that the funds for carrying out the Bill should come, he reminded the House that they were in the position of a man who was contingent heir to an inheritance that was to come in some day hereafter. They were to deal with funds which had not come into their pockets yet; and though it might be possible to sell their contingent rights under an urgent and pressing necessity, he was totally unable to see that there was any good ground for reversing the decision already come to by Parliament as to the ultimate destination of those funds. Even supposing that the money was available, and that it should be devoted to purposes of education, then he would suggest that was a much more crying want than that which the present Bill was framed to supply—for hon. Members from Ireland were constantly pointing out, and the hon. Member for Roscommon himself had given Notice of a Motion on the subject—that additional grants were needed for elementary education in Ireland, and especially for the purpose of providing training schools for elementary school teachers. The argument in favour of devoting funds to elementary education rather than to University teaching in excess was not one which he had recently developed; it was a principle which he had long maintained, that elementary education should first be developed before too extensive provision was made for higher education. He knew that people newly entering on a path of progress were rather apt to fall into a blunder on this point. When a comparatively small section of the people of a particular country were rapidly becoming educated and progressive, they cried out for an excessive amount of State aid for higher education. He had lately visited one such country—modern Greece—where that had been found to be an evil; and in India he had found the same tendency, and had struggled there, and had struggled successfully, against devoting public funds too much to higher education where elementary education was neglected. Just as it was in Greece, just as the hon. Member for Roscommon would make it in Ireland, so it was in Bengal and in India generally. Public money was devoted to higher education, while lower education was neglected. He had thought that unjust, and had proposed a material alteration, so as to bring the education provided for within just and reasonable limits. It was upon that ground, which he had long thought out, that he submitted his Amendment in opposition to the Bill. No doubt, he would be told—“Your arguments are all very well, but the principle has been conceded by the Government when they passed the Intermediate Education Act of last year.” Again he said, two blacks did not make one white. He had considerable doubts about the Act of last year, because it was to apply public funds to higher education before the lower had been properly attended to. Still, he did not take upon himself to actively oppose it, because the want it was meant to supply was a real one, and it was desirable, in the interests of both rich and poor, that a ladder should be provided by means of which clever boys of the poorer class should climb to the advantages of higher education. But the present proposal was an infinitely greater one, and was more objectionable in many respects than the Intermediate Education Bill, for it proposed not only to give grants to scholars who passed a successful examination, but it proposed to give great grants to particular schools and Colleges which were to be selected by this Catholic Senate, and also to pay their Professors and build their museums and schools. It was on that ground that he thought this Bill must be much more minutely criticized than was the Intermediate Education Bill of last year. The hon. Member for Roscommon had said that there was not sufficient provision for University Education in Ireland at present; but on that point he took issue with him. If the question of religion was put aside, the present provision for University Education in Ireland would be found amply sufficient. In Trinity College, Dublin, Ireland had a University which was one of the most noble and amply-endowed institutions in Europe; and then there were the Queen's Colleges, which were most amply endowed with funds. Therefore, he argued, there was not that want of University Education said to be prevalent in Ireland. But the difficulty in regard to Irish University Education was the religious question; and if the hon. Gentleman who moved the second reading of the Bill was not satisfied with the provision for University Education, he ought to tackle the religious question directly. He should have brought the other Irish Universities within the scope of his Bill. It was true that the hon. Gentleman stated in his speech that if the Bill had been a Government Bill it would have been right and proper that those Universities should be brought within its scope; but the Government had not thought fit to bring in a Bill of that kind, and hence he asserted that the hon. Gentleman should have treated the religious question directly and not indirectly. Not only was it the case that, religion apart, there was sufficient provision for University Education in Ireland already, but, in spite of the religious difficulty, he was inclined to believe that our fellow-subjects in Ireland really had a very ample share of University Education. The proof of the pudding was in the eating; and it would be found that, instead of a small proportion of Irishmen competing for the prizes of the Indian Civil Service and other Departments of the State, a very large, and he might say an abnormal, proportion of Irishmen were to be found competing successfully. Then the Bill proposed to endow the new University to a much greater extent than the Scotch Universities, and to that he strongly objected. As to the comparison drawn between the numbers in Ireland and Scotland, the Scotch Colleges took students at a much earlier age, and were more like intermediate schools, the bulk of the students being nothing more than day scholars in the great towns. In reality, the necessity for this Bill was a political necessity, and it was put forward to conciliate that body—the Catholic hierarchy of Ireland—which had more influence than any other in the electoral affairs of Ireland. His Motion had reference to the question of Irish elementary education, and he thought that hon. Gentlemen from Ireland must well know that there was a great want in that direction. He did feel that the House should make an effort to extend elementary education for the benefit of the poorer classes of Ireland. Undoubtedly, it was the case that funds were devoted by this country for the purposes of elementary education in Ireland; but they were not sufficient, as the House had been informed over and over again. Even the hon. Gentleman who introduced the Bill now before the House had put a Motion on the Paper asking for additional funds to be expended in the cause of Irish elementary education. He justly asked for more money; and it would be seen that there was a great want of additional funds. In spite of all that had been done in the past, it was a fact that half of the people of Ireland could neither read nor write; and in the schools already established the teachers were very inadequately paid. He asserted that it was the duty of the House of Commons, before they provided for any further educational facilities for the upper classes in Ireland, to give more attention to elementary education. The House had recognized that want, and had tried to remedy it by passing a permissive Bill to enable the people of Ireland to rate themselves for the purpose; but that was a remedy of which the Irish people had been very slow to avail themselves, and it had proved a failure. In the few cases in which advantage was taken of the Act to impose rates to pay salaries to teachers, the ratepayers had receded from that system. Both upon positive and upon comparative grounds he submitted the Motion of which he had given Notice, the effect of which was to postpone the Bill, because he was inclined to think that it was a Bill not so innocent in its character as some hon. Gentlemen seemed to suppose. The Bill was not a good Bill, and before it was allowed to proceed further the country should thoroughly understand its character.

Sir George Campbell

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE said, he rose to second the Amendment of his hon. Friend behind him (Sir George Campbell). Before he went any further, let him start by making this admission—that whatever advantages a Bill, in itself good or bad, could obtain from being introduced in a spirit of fairness, justice, and moderation, this Bill had obtained from the introductory statement made by his hon. Friend the Member for Roscommon. Beyond that degree of praise he could not go. He considered that the Bill was a bad one, and that it ought to be rejected. He also confessed to having been rather astonished at hearing that there was any necessity at all for a further extension of University Education in Ireland, because, not long ago, it was his fortune to receive an Irish newspaper with a report of a very eloquent speech made by a priest at a meeting in the South of that country, in the course of which he quoted a lengthy passage from Virgil. At this there was great cheering; and then he added—"I shall not translate to you, because every Irishman knows Latin and Greek from his cradle upwards." Upon that statement there followed loud and long-continued cheering. Well, it struck him (Lord Edmond Fitzmaurice) that a country in which every child was born with a knowledge of Latin and Greek could not, after all, be in such very great want of University Education. On the contrary, he should imagine that any unfortunate Englishman who might be sufficiently rash to enter into competition would find himself at a considerable disadvantage. However, he should not press that argument, nor, speaking seriously, had he used it with the intention of denying that there was a certain Roman Catholic grievance in regard to higher education in Ireland. His object was rather to show that there was a certain grievance, to explain what it consisted in, to point out, if he could, what the proper remedy was, and also to convince the House, which he thought he should be able to do, that the Bill of his hon. Friend the Member for Roscommon provided a cure altogether beyond the evil which he sought to remedy. It would be his earnest endeavour to avoid saying anything which might wound the religious susceptibilities of the tenderest Roman Catholic conscience, because he knew only too well that this and kindred topics had only been already too much hindered in their settlement by theological rancour and sectarian bitterness; and he should be very sorry if any word escaped him which, either in the course of this debate, or upon any future occasion when the subject might be under discussion, was capable of being cast in his teeth as having contributed to fan into fresh life the sparks which still lingered among ashes, destined, he hoped, before long to grow cold. At the same time, he must observe that he did not intend to ask himself whether or not this Bill, or any proposals he might make himself, would satisfy the demands of the Roman Catholic hierarchy of Ireland. He did not believe that that was the proper way to approach the question, or to obtain a settlement of it. He recollected that in one of those memorable speeches in which, early in this century, Mr. Canning urged the removal of Roman Catholic disabilities, he said, in reply to the taunts of those who told him that, even if they were removed, Roman Catholic feeling would not be satisfied, that he did not trouble himself whether it would be satisfied or not, and that he was ready to run the risk of offending the Episcopalian hierarchy on the one side, and the Roman Catholic hierarchy on the other, so long as he felt sure that justice would be done. He recollected, also, that when that very University question was under discussion in the year 1872, his hon. and learned Friend the Member for the City of Oxford (Sir William Harcourt), in the speech which he made upon that occasion, adopted an exactly similar line of three arguments, and the remarks which he then made were still so apposite and germane to the subject that he made no apology for quoting them. His hon. and learned Friend said—

Sir George Campbell

“If they were to govern Ireland according to Irish ideas, he feared they would find themselves reduced to the consequence of not governing Ireland at all. They were left, then, a deplorable option between anarchy, ascendancy, and priestcraft. He was not willing to adopt any one of these three courses. For himself, not being a ‘Home Ruler,’ he had never adopted the idea of governing Ireland according to Irish ideas. The House of Commons had not to consider whether a measure squared with Irish ideas or satisfied the demands of any section of the Irish people, but whether it was consistent with equal justice.”—[3 Hansard, ccxiv. 1618-9.]

That language struck him as just and statesmanlike, and although he could not equal the ability and eloquence of his hon. and learned Friend, he should try to imitate the spirit in which he spoke upon that occasion. Now, in order to realize the true circumstances of the University question in Ireland, it was necessary to state accurately, and realize fully, certain facts. The House would recollect that after the rejection of the Bill of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich (Mr. Gladstone), a Bill was passed at the instance of his hon. Friend the Member then for Brighton, but now for Hackney (Mr. Fawcett), by which every religious test and disability was removed from all endowments in the University of Dublin and Trinity College; but, at the same time, the religious services of the Church of England were allowed to be kept up in the College chapel, and Parliament rejected the Amendment of his hon. Friend the Member for Tynemouth (Mr. T. E. Smith), which would have compelled the Governing Body of Trinity College to make attendance at the service a matter of option to the students. At the same time, the School of Divinity within the College was allowed to subsist unaltered, and that school, he need hardly add, was a school of Anglican theology. Therefore, in regard to the University of Dublin and Trinity College, they had this condition of things—a secularized University, and a College secularized as regarded its endowments, but not secularized as regarded its discipline and internal arrangements, and further allowed to keep up within its walls a school of Anglican theology. There was also in Ireland the Queen’s University, and the Queen’s Colleges connected with it. That University and those Colleges were purely secular. And here let him observe that he thought, if he might be allowed to say so to his Irish Friends, that they had had their case enormously injured for them by the constant denunciations of that University and those Colleges by the Roman Catholic hierarchy as being Protestant institutions. They were not Protestant, and never were. They were set up by Sir Robert Peel, not for the benefit of the Protestants in Ireland, who were perfectly satisfied with the University of Dublin and Trinity College, but for the benefit mainly of the Catholics; and it was only because the Catholics, acting under the orders of their Bishops, who themselves received their orders from Rome, were compelled to refuse to send their children to them, that the Queen’s University and Colleges were chiefly frequented by Protestants of different denominations. It would, at the same time, be a mistake to suppose that there were no Roman Catholics in those institutions. The Reports, on the contrary, of those institutions, showed that their number was increasing, though slowly. At Cork, the Roman Catholics were 50 per cent of the whole number of students. At Galway there was, it was true, a slight falling off last year in the number; but that was owing to an epidemic which, incredible though it might sound, attacked all the students without distinction of creed, affording thereby a great argument in favour of mixed education. He might add that the President of Galway College, in his last Report, stated that since the foundation of Galway College religious differences had never once been the cause of any trouble amongst the pupils. It must also be recollected that by the appointment of Deans of Residence belonging to the different denominations, facilities were given at the Queen’s Colleges for maintaining a religious tone amongst the students; but he believed he was right in stating that the Roman Catholic hierarchy had never allowed the appointment of a Roman Catholic Dean of Residence. Such, then, was the condition of University Education in Ireland. They had two secular Universities, and in one of them they had a College, the discipline and atmosphere of which were Anglican and Episcopalian. Let him now turn to the state of things existing in the English Universities; and it was necessary to do so, because it was frequently stated that there was not only in Ireland a grievance as between the Roman Catholics and the Protestants, but also that that inequality was made doubly conspicuous by reference to the state of things which they had allowed to grow up in English Universities. By the Act passed in 1871 by the Government of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich, all religious tests and disabilities were removed from the endowments of the Universities of Oxford, Cambridge, and Durham; but the services in the College chapels were still allowed to remain part of the discipline of the place, and in most of the Colleges lectures on theology—Anglican theology—were still given. He said nothing here about the University teaching of theology and the University Professors in that school, because, no doubt, if the Church of England were disestablished, the University Schools of Theology would be disestablished too, or would be deprived of their exclusive character. They could not compare the condition of things in Ireland, where the Church was disestablished, with the condition of things in England, where the Church was not disestablished. Therefore, he put aside at present the University Schools of Theology in England as being outside the question, and having made that exception, he thought he should not be misdescribing the condition of things introduced by the Tests Act of 1871 as being closely akin to that existing in the University of Dublin—that was, that while they had secularized the endowments of the Universities and the Colleges within them, they had not secularized the discipline and what he might call the atmosphere of the place, which still remained Anglican and Episcopalian. Some flowers from the unsectarian Eden were scattered among them, but “the trail of the serpent was over them all.” But that was not all. The Tests Act of 1871 did not forbid the establishment of new sectarian Colleges within the Universities. It was true that an Amendment was moved by his hon. and learned Friend the Member for the City of Oxford with that object; but the House refused to entertain the question, and the result was Keble College was established—a College more sectarian than the sectarians, and more Episcopal than the Bench of Bishops. That College, he was informed, was now crowded from roof to basement, while Hertford College, founded originally by the amalgamation of two old endowments which came within the Act of 1871, had received a practically sectarian character by accepting a large private endowment with sectarian conditions attached. He was also informed that a College similar to Keble, called Selwyn College, was shortly going to be established at Cambridge, and was likely to be as much sought after as Keble. Such, then, was the condition of things at the English Universities in regard to foundations made subsequently to the Act of 1871. Every facility was given for the incorporation within the Universities, by charter, of sectarian Colleges. There was only one check, that the charter for 40 days must remain on the Table of that House. Now, he thought the House would at once see that what the Episcopalians of Ireland and of England did possess, and what the Roman Catholics of Ireland did not possess, was the right of having a College or Colleges of their own in which the discipline and atmosphere of the place should be that of their own religion, and in which the teaching of theology of their own school of thought should be taught by lecturers enjoying the confidence of their own communion. Here he might mention that he was fully aware that he might be told that the School of Theology at Dublin was a University school and not a College school. Now, that simply arose from the great difficulty of distinguishing between the University of Dublin and Trinity College. Personally, he believed that the School of Theology at Dublin was quite as much, if not more, a Collegiate than a University school; but, be that as it might, his argument was not affected thereby, because he approved that portion of the abortive Bill of 1872 which clearly separated in law the University from the College, and he thought it would be desirable that in any legislation upon the question the School of Theology should be clearly separated from the University and attached to the College, and to the College only. He recurred, then, to his original proposition, that there was equality as regarded University Education between Protestant and Catholic, but not as regarded Collegiate education. Now, perhaps he should be told that there was an easy and simple way of settling all these difficulties by prohibiting the religious services, and putting an abrupt end to the religious lectures and teaching which he had mentioned. His reply to any such proposition was that it was impossible. As an old member of the Birmingham League, he was in no manner ashamed of saying that nobody in that House had contended more firmly than he had for the absolute separation of secular and religious teaching; but there was a time and a place for everything, and, as a practical man, he knew that these questions were fought, and settled for a considerable period, between 1870 and 1873, although, no doubt, some day they would be re-opened, there being no such thing as finality. But, because at some future time, and at some remote date, they hoped to push their own principles further, were they in the interval to inflict a grave injustice and inequality on the Roman Catholics of Ireland? He thought not. That being so, there was only one other alternative, which was to give to the Roman Catholics of Ireland the same Collegiate privileges which they had given to the English and Irish Episcopalians. He might be told that he was advocating the scheme of the late Mr. Butt. He acknowledged it; but there was this difference between his view and Mr. Butt's—that he proposed that there should be a State endowment given to the Catholic College, whereas he (Lord Edmond Fitzmaurice) did not; and Mr. Butt further proposed that that endowment should be got by appropriating a considerable portion of the revenues of Trinity College. Now, he protested against the disendowment of any corporation, unless they could prove abuse and misapplication of funds; and nobody, English or Irish, Catholic or Protestant, had ever suggested such a thing in regard to Trinity College, Dublin; on the contrary, that institution was one which was always spoken of with respect and admiration by persons of every shade of opinion, whether religious or political. He was aware that some wits connected with the College at Cambridge which bore the same name thought fit in times past to sneer at their "silent sister;" but he believed that wit was never more misapplied, as that so-called "silent sister," in every department of science, art, and literature, had ever held, and still held, a proud and conspicuous position. What, then, he proposed was that one or more of the existing Roman Catholic Colleges in Ireland should be incorporated either in the University of Dublin or in the Queen's University. The latter course would, he thought, raise fewer difficulties. As to what College should be selected, the old charter of the University of London, with its list of affiliated Colleges, would afford a guide. He believed it would be found upon inquiry that Carlow College would be able to prove a better claim than any of its possible competitors. Its head, Dr. Kavanagh, was a man of undoubted ability and learning, and he believed that former Examiners of the London University would be found ready to state that students from that College had always come up well and carefully prepared. Then there was the College of St. Patrick on Stephen's Green, an institution endeared to Catholics by its association with the struggles connected with that question. He confessed to having never himself heard very favourable accounts of the teaching in that College; but he was willing to bow to the high authority of his right hon. Friend the Member for the University of Edinburgh (Mr. Lyon Playfair), who, he knew, had expressed a strong opinion in the contrary direction. Therefore, he proposed that Carlow College and St. Patrick's should be incorporated within the Queen's University. But he might be told that this was not enough, and that those two Colleges would not be able to hold the youth of Ireland, who would flock in to obtain a Collegiate education. Well, his mind was quite open on the question, because he shared the opinions, based on Scotch experience, of his right hon. Friend, that University Education was not merely a luxury of the upper classes; but he believed in any case, at starting, the incorporation of two Colleges would be enough. But that was not all. He would propose that a general examining power should be conferred upon the Queen's University, similar to that possessed by the London University in its supplemental charter. He had always considered that the loss of that privilege, through the discovery of a technical error in the supplemental charter actually granted in 1866, was an immense misfortune. He wanted to say a word about that supplemental charter. It had been constantly and falsely represented that the object of those who advised Her Majesty to grant the supplemental charter was surreptitiously, and by a side wind, to introduce the Catholic College into the Queen's University; and he confessed to having believed that himself at one time. But it was an utter mistake, as was pointed out by Sir Dominic Corrigan in 1872, who spoke with much authority on the question, being Vice Chancellor of the University. He said the supplemental charter was not passed to admit the students of the Roman Catholic University, but was passed to admit, on the same system as the London University, all candidates on undergoing certain examinations; but the Rolls' Court, in deciding against the supplemental charter, merely decided on a legal point—that was, “that the Senate of the University should not accept the charter without the joint assent of Convocation.” That was a very important point. What were the words of the abortive Charter? They were these—

“We do will, ordain, constitute, and declare that the said University, created by our said Charter, shall have power to grant to any person who may have matriculated in the said University, and who may be deemed qualified by the Senate of the said Queen's University in Ireland, to obtain the same, all such or any of the degrees or distinctions which by our said Charter the said Queen's University in Ireland is empowered to grant, notwithstanding that such persons may not have matriculated in any of the said Colleges, or pursued any of their studies therein.”

Then followed a similar clause, enabling any person to matriculate, although not educated in any of the Queen's Colleges. Now, the reason why the decision of the Rolls' Court was so disastrous was that if the University had been thrown open it would have been possible to endow the University with a variety of prizes and emoluments which could have been competed for upon equal terms by the whole youth of Ireland, whether educated in the Queen's Colleges or not. These, then, were his recommendations to meet the Roman Catholic grievance in Ireland—namely, one or more Catholic Colleges in the Queen's University, and an amendment of the Charter of the University in the direction which he had indicated. And now let him turn to the Bill. Did it do any of these things? Not one. What was the first thing he found in the present Bill? Why, it proposed to establish a new University; and he absolutely denied there was the least necessity for that. It was to be a new secular University apparently, established in a country where there were already two existing secular Universities. Let him ask why this new University was to be established? It appeared it was to be a kind of conduit-pipe or filter through which the interest of £1,500,000 of public money was to be distributed amongst a large number of sectarian tea-cups. Great political pressure and chicanery would be brought to bear upon the Senate, and there would be a scramble for the money. If this matter was to be dealt with on the basis of endowments, and of setting up a purely Roman Catholic University, let them discuss the question on its merits. Do not let them have an ingenious scheme to filter away a large sum of money into denominational cups and saucers. It was a great mistake to introduce a Bill of this kind, because, if it did please the Roman Catholic hierarchy, it would only be because they thought that before many years were gone by they would be able to do with the Bill what they liked. The Senate of this University was to have a practically unlimited power of affiliating Colleges. Now, there was no part of the Bill of 1872 which was more attacked than the proposal of affiliating Colleges. It was attacked by nobody more vehemently than by his hon. and learned Friend the Member for the City of Oxford. In his speech he proposed a plan by which that part of the Bill could be got rid of in Committee. After describing it, he said—

Lord Edmond Fitzmaurice

“In this way, they would get rid of the whole vexed question of affiliated Colleges, and of the denominational and undenominational prejudices against the Bill.”—[3 Hansard, ccxiv. 1630.]

Sir Dominic Corrigan gave the experience both of the London University and of the Queen's University against the plan. What he (Lord Edmond Fitzmaurice) insisted upon was that whatever was done

Parliament should know clearly and distinctly what the Colleges were which it was proposed to benefit. He objected altogether that £1,500,000 of public money should be scrambled for by unknown recipients. He did not wish to dwell too much upon details at that stage; but the House ought to observe that the clauses of this Bill were so drawn that such enormous benefits were proposed to be conferred upon these Colleges that no student would think of entering the University except through their doors; while a direct pecuniary bribe was offered to the youth of Ireland to abandon the old Universities and enter the new. Then he objected to the constitution of the Senate, which was mainly a nominated body, and would, he believed, become the creature of political intrigue and chicanery. That was another bad feature borrowed from the Bill of 1872. Now, as regarded endowment, he wanted to know what claim the Roman Catholic Colleges had to an endowment? Keble, and Hertford, and Selwyn, had not asked for a State endowment. Why did they not? Speaking of the question of endowments reminded him of what was proposed to be done by Her Majesty in Council with respect to a Northern University. They all knew that a few days ago a very large and influential deputation was received by the noble Duke the President of the Council (the Duke of Richmond and Gordon), and the noble Marquess the Secretary for Foreign Affairs (the Marquess of Salisbury), who was also Chancellor of the University of Oxford, and it was urged upon the noble Duke and the noble Marquess that it was necessary to establish in the North of England a new University. Had he had the honour of belonging to the North of England he would have been exceedingly proud to have joined that deputation. The object in view was a most excellent and admirable object, and he desired to call the attention of hon. Gentlemen below the Gangway to the proposal in regard to the Colleges which was made by that influential deputation. Did that deputation propose that a sum of money should be given to Queen's College, which was the one College to be mentioned in the proposed charter? The gentlemen who composed that deputation did not propose that Queen's College, or any other College which might come within the University as an affiliated body, should receive a handful of money out of the public funds; but they stated that they were prepared to endow the institution themselves. The gentlemen who composed the deputation of the other day did not ask for £1,500,000 of public money—all they asked for were for certain University and College privileges. Turn to a similar scene—turn to his own University. The University of Cambridge had gained of late honourable distinctions by attempting to extend the benefits of University Education outside its own limits by conducting examinations, and now by affiliating Colleges, and he had heard that a scheme for that purpose had been drawn up by the Syndicate, with the sanction of the greatest names of the University, which passed the Senate last week, and which was as certain to be acted upon as was any measure which might receive the sanction of the House in the course of the present Session. Was it proposed to give a sum of money out of the University funds to affiliated Colleges? All that was proposed was to confer upon any College or institution in the United Kingdom which chose to place itself in connection with the University of Cambridge certain facilities in regard to degrees, and a diminution in the number of terms of residence. From first to last in the case to which he was alluding there was not one single word about getting hold of University funds, still less of getting a pull at funds which were under the control of the State, or which were raised from the taxation of the country. They might plead their poverty; but Roman Catholicism was not a local or national religion peculiar to Ireland. Were they not constantly being told in home and foreign newspapers of the numerous and wealthy converts who were flocking over to the Church of Rome? Why, there were half-a-dozen Roman Catholic noblemen who, if they would meet together to-morrow, would find it just as easy to endow a Roman Catholic College as the merchant princes of the North to endow the great institutions which were rising under their patronage. They might invite that generous Protestant Peer, Lord Portarlington, to join them. Such a course, every one was better and wiser than sending to Parliament, in formal pauperism, for £1,500,000 of public money only to be taken from various departments

tion. He recollected, during the debates of 1873, that his noble Friend the Leader of the Opposition, who, being at that time Chief Secretary for Ireland, had a responsibility in this matter second only to that of the Prime Minister, speaking on this part of the question, said—

"The Protestants of Ireland used the mixed Colleges, but the Roman Catholics, for whom they were designed, had seen fit to disapprove them; that, however, was no reason why they should not do what all others were free to do—establish their own Colleges and voluntarily endow them. . . . Would anyone get up and say that the Roman Catholics of Ireland were not prepared, or were not able, to endow Colleges for themselves? He believed they were fully able, and that if once they could remove from their minds that fatal delusion which appeared to have taken possession of them, that sooner or later they would obtain a Parliamentary endowment, they would endow a Roman Catholic College for themselves."—[3 Hansard, ccxiv. 1266-8.]

He (Lord Edmond Fitzmaurice) believed that those words of the noble Marquess expressed the sound common sense of this question—that, in regard to matters of discipline, they should allow the Roman Catholics every single privilege which had been given to Protestant Episcopalianism, whether in England or in Ireland; but that, as regarded endowments, they should stand firmly upon those lines which had been adopted by the House of Commons—namely, that there should be no new endowments of any sectarian institution. They were told the other day by the noble Lord the Member for Waterford County (Lord Charles Beresford) that he was in favour of the endowment of a Roman Catholic University. He hoped that the noble Lord would be consistent, and that when the Navy Estimates were under consideration he would explain the lines upon which Roman Catholic iron-clads and Protestant turret-ships should be built. He (Lord Edmond Fitzmaurice) believed that the one would not be more ridiculous or baneful than the other, so far as State endowment was concerned. This was a question in which he had taken a great interest. He had been always anxious to meet the just demands of the Irish Roman Catholics. There was one member of his family, of whom he preserved a recollection from his childhood, who had passed the best years of his life out of office because those who occupied the Throne in his country would not admit to their Councils any person who was in favour of the removal of the tests under which Roman Catholics suffered. He had been brought up to venerate his name; but he had not been brought up to wish to substitute one religious equality for another. He desired to do that which was just and right to the Catholics of Ireland, without doing that which would be unjust to the Protestants of the United Kingdom. He believed that to pass this Bill would be to do that which would prove injurious to those higher interests of education which rose above every sectarian difference, and which, he believed, would be absolutely ruined by any looking back upon the evil past, and by any renewal of that principle of religious endowment, whether concurrent or not, which would prove hurtful, not only to the State which gave it, but even to the religious denomination which it was intended to benefit.

Lord Edmond Fitzmaurice

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "while this House recognises that the funds set free by the disestablishment of the Irish Church should be devoted to the benefit of the people of Ireland, provided they are not again applied to the support of any sectarian religion, it is not desirable to devote additional public funds to the further promotion of higher education in Ireland till adequate provision is first made for elementary teaching in that Country without aid from Imperial funds exceeding that given to other parts of the United Kingdom,"—(Sir George Campbell),

—instead thereof.

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

MR. KAVANAGH: Sir, I shall begin the few remarks I intend to make on the subject by congratulating the House, and thanking the noble Lord the Member for Calne (Lord Edmond Fitzmaurice) on the good humour which characterized the remarks he made. I look upon it as an auspicious omen, and hope it will continue. I am sorry I am quite unable to follow the noble Lord in the very exhaustive and able speech which he made; but, perhaps, it is fortunate for the fate of the Bill that I do not know as much about the subject as the noble Lord, because another speech of the length would, perhaps, endanger the ultimate result on a Wednesday. To me the question is a very serious one—a serious one for the whole country. The position I occupy is, perhaps, rather a delicate one, and I think it is only right to myself and to my constituents that I should say a few words as to my reason for occupying it. I do not think we owe the House any apology for bringing the measure on, because we all know that during the last 20 years every Government in Office, if it has not itself undertaken to deal with the question, has, at least, admitted the necessity that something should be done. With regard to the reason which has influenced us in adopting the course we have, of suggesting a third University instead of keeping to the two already in existence, that has already been fully explained by my hon. Friend the Member for Roscommon in his introductory speech; and I should not have thought it necessary to touch upon it, were it not for the fact that both the noble Lord the Member for Calne, and the hon. Baronet the Member for Kirkcaldy (Sir George Campbell), in their remarks raised the question. Now, Sir, it appears to me, not knowing very much about University Education, that to deal with the question as in connection with the two existing institutions, we should have to go into an immense deal of matter of most invidious difficulty. Those who have tried to draw the line in educational subjects between science, history, and religion, to define where the one should stop and the other begin, to sketch a history of nations uncoloured by religion, or to devise a system for teaching the physical and higher branches of science, robbed of the supernatural, and dragged down to the level of the rationalist, will appreciate the difficulties to which I have referred. Those pitfalls and dangers have been avoided by the lines on which the present Bill is laid. Anybody who listened to the debate which took place on the introduction of the University Bill of 1873, and, I may say, to all the debates on the English Education Question, will agree with me that, if it was possible, we were right in endeavouring to avoid those dangers and those quicksands. But, although by the lines on which this Bill was brought we have succeeded in avoiding that, we have at least other difficulties to meet, and the difficulties are not only from objections raised by those upon principle opposed to a settlement altogether, but, I may say, they have been more raised by those who are, most of them, interested in the settlement of it, and who must largely benefit if this scheme which we propose were adopted. It is always perfectly clear that unless each party is prepared to approach the subject in a spirit of compromise, a settlement is utterly hopeless. I shall endeavour to deal with the objections to which I have referred, and I will take first those I have referred to last. To my mind, the main difficulty of dealing with this question has been created by the policy of disendowment which this House endorsed by a large majority in 1869, and which hon. Gentlemen will remember was warmly supported and advocated by the Roman Catholic clergy, and by members of that persuasion in Ireland. Now, Sir, that policy I disapproved of and resisted to the best of my power; but I do not attempt or wish for one moment to subvert what can be done, and, consequently, this difficulty is placed in my own, and in the way of others who wish to deal with this question. I can see no other course open. We are driven to adopt the lines of the Intermediate Education Bill. I am happy to say, from the immense success which it has met with since, I was in hopes that a Bill honestly framed on those lines, so far as they could be adopted, would be generally accepted as a compromise by the Roman Catholic clergy of Ireland. I was given directly to understand that that would be so, and looked upon the fact that the hon. Member for Roscommon (the O'Connor Don) had taken up the question and brought in a Bill on those lines as a proof that it had been approved of by hierarchy of the Irish Roman Catholic Church, and would be accepted by them as a settlement of the question. I hope I am still correct in that assumption. But, whether I am or not, I think it is very unfortunate that rumours have got abroad—and I am not accountable for that—to the effect that if the Bill is accepted by the Roman Catholic clergy it is only as an instalment, and an instalment to be followed by a fresh appeal. If that is so, our position is a very difficult one; and I must say that our chances of success, based upon that, would be very slight, and I think that the hon. Members opposite, and the clergy of the Catholic Church should remember that the main difficulty, as I said before, is one of their own creation. If the way to deal with this question is the adoption of a spirit of compromise, I hope, before the debate on the second reading closes, that we shall have some authoritative announcement on the subject, which will remove this difficulty, and assure the House that if this Bill pass it will be accepted in the same spirit in which it is offered. The Bill, as we see by Amendments on the Paper, is already attacked by many, as being equivalent to a direct endowment of a Roman Catholic University. That I distinctly deny. I say that it has in its clauses, Preamble, and Schedules, not one single word which I can see gives to the Bill a sectarian hue. Throughout the entire Bill there is no mention made of any one religious denomination, so far as I can see; but while I say this, I do not deny for one moment that there are circumstances existing in Ireland in regard to University Education which give this Bill a significance in that direction, and that it has for its object the establishment of a Roman Catholic University. I do not deny that for one moment, and the circumstances are these. If I understand it aright, every denomination in Ireland has facilities and opportunities of availing itself of the advantages of University Education without a sacrifice of any scruples except the Roman Catholics; and I think it is only natural to expect that if you pass a measure for the advantages of a University system which will do equality to all—which I believe this does—and if you have the existing institutions, it is, I say, only natural to expect that the Catholics who are shut out from those advantages will largely avail themselves of them. But it is only in that sense that it can be regarded as a Roman Catholic University; and I have no hesitation in declaring openly and frankly at once that my object and intentions in joining in this undertaking is to afford to my Roman Catholic fellow-countrymen those advantages which they desire, and which I do not think they now possess. The noble Lord the Member for Calne (Lord Edmond Fitzmaurice) might call me a Protestant Jesuit for this I know very well; and I daresay I shall be told that my premisses are false and wrong, and that the Dublin University, as it has been extended by the Bill of the hon. Member for Hackney (Mr. Fawcett), and the Queen's University, regulated as it is, give ample facilities to all denominations to avail themselves of University Education without any necessary sacrifice of religious principles—and I am sure that those who say so believe it. But I am not going to enter into the theological disquisition which such a point would raise. I take my stand upon what appears to me to be a plain and undeniable fact, that at present the Roman Catholics avail themselves of neither the University nor the Colleges, and that if they are, practically, to remain excluded from the advantages of the University system, we must devise some plan to include them. And it is not that I cannot see a better plan, but it is that I cannot see any other plan, that leads me to endorse and support this Bill. I deny emphatically, as I have already said, that the Bill is literally an endowment of a Roman Catholic University, and, in support of my denial, I may say that since its introduction I was told by a clergyman of high standing in my own Church that its effects would be detrimental to the interests of the University of Dublin, by withdrawing from it Methodist and Presbyterian students who now avail themselves of its advantages. Now, I should be sorry to do anything detrimental to the Dublin University; but I may say that you cannot condemn the Bill upon two actual diverse issues at the same time. If it is, as it is objected, a Roman Catholic University Bill, then I do not see how its effect will be to withdraw Methodists and Presbyterians from the Dublin University. I may, therefore, I think, leave those objections to answer each other; and I can only repeat again, that while the provisions of the Bill are equally open to all who may require them, it is only natural to expect that Catholics will most largely avail themselves of its benefits, just because they are the class who want it most. Of course, I cannot for one moment hope that this—or, indeed, any Bill that could be introduced—would meet the approval of what I may call the extreme section of what, I think, the hon. Member for Kircaldy (Sir George Campbell) called Scotch prejudices, represented by some hon. Members opposite; but I cannot for myself admit that there is a single principle or word in the Bill to warrant the

Mr. Kavanagh

Motion of which the hon. Member for Edinburgh (Mr. M'Laren) has given Notice. I think that, far from his Amendment applying with any justice to this case, it rather seems to indicate on the part of those who hold such opinions, or give support to such an Amendment, that they have not the capacity for truly appreciating what true civil and religious equality means. I do not wish to follow that subject further. It is sufficiently clear, and requires little advocacy on my part to make it plain. I will come to another objection expressed in the second part of the Amendment of the hon. Member for Edinburgh. He objects to the application of part of the surplus funds of the Disestablished Church, as being contrary to the principle of the Irish Church Disestablishment Act of 1869. But I think the hon. Member, when he put his Notice on the Paper, must have forgotten that last Session this House, by passing the Intermediate Education Act, practically broke through the principle which was created in the Preamble of the Act of 1869, and sanctioned and approved the application of these funds to purposes of education. Therefore, I hardly think it is quite possible for him to rely much on this part of his objection. Another ground of opposition has been raised by a class who never succeed in making themselves much heard, and that is, that it is wrong to take these surplus funds while there are vested interests now neglected, but having claims upon these funds. I am fully prepared to admit the justice of this; but I can by no means regard it as an insuperable or great difficulty in the way, or anything that could not be very easily dealt with. I believe it is true—the House will excuse me for alluding briefly to these claims—I believe it is perfectly true that there is now in the hands of the Church Temporalities Commissioners an amount of £400,000 not properly belonging to the Irish Church, but which was raised by the taxation of the clergy in past years. If I am rightly informed, this sum does not belong to the Church of Ireland, but to a limited number of minor incumbents and curates, whose just claims can be clearly established. I have no wish or intention now to enter into the merits of that question. But, allowing it, these and any other claims can be dealt with by Parliament. Each claim, according to its merits, can be dismissed if not recognized, and attended to if well founded. But, after allowing these claims to be disposed of, I cannot see a more beneficial object for part of the surplus to be devoted to than the furtherance of the three classes of education—elementary, intermediate, and University. We had a beginning last Session. Government began in the right direction, though rather oddly, taking up the middle first; and in our Bill we propose a plan for dealing with the higher end; and I do not see any reason why, if it succeeds, the lower end, or the primary education branch, should not then be settled on similar lines, adapted as far as possible to the requirements of the case; and that might perhaps dispose of the objection of the hon. Baronet the Member for Kirkcaldy (Sir George Campbell). There is another objection raised, to which I am bound to refer, though there are but few who held it lately, for, I suppose, I must be looked upon as a black sheep. I have been blessed by receiving anonymous letters, the writers of which bring arguments against our present actions such as these—It is wrong to afford the means of disseminating error. Now, that is a very high ground to take, indeed, and a ground the abstract truth and justice of which very few will be prepared to assail. I will not take time to controvert it, or, condemning the tenets of one Church, defend the tenets of another. So far as that is involved in the question now before us, I will take the broad and indisputable ground that we are all Christians. Assuming that, then, I would ask who amongst us is qualified to pronounce his brother in error? We are told, "Judge not, that ye be not judged," and I cannot read this as in any way binding us to force down the throats of others our conceptions of what is right. If I may carry that argument further, we may be wrong to refuse to those with whom we disagree the advantages of higher education. Of course, the letters I received were all bent on this point. I think the policy of proselytizing is too monstrous to be thought of. Throughout all history it has proved so disastrous that it is no use occupying the time of the House in dwelling on it. I respect the man who, conscientiously and fearlessly holding his belief, adheres to it; but I have no sympathy with a narrow-minded bigotry that would force that belief on others. These are the reasons that have influenced me in taking the course I have done; and I must say I am most anxious to have the question settled, while I think the present Bill is the most reasonable way a settlement can be arrived at. I therefore hope it will be passed, and be accepted by my fellow-countrymen in Ireland in the same spirit as it is offered to them. The hon. Member for Edinburgh, in another part of his Amendment, blames us for endeavouring to hurry on the measure with indecent haste, or he implies as much. As to this, the hon. Member must know, with his long experience, what every hon. Member must know, that days and opportunities are not within the choice of private Members. They must take what they can get, or go with nothing. For myself, I have not the slightest wish to rush the Bill through the House like a dark horse. I am not ashamed of it. I do not fear, and have no wish to avoid, danger from the most ample discussion. I shall only be too glad if the Bill meets with the patient consideration its importance requires; and if it does, I am sure it will, at the hands of the House, receive the fate it deserves. I need not say what I hope that may be. In asking the House to read this Bill a second time, we ask it to affirm the principle—which is, I believe, the true principle—of religious equality; and if the Bill goes further than that, or fails to carry that out, amend it. But I do hope the House will not refuse a principle which, I believe, is founded on justice and fair play.

MR. M'LAREN, who had the following Amendment upon the Paper:—

"That the leading provisions of the Bill are unjust and impolitic, being opposed to the principles of civil and religious equality by proposing to endow mainly the members of one Church and their Colleges, with a million and a-half of public money, which has already been appropriated by the Irish Church Disestablishment Act, for the equal benefit of all classes of Her Majesty's subjects, by enacting that the surplus funds of the Church shall be applied 'mainly to the relief of unavoidable suffering and calamity,' and that, 'in the manner in which Parliament shall hereafter direct;' and that, in addition to these considerations, a Bill of such importance, and involving such novel principles of legislation, should not be proceeded with until ample time has been given to the public for its proper consideration;"

Mr. Kavanagh

said, he was aware that the Forms of the House would not admit of any Amendment being put, unless the hon. Baronet (Sir George Campbell) should withdraw his, in which case some hon. Member might afterwards propose the Amendment, of which he (Mr. M'Laren) had given Notice; but as his hon. Friend, in drawing a distinction between the Amendments, spoke of his (Mr. M'Laren's) as being the more extreme and violent, he thought he might be allowed to suggest another definition of the difference. His was intelligible—"he who runs may read"—while he had heard many hon. Members say of his hon. Friend's Amendment that they did not understand what it meant; and, certainly, he was in that position, and thought that, in place of an obscure Amendment, a plain one should be substituted. He understood that the hon. Member for Roscommon (the O'Connor Don) was very much concerned about the large endowments which the Scotch Universities got for religious purposes, especially as they were largely devoted to Presbyterian students, and under the management of ecclesiastical functionaries. With respect to that, he wished, before proceeding, to sweep away such an impression, and to assure the hon. Gentleman the Member for Roscommon that it was entirely wrong. The whole of the grants to the Universities of Scotland—he had taken the trouble to search for the figures since the hon. Gentleman had made his speech—were £16,000 for the Professors of four Universities having 5,000 students.

THE O'CONOR DON said, the hon. Member was not in the House when he was speaking, and had misunderstood what he said of Scotch endowments.

MR. M'LAREN said, it was quite true he was not in the House, having been sent for; but two hon. Members had told him the import of his remarks. But whatever the hon. Member did or did not state, the House might be interested to know that, so far from the Edinburgh University being under ecclesiastical influence, out of 39 Professors, only four were what he might call Church Professorships, and none of those four had churches, parishes, or the cure of souls. With regard to ecclesiastical management, there were seven Curators appointed and elected in various ways;

not one was, or ever had been, a minister of any church, and three of them were Episcopalians. Among the 39 Professors £6,604 was distributed; and if his hon. Friend would move a Resolution in this House that the House was of opinion that all payment for ecclesiastical teaching should be discontinued in Scotland and Ireland, he (Mr. M'Laren) should be most happy to second his Motion with all his heart. Along with the grants to Maynooth—commuted since the Disestablishment at 14 years' purchase—and the commuted Regium Donum, he should be delighted to see these and all other Irish and Scotch ecclesiastical endowments swept away. Just one remark he should like to make in passing upon what was said by the hon. Member for Carlow (Mr. Kavanagh). In commenting on his (Mr. M'Laren's) proposal, the hon. Member objected to that part of it which condemned the application for the purposes of the Bill of the fund specially devoted to meet suffering and calamity by the Act of 1869. The hon. Member seemed to assume that because Parliament had done wrong in regard to a previous measure, dealing with intermediate education, that was complete absolution for every wrong which might be committed upon the fund in after years. He (Mr. M'Laren) took leave to differ from that view. If the House did wrong in appropriating £1,000,000 destined for the suffering poor of Ireland by the Act for the Disendowment of the Church, he saw in that no reason for taking another £1,500,000 from the poor and suffering classes and giving it to the rich and middle classes for the endowment of Colleges and Universities, that their sons might attend them almost free of expense. He thought the very opposite should be the case; and he would apply the common remark of police magistrates in dismissing the offender for the first time—"Go, sir, now; but remember you are not to do the like again." With these preliminary observations, he (Mr. M'Laren) would refer to the Bill, condensing his remarks, inasmuch as he could not formally move his Amendment. One remark he must make as to the constitution of the Senate. The Senate was to consist of 24 members, and he had no doubt that, as nominated at first, a fair proportion of Protestants and Catholics would be declared under the terms of the Bill;

but, possibly, Roman Catholics would secure more than half the representation. A considerable number of the Senate would be grandees who would never attend. A number would be in this country attending Parliament and others Irish Judges. There was a significant clause, that the graduates of this University might, in certain cases arising, elect six members out of these 24. Then another significant clause said that six should be a quorum. He apprehended that when the six were elected by the graduates of this University, they would naturally and very properly be members of the Roman Catholic body. Those six men, in order to give satisfaction to their constituents, would be constant in their attendance, and, practically, would have the whole management of the funds and of the arrangements of this University in their own hands. There was something very peculiar about the Colleges. This University body which he had described had the sole power of deciding whether a College should be affiliated to the University or not. If the College was one which they did not agree to affiliate, that College could never get a share of the benefits arising from this University grant. It had been stated by a powerful organ of public opinion that there were two non-Catholic Colleges to be considered as being admissible—the one Presbyterian, and the other Wesleyan. He would ask first, would they desire to be admitted into this University; and next, would they be admitted, even if they desired it? On the first point, he was by no means clear that they would desire it. He had some information that they would not; but that remained to be proved. The definition of Colleges to be admitted was somewhat strange. A College to be affiliated was described to be an institution with not fewer than 20 students, either in the College or in a boarding-house. That was a very strange kind of College to be affiliated—20 students living in a boarding-house. It seemed to him that it would be a very good speculation for anyone to get 20 pupils into his boarding-house and bring them up for examination, and get the large result fees and the salaries authorized by the Bill. Certainly it was an odd idea for Colleges of that kind to be affiliated to a University. If a young man chose to live with his father and go to the University for examination, he would not be admitted. He must live in, and come from, one of these Colleges. Then, again, the definitions excluded the students of the Queen's Colleges, and any person having any endowment from a University. Hon. Members were aware, from the Reports published the other day, that in Queen's College, Galway, there were no fewer than 73 Roman Catholic students. Why were they to be excluded? If they had even attended one of these Colleges during the previous year, that would, by the Bill, be sufficient to exclude them. He ventured to think that that was unjust. Another thing was that the students must be educated in Colleges in Ireland. This excluded all students educated in England and Scotland who might choose to go to Ireland to be examined, and to compete for prizes. He remembered hearing some years ago a report, which afterwards turned out to be false, that a manufacturer in the North of England put up a notice on his gate—"No Irish need apply." This Bill had a notice put on the gate of the University that no English, Scotch, or foreigners need apply there. It was to be a close University for the benefit of certain persons described in the clauses. Was there any University in the world where there was such an exclusion? He greatly doubted it. Members of his own family had been partly educated at the Universities of Paris, Heidelberg, and Bonn; and, so far as he had heard, they were received with open arms by the French and Germans, just the same as if they were native subjects; but if French or Germans came to be examined at this University, they would be told "that it was exclusively for Ireland." ["No, no!"] He would refer hon. Members to the words of the clause. On page 6, Clause 23, it stated that the Colleges must be "in Ireland," and that all students—

"Shall for at least six months be resident in one of these Colleges before they can come up for examination."

Now, students educated in Dublin, or anywhere else in Ireland, might go to a University on the Continent to pursue their studies and to be examined. By the Bill all students must come up for their first examinations in the Arts classes; and when they became professional men, as lawyers, doctors, or engineers, they must be examined in their respective branches. Here he would like to state, to prevent misapprehension, that reference was made by the hon. Member for Carlow (Mr. Kavanagh) to the strong Scotch feeling against this Bill. He did not exactly know what was meant by Scotch feeling; but he knew what his own opinions were, and he begged leave to say that he had no anti-Irish feeling of any kind. The first vote he gave in that House, 14 years ago, was on a Coercion Bill for Ireland, 354 for it and 6 against it; and he had the honour of being one of the six who voted on the occasion. The last vote he gave was on that day week on the Irish Land Bill. He had very great difficulty in voting for it, because he thought some of the clauses were unjust to the landlord; but, because it was an Irish Bill, and it was urged that it would be for the benefit of Ireland, he stretched a point and voted for it. If the Bill had been for Scotland or England, he would not have done so. He had no feeling against the Irish or against the Roman Catholics; and he would like to discuss this Bill as if it were connected with the Synod of Ulster, or any other Presbyterian body, apart altogether from any anti-Catholic feeling. Another point of great importance from a pecuniary point of view was the large power of expenditure. There was power to provide museums for these Colleges, laboratories, and libraries, and to provide for their future maintenance. Anybody who knew anything about the expense of a laboratory, as his right hon. Friend the Member for Edinburgh University (Mr. Lyon Playfair) did, would see the enormous expenditure which might in this way be incurred. Anybody who did not know would be staggered at the amount—an amount which, he believed, the framers of this Bill had not calculated upon. Another power in the Bill to which he very strongly objected was the salaries to be given to the lecturers in these Colleges and boarding-houses. While the Treasury was to have control over the salaries given to examiners in the University, the Governing Body might give lecturers any salaries they thought fit in any Colleges they might be pleased to affiliate, without any check on the part of the Treasury. This was a power which he would not willingly trust to any such body. These lecturers, no doubt, were to be paid only for teaching subjects that were not considered religious subjects. Suppose a lecturer had to teach mathematics, or natural philosophy, or any other branch for the degree of Arts, there was nothing to hinder him, at a different hour, from teaching a religious class; and if he got a good salary as a lecturer for teaching secular branches, he might well lecture on and teach religious subjects for a small additional sum. The Governing Body, in selecting the Colleges to be affiliated to the University, and in the other matters which he had mentioned, would have an amount of power and influence which he thought no such body ought to possess. With regard to the Colleges or boarding-houses with 20 students, they were not called upon to send up their students to be examined until they knew them to be ready to be examined and likely to pass. They would get to know what the nature of the examination would be, and they would be advised not to go up unprepared, lest they should be plucked. Was not that a common sense rule. Therefore, when 20 students would be sent up from a College or boarding-house, it ought to be taken for granted that nearly all of them would pass. This did not apply merely to Art students; all the medical and law students and engineering students must also undergo this first examination in Arts. If the 20 students passed, what was the result? Why, the College or boarding-house would get a grant of £400 for the first year, in addition to the salaries of the lecturers, and to all the appliances in the College, for teaching of the young men. It was very difficult to analyze the result of this state of things unless by way of comparison. He would make a comparison, to show how it would work in regard to existing institutions, and would for that purpose take the University of the City of Edinburgh. It had now nearly 3,000 students, including summer classes. Suppose that only 2,000 were qualified to pass their first examination, what would be the result? The University, it must be remembered, was not merely an examining body. It was a teaching body, and, after the teaching, there followed the examination. If those 2,000 out of 3,000 passed, the result would be that the teaching body would receive £40,000 for the 2,000 students at £20 each. Now, was not this monstrous? Did the House contemplate such an expenditure? No doubt, it would be said—and fairly said—that it would be a long time before the proposed University had 2,000 students. Not only were they to get their education practically free, but large bribes were, in this way, to be offered them to come up. But if a University should be established, the sooner it was in a thriving position the better; but the House had a right to inquire what would be the result when that thriving position was attained. Edinburgh was only one of four Universities in Scotland; and as the Roman Catholic population of Ireland was said to be greater than the whole population of Scotland, it was by no means an extravagant supposition to conclude that there would be a large number of Roman Catholic students. The hon. Member for Roscommon (the O'Connor Don) was concerned about the fact that a great proportion of the students in the Universities of Scotland were Presbyterians. He would just refer to one class of students to show how incorrect such an idea was. There were about 1,100 medical students attending Edinburgh University. He was very sorry he had not with him a list which he had at home of their whereabouts—whence they came; but he could tell with sufficient accuracy for the present purpose that about one-third belonged to Edinburgh and the other towns and counties of Scotland; about one-third belonged to England, and about one-third belonged to the Colonies, America, the Continent, and to Ireland. He believed there were about 30 from Ireland. The impression that these students must necessarily be Presbyterian, or in any way under Presbyterian control, must, therefore, be a mistaken one. The medical students, under this Bill, were to undergo four examinations. For the first they were to earn £20, for the second £25, for the third £30, and for the fourth £35. Placing this in comparison with his own University, suppose that 500 medical students were able to pass these four examinations—for the first, the University would get £10,000 in a lump; for the second, £12,500; in the third year, £15,000; and in the fourth year they would get £17,500. Hon. Members would observe that he had taken the minimum scale of rewards, there being two scales in the Schedule. Then, in addition to all these grants, there were Fellowships, and all that sort of thing.

Mr. M'Laren

MR. MITCHELL HENRY: I venture to interrupt the hon. Member one moment. He is under a great delusion. It could not possibly be as he states, because the interest of the sum of £1,500,000 could not be exceeded.

MR. M'LAREN said, it seemed to him, with submission, that the remark should naturally have come in reply. Having said this about grants to Colleges and Universities, he had not said a word about grants to the students themselves. If 1,500 passed their first examination in Arts, every tenth man would receive a grant of £20 for each of three years. This would be for 150 students, and would amount to £9,000. Why should 150 raw young lads who had passed their first examination get a grant of £9,000 at the public expense? What had they done to deserve it? They had been promoting their own interests, and had been pursuing their education in preparation for business. If a man passed with honour he received a larger grant, and there were Fellowships of £200, which a man could take along with a lectureship. He found that the £1,500,000, as provided for by the Bill, might be invested in various ways, including ground rents. It was reasonable to suppose that it would produce 4 per cent, which would be £60,000 a-year. It was proposed to give that £60,000 a-year absolutely, and at once, for the purposes of the University. But a University did not grow up in one day, and it was accordingly provided that if the Senate once got hold of this £60,000 they should keep it, whether they spent it or not. If they only spent £40,000, they would put £20,000 aside, and might invest it in Government securities. Was that a transaction the House of Commons would sanction? It was said that last year the House passed the Intermediate Education Bill, and that this Bill followed upon the same lines. He took leave to deny that altogether. The Intermediate Education Bill of last year did equal justice to all sects and classes in Ireland. Under that Act no one inquired where the pupil came from, whether from a Presbyterian family, or a Roman Catholic family, or a Roman Catholic nunnery, or an Episcopalian school, or whether the pupils were boys or girls. They passed a proper examination, and the advantages were equally open to all classes. The case of Manchester had been referred to. He happened to know from another source that the people of Manchester had raised in subscriptions £450,000 for the endowment of their proposed University. They had not asked the Government for a shilling. A great number of the rich and influential parties had, in the last 20 years, joined the Roman Catholic Church. Why could they not club together and endow a religious institution? This Bill provided that no religious matter should be examined into. Those who were old enough to remember the outcry on Sir Robert Peel's Queen's Colleges would remember how the changes were rung year after year on the "Godless Colleges" because religious teaching was excluded; and yet this Bill, promoted by the opponents of the Queen's University, proposed to do the same thing. It was said in the speech of the hon. Member for Roscommon, to which he listened with great attention, that Protestants might come to the examinations in the Roman Catholic University. He begged to return the compliment, and to say that Roman Catholics might also come to be examined in the Queen's University and the Dublin University. If it was answered that though the Catholics would be glad to receive Protestants at their University, they could not be expected to go to Protestant Universities themselves, he must say that he could not understand that kind of reciprocity. It came to this—that they disendowed one Church 10 years ago, and that they were now asked to give a large part of the spoils to endow another Church—not directly as a Church, but by endowing the members and the Colleges of that Church. He had now come to the last point with which he would trouble the House. The time that had been given was much too short to consider a Bill of this kind. The proposal appeared in the papers on Friday morning, and here, on Wednesday, they were asked to consider a Bill of such great importance in all its details. They had only had four clear days to consider it—Saturday, Sunday, Monday, and Tuesday. That was all—only four days, including Sunday—to consider that momentous Bill. He doubted whether half the people of Ireland had had an opportunity of considering it. It would be most injudicious to press on the Bill at this time. He had said so much about students in the Universities of Scotland, of grants to religious teachers, that he forgot to tell what were the largesses given to the students of those Universities. They remembered the grants to the students at Maynooth. They knew what grants were made to the students of the Queen's Colleges and the University of London. Hon. Members would doubtless suppose that students of the Universities of Scotland were treated on the same principles of civil and religious equality; but they would be startled when he told them that there was no student in Scotland who got one shilling from any Parliamentary grant, although there was a small sum derived from the old Revenues of the Crown in Scotland. The salaries of the Professors were very moderate. In his opinion they were far too small. They mainly depended upon the fees they got from the students, and in that way their income was made up. See how all that was reversed by this Bill. In the place of students paying fees for their own education, they were practically rewarded, and their education was to be provided for at the public expense; because the Bill enacted that lecturers should get such grants as the quorum of six thought fit, and that the students themselves should, in place of paying for their own education, get some £20, £30, £40, and £50 on passing their different examinations—sums which, with the moderate cost of living in Scotland and Ireland, would amply suffice to maintain a student during his six months' course of instruction at these Colleges and boarding-houses.

Mr. M'Laren

COLONEL KING-HARMAN: Sir, the attempt to defeat this Bill—but not on its merits—by certain hon. Members, is a course which is highly to be reprobated. I therefore think that the best way in which we can show our decided determination to pass the Bill is by adopting the course of saying as little as possible. The Bill was introduced in a very able and moderate speech, which could not fail to commend itself to the good sense of the House. Many of the objections which may be raised against the provisions of the Bill may be safely left to the hon. Member for Roscommon (the O'Connor Don), who introduced the Bill in so able a manner. The noble Lord the Member for Calne (Lord Edmond Fitzmaurice), in a speech which everyone who listened to it must have admired for the terseness and closeness of his argument, made a number of attacks upon the Bill. From the objectionable points thus enumerated, I maintain that the present Bill, submitted by the hon. Member for Roscommon, is entirely free. A point was made by the hon. Member for Carlow (Mr. Kavanagh), who said that he hoped that a statement would be made to the House to the effect that the Bill, as it now stood, would commend itself to, and be approved and accepted by, the Roman Catholic Bishops. I am not by any means empowered to say whether it will or will not meet with the reception named; but I do honestly believe that this Bill has received a close scrutiny from the hands of the Roman Catholic Bishops, and that they are prepared to look upon it as a fair measure of justice, and one calculated to meet the ends which they have in view. In conclusion, I will say that I regret that my name does not appear on the back of the Bill. I believe it to be a just and true measure, and one calculated to bring about the settlement of a long-standing and sore grievance.

MR. OSBORNE MORGAN said, most hon. Members were agreed on two points—first, that it was high time that this question, which had hung like a cloud over Ireland for the last six or seven years, should be settled; and, secondly, that if it was to be settled at all, it ought to be settled upon a permanent basis; or, in other words, a basis likely to recommend itself to the majority of the Irish people. He submitted if a University was to flourish in a country like Ireland, or in any free country, it must give to that country the thing which it wanted. His noble Friend the Member for Calne (Lord Edmond Fitzmaurice) had constructed an ingenious and admirable scheme; but did he believe any large portion of the Irish people would accept his plan for amalgamating a Roman Catholic College with the Queen's Colleges? It was upon a similar rock that the Bill of one of the strongest Ministries that ever existed in this country had split. Of course, they must not expect this question to be settled at once, or that it should be jostled through the House of Commons on a Wednesday; for triumphs of that kind, snatched in that way, were generally short-lived, and were likely to recoil upon the heads of those who won them. There was one thing about which he was particularly anxious, and that was what reception the Bill would meet with from the Roman Catholics. He did not mean the Bishops, but the people. Would they or would they not be satisfied with it? There was no doubt it was well recommended; and he must say that, looking at the six names on the back of the Bill, looking at those who supported it, it appeared to be a genuine Irish Bill, and on that point he was almost a Home Ruler. The measure had been described by the hon. Member for Edinburgh (Mr. M'Laren) as a proposal to endow the members of one Church and their Colleges with £1,500,000 of public money already appropriated to the relief of unavoidable misery and calamity. Of course, Parliament could undo what Parliament had done, and last year it had departed from the principle to which his hon. Friend referred. But was his hon. Friend's description of the Bill a fair one? There was not a single word in the Bill from one end to the other about any particular Church; and he was told that a Wesleyan College in Dublin and a Presbyterian College in Belfast were to be affiliated to the proposed University. If the Bill refused to affiliate those Colleges, they would know what to do with it. It was, perhaps, a sort of concurrent endowment; but mainly in this sense—that it proposed to give certain prizes for proficiency in purely secular subjects to students educated at affiliated Colleges, which might, or might not, be denominational. No doubt, the effect of the Bill would be to call into existence a number of Roman Catholic Colleges which could not exist if the Bill did not pass. But was that an objection? When he listened to some of the speeches to-day he could not help thinking that some hon. Members seemed to speak of Ireland as if it were a newly-discovered Island in the Pacific Ocean. Why would the majority of the affiliated Colleges be Roman Catholic if the Bill passed? Simply because Roman Catholics were the persons who wanted a University.

Mr. Osborne Morgan

The Protestant Episcopalians did not want it, they had got Trinity College; the Presbyterians did not want it, they had got the Queen's Colleges. It was the Roman Catholics who would use the new Colleges—the sons of farmers and others of the middle class, very inferior in wealth to persons of the same class in England. It was positively monstrous to compare these young men with the sons of middle-class people in Lancashire and Yorkshire. Hon. Members might ask why the Roman Catholics did not go to the Queen's Colleges and to Trinity College. They might as well ask why Mahomedans did not eat roast pork. Therefore, was it fair to the Roman Catholics of Ireland to say to them—"You shall be educated on our terms, or you shall not be educated at all?" That was a very short-sighted policy. He endorsed every word of his noble Friend when he said he wished that religious animosity had died out in Ireland. But how was that to be brought about? In no better way than by encouraging a higher class of education. He did not care whether it was Roman Catholic bigotry or Protestant bigotry—for there was such a thing as Protestant bigotry too—there was no way in which they could so well fight against it as by higher education. There were two points in the Bill which commended it to his mind. First of all, there was the constitution of the Senate, which was to be a State-appointed body. The Lord Lieutenant of Ireland might be relied on to put proper men into it; and when once appointed these men might be trusted to do their work, for the full light of day would be let in upon them. The small proportion that was to be elected by the graduates themselves was a security to him that the Colleges would not be allowed to degenerate into merely theological institutions. They would be secular first and sectarian after. In the second place, all the prizes were to be given for secular knowledge; and he, having been not only a student but a teacher, knew that, as a general rule, young men would work for those subjects for which prizes were given. But in giving this general support to the Bill, he did not mean to say that he approved everything it contained. There was one clause in the Bill, for instance—the 18th clause—to which he did strongly object. His hon. Friend was asking for a very large grant of public money, to be taken, no doubt, from an Irish fund, and he did not say that his hon. Friend was dipping too deep. It was all very well for the hon. Member for Edinburgh to speak of the small prizes offered to Scotch students; that was a reason for increasing their value, but not for cutting down what was proposed to be given to Irish students. All he could say was that he did not find £200 a-year excessive when he had a Fellowship. A man could not live to study when he had to study to live. But when hon. Gentlemen asked for so large a sum of money, they were bound to spend it in a way which would meet the approval not only of Ireland, but of the nation generally. He would say with respect to the 18th clause that the more the area of competition was extended, and the higher the standard of our Universities would be, the better. He was not afraid of new Universities. Competition, in whatever shape, would be good; and he did not fear this University would be allowed to degenerate into a mere theological school. If that were done, the evil would very soon work its own remedy, and its degrees would be treated with the contempt they deserved, like those of some German and American Universities. But he did not anticipate any such thing from Ireland. There was no fairer field for the establishment of a national University than Ireland. It was impossible to walk half-a-mile in the streets of Dublin, or to mix with the people in any part of Ireland, without finding that there was there a great deal of solid ore, which required only to be extracted from the matrix and to be properly worked to become precious metal. Ireland had probably produced more men of genius than any country of its size in the world; and it would be a lamentable thing if a nation which had produced a Burke, a Grattan, an O'Connell, a Sheil, a Lecky, and a Justin McCarthy, should be deprived of a University adapted to its wants, simply because Englishmen and Scotchmen could not agree as to the principles on which it was to be founded.

MR. PLUNKET said, he did not propose to go into many of the arguments that had been raised during the debate; but he must be allowed to refer to the speech of his noble Friend the Member for Calne (Lord Edmond Fitzmaurice). On behalf of the University which he (Mr. Plunket) represented, he begged to thank the noble Lord for the generous praise which he had bestowed on that University. That praise would be gratefully accepted, all the more because it came from a man who was one of the most distinguished graduates of this country. The noble Lord referred to the question of the Divinity School and the College Chapel; but it would appear that he was not quite aware of the present position of the school, or that proposals were under consideration which would, he believed, entirely and satisfactorily settle the matter. He was sure that there was no Irish Member in the House who did not agree with him in saying that the question of the present state of the Divinity School, and of attendance in Trinity College, had nothing whatever to do with the grievances that had been brought forward during the debate. The reason he desired to address the House on the occasion was to explain the position in which he stood. He could assure the House, and the hon. Gentlemen who were interested in the progress of this measure, that he was sincerely desirous of accepting and considering, in a frank way, the proposals they had made. If hon. Gentlemen opposite succeeded in obtaining a just and satisfactory settlement of the question, no one would rejoice more heartily in their success than he should. But he must decline to give a vote in their support on the present occasion, for the reason—which was one which would be shared by many hon. Gentlemen in the House—namely, that he was not in a position to say what the effect of all the elaborate proposals contained in the Bill would be. It was impossible in so short a time to get that assistance and advice which was required to deal with a question like this. He wished to know what would be the view taken of it by those who were most interested in the financial part of the proposals. It was not wrong to say that the Catholic hierarchy in Ireland had been at the bottom of this question for years and years past; but no one had told the House that they were prepared to take the Bill as a settlement of their claims. Not only was that so, but he had observed that many newspapers had pointed out that the Bill would have to be very much modified if there was to be a chance of its passing. Would the Bishops be willing to accept large modifications? Then there was the question of the existing Universities. He said again it had been impossible for him to collect opinions on the subject. There was, for instance, that University which he had the honour to represent in that House. It might, although not directly assaulted or even mentioned in the proposal, be indirectly affected by the Bill, and to a very large extent. It was on those grounds that he protested, the other night, against the action of his hon. Friend in announcing an early day for the discussion of the Bill. He warned him, in no hostile spirit, that it might bring a certain degree of suspicion upon his measure, whatever its merits were, if any hurry should be shown in bringing it forward; and he must say for himself, in the few observations he would have to offer on some points that had struck him very forcibly—he must say frankly that he had not had time as yet to consider their application and bearing as fully as he could have wished. He desired to refer to the extraordinary constitution of the Governing Body for the new University. There was no University in existence that had a Governing Body at all in comparison with it. When the six members proposed to be chosen by Convocation should be appointed, there would still be a great preponderance of members appointed by the Government—that was a total innovation on the present idea of University government. But when they considered the proposals carefully, it would be seen that it was proposed to give to this Senate extraordinary powers of government, which would affect not only the University itself, but also the affiliated Colleges to a great extent. Whatever degree of control the Imperial Government had over the appointment of this Senate, there was no check whatever within the University upon the operations of that body, and yet the House was asked to pass the second reading of the Bill in which the Schedule which ought to contain the names of the senators was a perfect blank. Therefore, upon this important question affecting the whole constitution of the new University, the House was left entirely in the dark. He next wished to call attention to the enormous sum of money which it was proposed to hand over to this uncontrolled Senate to be spent upon a University in which there was not yet a student or a Professor. No one had ventured to give the House any information as to the number of students that might be supposed to join the University; but still the demand was made that a large amount of money should be given over to the Senate—an amount far exceeding the endowments of the Dublin University or those of Queen's Colleges, in which there were and had long been a vast number of students. That might startle the House, but he would explain his meaning. £1,500,000 might, of course, be invested by this Senate to as good a purpose as the money of the Disestablished Church of Ireland had been and was now invested. A great deal of money had been invested quite safely and properly at $4\frac{1}{2}$ per cent, and it might still be invested very well at 4 per cent. He had no reason to believe that the Senate would deal less wisely with the money in that respect; but the result of such an operation on its part would be an income of £60,000 per annum for the new Senate, of which they knew nothing—to be dealt with as that body pleased. The income of Dublin University was about £40,000, and of Queen's Colleges about £30,000; so that the new University would have an income of nearly half as much as one and double as much as the other of the two existing Universities. That was a very startling proposition, and one which should not be settled with but 48 hours' consideration. Although the Senate might at once, after the passing of the Act, demand the whole of this sum, it by no means followed that they should be required to spend it. On the contrary, a clause was placed in the Bill directing how the surplus funds, which, at first, might not be required, should be invested. It was, therefore, impossible to say to what amount those funds might, in a few years, be increased. Then, as to the direction from which the funds would come. He did not wish to argue with his hon. Friend the Member for Carlow (Mr. Kavanagh), in what he said with reference to the application of that large sum of money taken from the surplus of the Irish Church funds. No hon. Gentleman would deny that it was proposed to apply a large portion of that money for the purpose of endowing Catholic Colleges in Ireland. There was no doubt of that, at all events. Those who had no objection to united education were, at present, sufficiently provided for. It was to provide those who would not avail themselves of this united education that the money was to be applied, and he contended that 19 out of 20 students who entered the new University would be Roman Catholics. He was not saying this at all in a hostile spirit; but he could not feel quite so calmly on this subject as the hon. Member for Carlow, when he recollected what took place in 1868, when he recollected how ruthlessly the axe was laid at the very root of the tree, how completely the process of levelling down was carried out. And now he could not view without pain the proposal that the spoils of the Irish Church was to be, in a short time, shovelled over in heaps to build up a new institution, which would be practically the exclusive possession of the Catholics of Ireland. They must recollect how strong were the appeals to the justice and even to the mercy of the House made at the time by clergymen of the Church, which was then disestablished, whose hopes in life were blighted, and whose prospects were ruined. They must recollect how sternly those demands were repressed, for it was said that was the day of levelling down, and the principles of disestablishment had been adopted by the State, and must be carried out to the bitter end. But now, if Parliament was going to re-open this question, surely they must deal, first of all, with the claims of the unfortunate curates and other clergymen of the Disestablished Church? And if they were going to touch the surplus funds of that Church at all, he would point out that the Divinity School of Trinity College had not yet been provided for. And now as to the way in which it was proposed to apply this vast sum of money. They could not, by direct endowments, give so much money to such institutions as were in existence, and so, if he might use the expression, they had to stuff in at the eyes, ears, and nose, what the mouth could not swallow; and, once given, there would be no power of recalling the money, however those Colleges might turn out.

There was not, in any other University in the world, such a thing as these result fees. Not only honour men, but mere pass men, would be able to bring back to the College which housed them, and the Professors who taught them, £114 each, every year. How was it possible that fair competition could be carried on between institutions where the pupil had to pay more than £80 a-year, and institutions which gave gratuitous education; for he believed it would be possible for the Colleges that would be created under the Bill to give education gratuitously. He wished it to be understood that if there was to be a new University, he was by no means desirous that the provisions made should be scanty. He did believe, however, that it was unwise to hand over such a large sum of money before they knew what students they were going to have, or what kind of men were to form their Governing Body, or what Colleges were to be affiliated. This money would be handed over, bodily, actually, and for ever. He deprecated jealousy between the different Universities, and he hoped that hon. Gentlemen opposite would not imagine that he was speaking at all in a grudging spirit. He had always considered it to be the best plan, when any additional provision was required, to increase rather than diminish the number of Universities. Such a competition he had always held to be extremely healthy as between University and University. He freely admitted that the amount of money to be given, and the conditions to be imposed on the Governing Body, were such as it would be possible to modify in Committee; but, apart from all this, there was the old objection, which he considered a very grave and serious one—this was really a new departure from the position which the State had taken up in regard to University Education in Ireland. In Ireland they had held to the principle of united education in regard to the Dublin and Queen's Universities, and any change from that principle with regard to a new University he should deeply regret. He should regret it, to a certain extent, as a stain upon the statesmanship of Irish Members; and, certainly, if on further consideration the principle adopted in this Act should seem to at all, however indirectly, deal with or injure those great principles, as they were established in the University of Dublin, he should give such a proposal his uncompromising opposition. It was with great regret that he had had to make these criticisms in a somewhat hostile sense on a proposal brought forward by the hon. Member for Roscommon. On the other hand, he was free to admit that the Bill now before the House was in some respects attractive in comparison with other proposals which had heretofore been made on the subject. It would be a great gain, if they were approaching the settlement of this question, that a measure had been introduced on the one side, and had been supported on the other side, by independent Members, because it at once removed the question from the arena of Party struggle, which had brought so many previous similar attempts to an untimely end. That would be a great gain, and he should be glad if it were possible, on further consideration, so to modify the measure as to make it acceptable to the House generally. He was sure that would be, to a great extent, the result of the spirit in which the measure had been brought forward by the hon. Member for Roscommon. He must observe that the hon. Member had introduced it very moderately and fairly; but there was also this point on which he thought the proposals of the Bill might be regarded as much more acceptable to the House than some of the proposals previously made on the subject, for, although the limits to the power of the Governing Body were very vague and wide, and although the amount of endowment claimed was very large, still there was an admission that State control was to some extent to follow State endowment. There was another reason why he very much preferred this Bill to some of the previous propositions. Unlike the Bill introduced by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich (Mr. Gladstone), the present Bill did not destroy any existing institutions as a condition necessary for the building up of a new one. It left the other Universities as they were. It left the Dublin and the Queen's Universities standing. And it was not only in the interests of those Universities that he claimed this credit for the present Bill over previous ones. Should it turn out that this new institution, if it came into existence at all, was really to be merely a denominational University in its character, then he held that the best safeguard they could have against the development of all the worst consequences which were by some persons anticipated as to the teaching and standard of education in such an institution, would be the presence of such rivals as those of Dublin and the Queen's Universities, constantly in the presence of the new Colleges, and capable of holding up a high standard of education with which those might compete, and, at the same time, quite free from any injurious influence coming from that quarter in return. For these amongst other reasons, he was, for his own part, desirous—and he was sure many other Members of the House agreed with him—to give a fair, and full, and frank consideration to the proposals before the House; but, on the other hand, he must decline to be pledged to the second reading of the Bill until he had more time to consider it, not only by himself, but with the advice of those who were better qualified by their experience to deal with such a subject than himself, and to decide what would really be, on the whole, the general result of these very important proposals.

MR. SHAW felt sure the hon. Member who had introduced the Bill had no wish to force it in an undue manner upon the House, and, in giving the Bill a second reading, he contended that the House did not endorse the principle of the Bill. It was quite in the power of the House to consider the Bill on the Motion "that Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair." It was obvious that any hon. Member introducing the Bill at that time of the Session did receive very great advantage from the Bill being advanced a stage. The question of University Education in Ireland had been brought before the House for the past 10 years, and he hardly knew any question which had been more debated than that question; while for the last six months it had been so constantly before the country, and in the newspapers, and speeches, and in other ways, that he could hardly think there was any hon. Member of that House who had not fully made up his mind on the subject. They had been asked whether they would assure the House that the Prelates of the Catholic Church in Ireland were in favour of the Bill. The only answer he could give to the House was that he and his hon. Friends with him would hardly have taken the step they had done in bringing the question forward without having some pretty general assurances that it would meet very generally with their approval. The hon. Member for Edinburgh (Mr. M'Laren) said that the Bill confined its benefits to affiliated Colleges. Students from other countries could compete for the degrees and prizes of this University, and he had no doubt they would have a great influx of students from that land which they all seemed so anxious to leave, but to which none of them appeared to be in a great hurry to return. The opposition to the Bill had come from various sources. They had that day had an opposition from the Liberation Society; but he asserted that that Society, in its fundamental principles, was in full accord with the principles of the Bill. He belonged to the Dissenting body, and what education he had received was given him in an English Dissenting College; and he knew that those very men who led English Dissent based their whole opinions on the lines laid down in the present measure. The noble Lord who seconded the Amendment of the hon. Member for Kirkcaldy (Lord Edmond Fitzmaurice), in an admirable speech, pointed out another mode of dealing with this question; but surely those other ways had been tried long enough. Where was there as practical a measure, that would settle this question, which could compare with the present Bill? He voted against the Bill brought in by the right hon. Member for Greenwich; indeed, he had no love for any of the previous propositions on the subject, because they commenced by destroying existing institutions. He was proud of Trinity College, Dublin, and of the education which was imparted there; and, therefore, he did not look with any pleasure on a measure which would destroy, or interfere in any way, with its full operation. But they were asked to plant their new institution under the shade of Trinity College. Why, they might as well say to them they should not exist at all; for if they were to plant the new institution beside the old one, it would be many years before it grew to any dimensions. The only way in which this question could be satisfactorily met was by proceeding on the lines laid down in the present Bill. They proposed to give money to institutions as a result of work done, and to students as the result of work done, and they said—"Give students the very best religious education possible. But the moment you go into the arena of science and kindred subjects we bring before you the test of examination, and until they were equal to that they could do nothing." Now, he asked, was not that the very best method of bringing the Catholic students of Ireland out of anything narrow, anything selfish and antiquated, and bringing them into the full and free life of modern literature and modern science? There was such a bending and bowing to what was called popular feeling, there was in this country such a dread of agitation, that men would even trample on their own opinions and give way to that feeling. The question of University Education in Ireland was a matter the settlement of which was so necessary in order to bring modern ideas and modern improvements in science to three-fourths of the people in Ireland, that he would do anything to try to settle it on the basis of that Bill. He knew thousands of men who were not able to go to the London Universities owing to the expense; and he thought that, as Protestants, they ought to be ashamed of such a state of things. So defective was the present system that the people of Ireland were not able to return a single Representative to Parliament. He believed the House of Commons, as generous Englishmen, would endeavour to remedy that great wrong by at once settling the question. The matter was now before the House; and he hoped, if they did not give the Bill a second reading that day, at all events it would go for discussion at another time, and that it would then get a second reading. He did not at all adopt the suggestion made by the hon. Member for Edinburgh, for it seemed a most unfair one—it was that they should tax the converts for the foundation of the University; but he thought that would be a very hard thing to do. Their poverty had been thrown in their face, and it was asked why they did not subscribe towards the education of a University? Why, the Catholics of Ireland had raised a large sum of money, greater in proportion than the people of Lancashire had raised for a similar object; but the good results which would have accrued from that subscription had never been

Mr. Plunket

the University of Dublin, he should give such a proposal his uncompromising opposition. It was with great regret that he had had to make these criticisms in a somewhat hostile sense on a proposal brought forward by the hon. Member for Roscommon. On the other hand, he was free to admit that the Bill now before the House was in some respects attractive in comparison with other proposals which had heretofore been made on the subject. It would be a great gain, if they were approaching the settlement of this question, that a measure had been introduced on the one side, and had been supported on the other side, by independent Members, because it at once removed the question from the arena of Party struggle, which had brought so many previous similar attempts to an untimely end. That would be a great gain, and he should be glad if it were possible, on further consideration, so to modify the measure as to make it acceptable to the House generally. He was sure that would be, to a great extent, the result of the spirit in which the measure had been brought forward by the hon. Member for Roscommon. He must observe that the hon. Member had introduced it very moderately and fairly; but there was also this point on which he thought the proposals of the Bill might be regarded as much more acceptable to the House than some of the proposals previously made on the subject, for, although the limits to the power of the Governing Body were very vague and wide, and although the amount of endowment claimed was very large, still there was an admission that State control was to some extent to follow State endowment. There was another reason why he very much preferred this Bill to some of the previous propositions. Unlike the Bill introduced by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich (Mr. Gladstone), the present Bill did not destroy any existing institutions as a condition necessary for the building up of a new one. It left the other Universities as they were. It left the Dublin and the Queen's Universities standing. And it was not only in the interests of those Universities that he claimed this credit for the present Bill over previous ones. Should it turn out that this new institution, if it came into existence at all, was really to be merely a denominational University in its character, then he held that the best safeguard they could have against the development of all the worst consequences which were by some persons anticipated as to the teaching and standard of education in such an institution, would be the presence of such rivals as those of Dublin and the Queen's Universities, constantly in the presence of the new Colleges, and capable of holding up a high standard of education with which those might compete, and, at the same time, quite free from any injurious influence coming from that quarter in return. For these amongst other reasons, he was, for his own part, desirous—and he was sure many other Members of the House agreed with him—to give a fair, and full, and frank consideration to the proposals before the House; but, on the other hand, he must decline to be pledged to the second reading of the Bill until he had more time to consider it, not only by himself, but with the advice of those who were better qualified by their experience to deal with such a subject than himself, and to decide what would really be, on the whole, the general result of these very important proposals.

MR. SHAW felt sure the hon. Member who had introduced the Bill had no wish to force it in an undue manner upon the House, and, in giving the Bill a second reading, he contended that the House did not endorse the principle of the Bill. It was quite in the power of the House to consider the Bill on the Motion "that Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair." It was obvious that any hon. Member introducing the Bill at that time of the Session did receive very great advantage from the Bill being advanced a stage. The question of University Education in Ireland had been brought before the House for the past 10 years, and he hardly knew any question which had been more debated than that question; while for the last six months it had been so constantly before the country, and in the newspapers, and speeches, and in other ways, that he could hardly think there was any hon. Member of that House who had not fully made up his mind on the subject. They had been asked whether they would assure the House that the Prelates of the Catholic Church in Ireland were in favour of the Bill. The only answer he could give to the House was that he and his hon. Friends with him would hardly have taken the step they had done in bringing the question forward without having some pretty general assurances that it would meet very generally with their approval. The hon. Member for Edinburgh (Mr. M'Laren) said that the Bill confined its benefits to affiliated Colleges. Students from other countries could compete for the degrees and prizes of this University, and he had no doubt they would have a great influx of students from that land which they all seemed so anxious to leave, but to which none of them appeared to be in a great hurry to return. The opposition to the Bill had come from various sources. They had that day had an opposition from the Liberation Society; but he asserted that that Society, in its fundamental principles, was in full accord with the principles of the Bill. He belonged to the Dissenting body, and what education he had received was given him in an English Dissenting College; and he knew that those very men who led English Dissent based their whole opinions on the lines laid down in the present measure. The noble Lord who seconded the Amendment of the hon. Member for Kirkcaldy (Lord Edmond Fitzmaurice), in an admirable speech, pointed out another mode of dealing with this question; but surely those other ways had been tried long enough. Where was there as practical a measure, that would settle this question, which could compare with the present Bill? He voted against the Bill brought in by the right hon. Member for Greenwich; indeed, he had no love for any of the previous propositions on the subject, because they commenced by destroying existing institutions. He was proud of Trinity College, Dublin, and of the education which was imparted there; and, therefore, he did not look with any pleasure on a measure which would destroy, or interfere in any way, with its full operation. But they were asked to plant their new institution under the shade of Trinity College. Why, they might as well say to them they should not exist at all; for if they were to plant the new institution beside the old one, it would be many years before it grew to any dimensions. The only way in which this question could be satisfactorily met was by proceeding on the lines laid down in the present Bill. They proposed to give money to institutions as a result of work done, and to students as the result of work done, and they said—"Give students the very best religious education possible. But the moment you go into the arena of science and kindred subjects we bring before you the test of examination, and until they were equal to that they could do nothing." Now, he asked, was not that the very best method of bringing the Catholic students of Ireland out of anything narrow, anything selfish and antiquated, and bringing them into the full and free life of modern literature and modern science? There was such a bending and bowing to what was called popular feeling, there was in this country such a dread of agitation, that men would even trample on their own opinions and give way to that feeling. The question of University Education in Ireland was a matter the settlement of which was so necessary in order to bring modern ideas and modern improvements in science to three-fourths of the people in Ireland, that he would do anything to try to settle it on the basis of that Bill. He knew thousands of men who were not able to go to the London Universities owing to the expense; and he thought that, as Protestants, they ought to be ashamed of such a state of things. So defective was the present system that the people of Ireland were not able to return a single Representative to Parliament. He believed the House of Commons, as generous Englishmen, would endeavour to remedy that great wrong by at once settling the question. The matter was now before the House; and he hoped, if they did not give the Bill a second reading that day, at all events it would go for discussion at another time, and that it would then get a second reading. He did not at all adopt the suggestion made by the hon. Member for Edinburgh, for it seemed a most unfair one—it was that they should tax the converts for the foundation of the University; but he thought that would be a very hard thing to do. Their poverty had been thrown in their face, and it was asked why they did not subscribe towards the education of a University? Why, the Catholics of Ireland had raised a large sum of money, greater in proportion than the people of Lancashire had raised for a similar object; but the good results which would have accrued from that subscription had never been realized owing to the inaction of the Government, who refused to give them a charter, whereby the money might be brought into use. He strongly supported the Bill before the House.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Sir, the hon. Member who has just sat down has made an observation which I shall notice at once. He said that although it might not be possible to come to an agreement on the principle of the Bill at so short a notice, still it might be a wise course for the House to take to read the Bill a second time, and refer to the future stages—to the question of your leaving the Chair—the discussion as to the expediency of the plan proposed, and as to the circumstances of the case with which we have to deal. Now, upon that point I think the House ought to be very careful how far it commits itself to the second reading of a Bill as to the exact effect or intentions of which it is not satisfied, with a view to the discussion at some later stage of points upon which it is necessary that we should have full information before we pass it. We have heard one or two remarks in the course of this discussion, and remarks have also been made elsewhere, as to the apparent hurry in pressing forward the second reading of the Bill. But I wish most distinctly to say that I do not think we have any right whatever to charge the hon. Member for Roscommon (the O'Connor Don) and the Friends of the Bill with any attempt to hurry the Bill through Parliament, or to find any fault with them for using the best expedition in their power to bring it under our notice. We cannot help recognizing the difficulties under which independent Members in this House are placed when they wish to bring forward any measure for discussion; and we most gladly recognize the desire which the hon. Member has shown to prepare his measure carefully, and to bring it forward at as early a period as possible. We also admit that it was difficult, if not impossible, for him to obtain a day for bringing it under the notice of the House in sufficient time unless he obtained an early day; and, therefore, we do not wish to express our dissatisfaction with the course taken by the promoters of the Bill in bringing it under our notice to-day. But while I admit that the promoters of the Bill are right in bringing it forward as quickly as possible, I would impress on the House that it is quite a different thing to consider how far it ought to be in a hurry in accepting a Bill such as the one before us until we fully understand what are its general effects and intentions. I must say—as far as the discussion has proceeded—we have still a great deal to hear before we can thoroughly satisfy ourselves on that point; and even in the course of this very day's discussion, the hon. Member in charge of the Bill has made an important statement, and one which seems to me to open an entirely new issue for us to consider. In the few observations he made in moving the second reading of the Bill, the hon. Gentleman said he hoped that we should confine our attention to-day to the real issues which were presented to us; and those real issues were two. The first was whether there was any necessity for the further extension of University facilities in Ireland; and, secondly, whether the plan which he submitted to us was a plan well calculated to meet the wants which might exist. Then he went on to say that he did not bind himself to details of the proposal, and even with regard to the funds by which the expenses were to be met he by no means bound himself to the suggested method as the proper means to take; but that he would be prepared to consider any other proposal for meeting the expense of the scheme. I am bound to say that that is a proposal which can hardly be treated as a suggestion merely of detail. It seems to me that it is a proposal which opens to us considerations of a very large character, and which we can hardly be prepared to consider without further deliberation, and which the Bill, as it at present stands, does not sufficiently explain. If a proposal is made which may be turned into a proposition to place a new University upon the Votes of Parliament, that may open to us a totally new field of consideration from a proposal that we should take a large amount of money from the Irish Church surplus, and apply it to that purpose. I am always reluctant to raise minute points and quibbles about matters which are really matters of detail, and which may be considered in Committee; but I think this is really one of a very large character, and goes very much to the root of the question with which we are now concerned, and I think it would be only right and proper that before we decide whether we can give the Bill a second reading or not we should know how far one or other of the proposals is to be treated as the essential basis of the scheme. We cannot help feeling that we have many instances before us where attempts have been made to settle the question of Irish University Education. The sands are strewn with a good many corpses, and we know very well that the difficulties with which we have to deal are very great and various; and I am sure that we shall not act wisely in rushing too quickly in dealing with this question until we really understand what the nature of the scheme is. Now, I do not wish, at the present moment, to go very fully into the details of the scheme which is before us. I think my hon. and learned Friend the Member for the University of Dublin (Mr. Plunket) has raised several points upon which it would be very desirable that we should have an answer. It is desirable that we should know something more about the proposals as to the affiliated Colleges; and we ought, as I have already said, to know something more distinctly as to the funds which are to be the foundation of the scheme, and we ought to see whether it really is or is not the intention of the promoters of the Bill that so large a sum of money should be placed at the disposal of the Governing Body to be created; whether it should have the power of increasing it by accumulations, and whether it should acquire the command over the whole University system of Ireland, as my hon. and learned Friend seemed to think might be the result of the scheme. This is a matter which is really worthy of consideration; and we ought to know also whether the new University, which is to be a rival of the existing Universities, is to have the power not only of carrying on competitions, as has been stated, for students by granting degrees—perhaps on more favourable and easier terms than other Universities; but whether in consequence of those easier terms it would have the effect of obtaining a greater number of students, and thus increasing the wealth of the body, who would also have greater facilities for endowing or assisting by material advantages the various affiliated Colleges with which it will be connected. That is a point of a large and important character, and one which ought to be explained to us and thoroughly sifted out. There is also another point—but, before I go to that, I should like to say a word on the general structure of this Bill, and especially in reference to the observation that this Bill has been drawn on the lines of the Intermediate Education Bill of last Session. Now, the Intermediate Education Act of last Session was an Act of an experimental character—it was one which was favourably received by Parliament, and I think it is one which, as far as we can get at the experience of its working, seems likely to be of very great advantage to Ireland. We must remember that there are several distinctions between the case of the Intermediate Education Act and the case of the Universities. In the case of the Intermediate Education Act you have, in the first place, this great point to be observed—that you had not in existence intermediate schools. It was necessary, if Intermediate Education views were to be promoted, that something should be done to make that exist which did not exist. In the case of the Universities, you have already a University, and the point is whether this University can be made more suitable to the requirements of the country, or, if that is impossible, whether a new University ought to be created and made suitable for that purpose. With regard to the Intermediate Education scheme, we considered we were perfectly justified in proposing to apply a considerable sum of the surplus of the Disestablished Church of Ireland, because we thought that in the scheme there would be no infringement of that which we regarded as the fundamental principle to be observed in dealing with the question. In the debate to-day, as to whether it is or is not in the power of Parliament to alter the disposition of the funds, which was contemplated by Parliament at the time the Church was disestablished, everybody, of course, must admit that, at all events, technically speaking, it is free to Parliament to alter the work which has been done by a preceding Parliament, and to vary the disposition of the funds which were formerly intended to be appropriated in a certain way. That was done last Session, when we confined the operation to the Intermediate Education Act; and I think we must all recognize that there was one condition which was distinctly contemplated by Parliament at the time of disestablishment, and which is almost in the nature of a fundamental principle, in dealing with the funds—that is, that the funds should not be applied, directly or indirectly, to any denominational purpose. In the case of the Intermediate Education Act, great precautions were taken to prevent the funds being applied to denominational purposes. It is true the result fees and payments were made to the students themselves, because it was open to anyone to be examined; but the examinations were not of a religious character, and the same may be said, no doubt, of many of the proposals in the present Bill. But there were result fees, and these result fees were to be applied subject to the guardianship of the Conscience Clause. But in this Bill, it is to be observed, there is no Conscience Clause, and it would be a question I should like to have cleared up whether it would be in the contemplation of the promoters of the Bill to introduce anything in the nature of a Conscience Clause applying to these Colleges, which are to take advantage of the foundation which it is now proposed to establish. Then, again, the Intermediate Education Act did not apply at all to buildings, and that is a matter very well worthy of consideration, and it is one upon which, before we enter upon the Bill, we ought to have full information. We are in this position—we admit that it is desirable to provide for the expansion of the University system in Ireland, and are anxious to see measures taken for that purpose; but, on the other hand, we cannot assent to any proposal which could be turned into an endowment of religious teaching. We consider that that is a point which has been settled by Parliament; and when it comes to a question of the Irish Church surplus, we feel bound not to allow that surplus to be applied in a way that would be open to objection. There are other points which may be raised with regard to this measure. I do not think it would be advantageous to go into them, nor do I think it would be possible to improve much on what has been said by my hon. and learned Friend the Member for the University of Dublin. The hon. and learned Gentleman has great knowledge and has had large experience on the subject, and he has expressed an opinion in favour of a third University. That is a point upon which I must cordially say I do not feel so sure as my hon. and learned Friend; but I am ready to suspend my judgment respecting it. The question of affiliating Colleges is one which raises very great difficulties; and I confess that I should prefer to see payments made directly to the students themselves instead of to the Colleges, unless some better provision can be made than that contained in the Bill to prevent payments being made to endow denominational institutions. As to the various purposes to which the money might be applied, I will not now enter fully into them; but I think it would be wiser, if we are to have payments made to Professors and persons engaged in teaching, that it should be kept more directly under the control of Parliament, and that the salaries of such persons should be placed on the Votes of Parliament rather than that they should be defrayed out of a fund over which Parliament has no control. These are some of the suggestions which arise on the scheme which we have had before us during the last few days. There has not yet been opportunity for that scheme being particularly examined by those most competent to examine it, and it is a scheme upon which further information really is required before the House can come to a conclusion whether it will or will not proceed so far as to give it a second reading.

MR. LOWE: Sir, I take it for granted, after the speech of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, that my hon. Friend the Member for Roscommon (the O'Connor Don) will not think it wise to press for a Division this afternoon, as he might meet with opposition on that side of the House which, possibly, a little more consideration and reflection would altogether obviate. I trust, also, that the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer will give—indeed, I am sure he will give—that fair and candid consideration to the question which it requires, and will not consider that he is deterred from doing so by any objection to details of the Bill which might be removed in Committee. The matter is, of course, one of considerable complexity and still greater delicacy, and I think we cannot approach it in too calm or,

The Chancellor of the Exchequer

I may say, judicial a spirit. The right hon. Gentleman has set a very good example in that respect in the speech he has just made, and I cannot do better than follow it. We all have, I believe, the same view in our minds, and that is to do the best which can be done for the people of Ireland. One thing which strikes me is that the course of the present debate has turned on matters which are not matters of the principle of the Bill, but matters for Committee. A great deal has been said as to the body which should be intrusted with the funds, and that is a matter entirely for Committee. A question has been raised as to what sort of Governing Body it ought to be, and whether it ought to be based on the example of the Governing Body of London University. I confess myself that, having some experience of it, I consider that a very proper body. London University is governed by a body similar to that which is here proposed, except that there is a difference in the number. Some hon. Gentlemen have expressed an apprehension that the members would not attend. The meetings of the Senate of the London University are not very exciting; they seldom have any disturbing topics, except when there is a question of admitting ladies to degrees. But we can generally get an attendance of 20 or 25, and, if that is the case in London, I think there need be no fear of obtaining a sufficient number in Dublin. All that has been said about jobs being done in a corner is, in my experience, quite imaginary. But what I really want to impress on the House is this—that it is absolutely necessary, not for the sake of Party, but for the purposes of education, and for good government in these Islands, and for the stability of this country, that we should take a clear and decided course with respect to Ireland. Forty years ago, an attempt was made to establish a system of joint education in Ireland. There is an immense deal to be said for the advantage of promoting the association of young men of different denominations, so that they may form those associations which are often so durable in after-life. It was a noble and good thought, and no one can blame those who made the attempt. But look at what has been the result. Look also at the result of the late Lord Derby's system of joint education. Where is it now? It exists in name; but, in reality, it is a denominational system to all intents and purposes. Last year Parliament took Intermediate Education in hand. On what principle? All that has been done points in the same direction. We are told that we are to assist schools; but they are all denominational schools. The late Sir Robert Peel made a noble attempt. He tried to establish a system of joint University Education in the Queen's Colleges in Ireland, and we have now Dublin University thrown open to all comers; but could anything be a greater failure? ["No, no!"] I do not mean to say that the Queen's Colleges in Ireland have been a failure in all respects; but they have failed to bring University Education to the Catholics of Ireland. The repugnance of the people is such that they will not go. Therefore, the state of things in Ireland is this—that we have originated a great and noble policy to which we have given every trial; but that that policy did not suit the habits, wishes, or feelings of the Irish people, and, in short, would not work. That is the position in which we stand. We have worn out all the machinery we devised for ameliorating the condition of Irish education, and we have now to take a fresh departure; and the question is, what is the fresh departure to be? Will you cling to the beggarly elements of the old system? Will you attempt still to force into unwilling connection with each other Catholics and Protestants, when you see by 40 years of experience that they are determined to remain asunder; or will you, as you cannot have what you would have, make the best of what you can have? I would myself rather see the youth of different denominations educated together; but is it wise or statesmanlike, having tried the experiment, and having found that it will not answer, still to go on with it, certain that nothing can come of it? As we cannot do what we would, had we not better do what is in our power? If we cannot educate all the youth together, is it not better that we should yield to the feelings of the nation, and adapt our institutions to those feelings? If we cannot unite them, the best thing we can do is to give them separately the best education in our power. What are we doing? We have adopted a system of Intermediate Education ; but what are we doing with University Education ? It is quite true we have thrown open Trinity College to Roman Catholics, but on terms which, in obedience to those whom they respect, they cannot accept. Are we, then, to say that all the University endowments of Ireland are to be absorbed by the Protestants, and that the Catholic masses of the people are to be left without the means of University Education because they will not accept the system you think best ? Is such a course safe, or wise, or worthy of a great nation ? That is the question which I hold ought to be decided on the second reading. If we go on as we are going, nothing but mischief can come of it. I think that all the details of the Bill, with which this matter is encumbered, are of secondary consideration. Any mistake in detail can be corrected ; but if you insist on setting your faces against what is fair, and reasonable, and just, you will educate a race of people who will hate you instead of loving you. It is in vain to talk of discontent and disaffection, unless we exhaust every means in our power in order to give Ireland what she never yet has had—a fair and reasonable share in the money spent on University Education in Ireland. I thank the House for having listened to me so kindly. Perhaps I have hardly kept to my intention, which was to speak with great calmness and reserve ; but I feel very warmly on this subject, and I can imagine nothing in the world is so calculated to unite together all classes of Her Majesty's subjects as that the House of Commons should—and I have great confidence, after the speech of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, that they will—take the subject into very serious consideration, not allowing themselves to be turned aside by small difficulties of detail, but determined that, come what may, nothing shall be wanting on their part to do equal justice to all Her Majesty's subjects.

MR. NEWDEGATE inferred, from the speech just delivered by the right hon. Member for the University of London (Mr. Lowe), that the Senate of that University was not quite an happy family. He (Mr. Newdegate) was one of those who looked at the substance rather than the form of the present Bill ; and he thought, after having consulted Mr. Speaker, that the substance of it ought to have been introduced in a Committee of the Whole House before the Bill was introduced, for the Bill proposed the endowment of a particular form of religion for educational purposes, as had just been declared by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of London, and the House could not have a more competent witness. The framers of the Bill had managed to elude the Rule of the House, for it had been so drawn that the word "religion" did not appear in it, and the consequence was, that although it was a Bill for the endowment of a particular religion, the terms of the Bill had enabled its proposers to evade the Forms of the House. The House had thus a Bill pressed on for second reading, the substance of which ought to have been submitted to a Committee of the Whole House before the Bill was introduced. The Bill, as was now declared, ought to have been founded upon Resolutions passed in Committee of the Whole House. By the process which had been adopted the Bill had been thrust on the attention of the House with undue haste, and now the hon. Member for Roscommon (the O'Connor Don) urged that the House should at once adopt its principle. What was the principle of the Bill ? It was exclusive to the last degree. The first principle of the Bill was that no student of any of the schools or Colleges connected with the Queen's University, the University in Dublin, should be admissible for examination for a degree before the Senate of the University, which the House was asked to create. The House knew not how that Senate was to be composed ; but the hon. and learned Member for Denbigh (Mr. Osborne Morgan) said that he should support the second reading of the Bill, but would insist upon Parliamentary control over the intended University. Well, there was a case in point. This debate reminded him (Mr. Newdegate) of the debates prior to the adoption of the first grant for the College of Maynooth, which he had read. At the close of the last century, an attempt was made to accomplish an object closely analogous to that which was now proposed. The Maynooth College had been founded on the same principle as they were now asked to re-adopt, but with the security that the Lord Chancellor of Ireland was to be a leading member of its nominated Senate, and with the further security that the provision for Maynooth was to be derived from annual grants, to be year by year proposed and voted in the House of Commons. The hon. and learned Member for Denbigh could not be ignorant of the history of the College of Maynooth, or of the final abandonment of all attempts on the part of Parliament to control it. How, then, could they hope that Parliament could control such an institution as that now sought to be created? He (Mr. Newdegate) adduced the case of Maynooth as an illustration of the failure of Parliamentary control. The Lord Chancellor of Ireland (Lord Chancellor Redesdale), after the institution of Maynooth College had been in existence for some years, petitioned His Majesty, that he might be relieved from his functions with respect to the College of Maynooth, because he found himself in a position of disgraceful nonentity. What hope, then, was there of the efficiency of Parliamentary control over a University, constituted as was proposed by the Bill? Not only did the Bill involve the principle of denominational endowment, but, as he had said before, the principle of exclusion—exclusion of the pupils of every school connected with either of the other Universities in Ireland. How could they have a clearer illustration of the obvious character of this proposed institution? This University was founded on the principle of exclusive denominationalism, and yet the Representative of the University of London, which was founded upon the opposite principle of non-denominational inclusion, seemed to imagine that the House would create satisfaction by this abandonment of the principle he was bound to represent in favour of principles Parliament had not for 300 years sanctioned. Parliament had abandoned the principle of denominational exclusiveness, even where much more moderately exemplified in the case of the older English Universities, and yet Parliament was now deliberately asked to adopt the principle of exclusive denominationalism in Ireland. Be it observed that the Roman Catholic Bishops were silent. At the end of April there appeared in The Times newspaper an announcement that there had been a serious difference among the authorities of the Roman Catholic Church in Ireland. Simultaneously with the appearance of Cardinal

Mr. Lowe

Cullen in Ireland, as a Bishop, in 1851—he (Mr. Newdegate) well remembered it—the Christian Brothers, an Order affiliated, as he (Mr. Newdegate) believed, to the Jesuit Order, appeared in Ireland. After Cardinal Cullen had attended the last meeting of the Papal Council of 1870, he went to the Irish College in Rome, and there made a speech which was reported in the English Roman Catholic newspapers, and of which the Cardinal never to the day of his death denied the authenticity. He told the Irish College that the object of the Papal Council of 1870 was to suppress Gallicanism in the Roman Catholic Church, and to establish the domination of Ultramontaniam. Ultramontaniam was the extreme of Popery. It was the principle, which sought to uphold the universal and temporal, as well as the ecclesiastical, power of the Pope. Ultramontaniam involved this principle—that whatever a Roman Catholic might seek in the form of education, in the sphere of literature, or in the form of any intellectual pursuit—he might have on one condition—that it should be granted to him by his Church, but that he should not pursue it, if forbidden by his Church. That principle the Christian Brothers had been inculcating and carrying out in Ireland to such an extent, and in so bigoted a spirit, that the Roman Catholic Bishops appealed to the present Pope against the exclusive action of the Order and their rejection of the Bishops' authority. The present Pope was reported to have refused the petition of the Roman Catholic Bishops of Ireland, though it was a petition, adopted by them, when assembled in Synod at Maynooth. This monastic Order was, in consequence, independent of the Roman Catholic Episcopate in Ireland, through the decision of the present Pope, whose predecessor, Pius IX., upheld the independence of the Jesuit and Franciscan houses in Paris, against the Archbishop of Paris. As far as he (Mr. Newdegate) could understand, the schools and Colleges, which would directly benefit by the grant Parliament was asked to make for this University would be the schools and Colleges of the monastic Orders, and over the conduct of these Orders and their schools the House had not even the security of the control of the Roman Catholic Bishops in Ireland, whatever that might be worth. He asked the House, after their experience of Maynooth College, their connection with which, and pretended control over which, Parliament had been forced to abandon—whether, if Roman Catholic Bishops could not control these schools and Colleges, which were to be connected with this new University, there was any hope of Parliament doing so? He trusted that the House would forgive the length of his remarks; that his experience of the Maynooth question in that House, the attention he had for years given to the condition and effects of the College of Maynooth, would induce the House to excuse his occupying their time. What was discovered by the Commission appointed to inquire into the education of Maynooth? They discovered and reported, that the education given at Maynooth was not only limited and imperfect, but that it tended to the most ultra doctrines of Ultramontaniam. Now, the House was asked to proceed upon the principle on which Maynooth was founded, in erecting a University for the laity of Ireland, after Parliament had deliberately severed its connection from Maynooth, a seminary which inculcated doctrines of which Parliament could not approve. That was the principle of the Bill. It had been introduced with great dexterity by the hon. Member for Roscommon; but he (Mr. Newdegate) prayed the House, and those who thought it necessary to establish another University in Ireland—a University to which no Roman Catholic could take any reasonable exception, if that were possible—not to adopt the Bill, because it embodied the desire of a small section of that House to endow that Ultramontaniam—that egregious Popery, the representatives of which now governed the Papacy by a persistent system of rebellion. These extreme doctrines had become dominant in the Vatican, and were found to have rendered the Vatican a focus of rebellion against every Government in Europe. ["No, no!"] He referred those who denied that to the Chambers and Government of Italy, to the Chambers and Government of France, to the Chambers and Government of Germany. Her Majesty's Government had, through the Chancellor of the Exchequer, expressed their opinion that this House could not safely sanction the second reading of the Bill without further inquiry—a Bill so drawn as to have invaded the Forms of the House, which, on any matter touching religion, required that the subject should be debated in Committee of the Whole House before any Bill thereon was introduced. He asked the House to reject the second reading of the Bill, as founded on a system of exclusive denominationalism, totally inconsistent with the principles, on which Parliament had for more than 30 years proceeded, and no less at variance with the principles, on which the Parliaments of an earlier period had invariably acted.

Mr. Newdegate

Motion made, and Question proposed,
"That the Debate be now adjourned."
—(Mr. Synan.)

THE O'CONOR DON: I do not think it would be desirable, after what has fallen from the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and from the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of London (Mr. Lowe), that I should resist the Motion for the adjournment of the debate; but I would appeal to Her Majesty's Government as to whether they should not give me an early day for its resumption, in order that we may come to a determination on the question involved in the principle of the Bill. The whole course of to-day's discussion proves that the subject is one which the House considers to be of the highest importance, and, indeed, which is so important as to be taken out of the category of ordinary Private Bills. One point has been mentioned by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, to which I should wish for a moment to advert. The right hon. Gentleman has said that in my opening statement I made an important announcement, which he regarded as, to a certain extent, an alteration of what I stated in introducing the measure, and that is, the source from which we proposed to get the money to carry out the provisions of the Bill. If I made any observation to lead the right hon. Gentleman to the conclusion at which he appears to have arrived, I can only say that I did so by mistake. We propose that the fund which we have mentioned in our Bill is the fund which should be used. We believe it is the right fund to have recourse to. But what I intended to convey in my opening remarks was, that if the majority of the House thought otherwise, and considered it better some other fund should be taken, we should consider any proposal in that direction rather than abandon our Bill—because that is not a cardinal point. We still contend that the fund we have named is the one to take; but, of course, we will bow to the opinion of the House in the matter. I hope that the Chancellor of the Exchequer will accede to the request I have made.

SIR HARCOURT JOHNSTONE, as representing a constituency, seven-eighths of his supporters being Nonconformists, would give his hearty assent to the principle of the Bill, because it would not subsidize denominational education, and it was the duty of Parliament to pass a measure that would be thoroughly satisfactory to the people of Ireland.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: It is hardly necessary that I should say a word in support of the appeal which has been made by my hon. Friend the Member for Roscommon, that the Government should give him some facilities for the further consideration of this Bill. I do not wish to press the speech of the Chancellor of the Exchequer any further than it is reasonable to do. I did not understand the right hon. Gentleman to commit either himself or the Government to the support of even the principle of the Bill; but I did gather from his speech that the right hon. Gentleman had applied his mind to the subject, and that on their being satisfied on certain points which he indicated, it was possible that the Bill might meet with the support of the Government. In these circumstances, and looking to the large amount of support which has been given to the Bill on both sides of the House, I cannot doubt the Government will be anxious that such an opportunity as seems now to present itself of settling this long-standing and difficult question should be taken advantage of, and I hope that they will give an opportunity for the further prosecution of the debate. If the Government intend, on further consideration, to oppose the Bill altogether, the measure can probably be disposed of at another Sitting. But, on the other hand, if the Government, on examination, clearly approve of the principle of the Bill, it will then be a matter for consideration how much time they may be able to give to it. I hope, at all events, that they will entertain the proposal for another day.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I am sorry to say, in reply to the appeal which has been made to the Government, that we are unable to respond to that appeal, at all events, at the present time. I quite acknowledge the importance of the measure and of the subject; but I must remind the House of the great difficulties which the Members of the Government themselves experience in proceeding with their own Business. It is, therefore, not in my power to name a day for the resumption of the debate.

MAJOR NOLAN: I think that the reply of the Chancellor of the Exchequer is to be regretted. The Leader of the Opposition has applied to the right hon. Gentleman to afford a day on which this discussion might be resumed; but the Chancellor of the Exchequer, acting contrary to the ordinary usages of the House, does not see his way to do so. I maintain that it is a most unusual thing, when the Leader of the Opposition asks for a day, for the Leader of the House to refuse that day. Other Irish Business was given up upon this Wednesday, in order that the Bill of my hon. Friend might be taken; and a wish having been expressed for another day from the front Opposition Bench, I think the Chancellor of the Exchequer has taken a somewhat extraordinary course in declining to accede to this request.

MR. PARNELL: The Chancellor of the Exchequer has always shown himself to be very desirous of doing everything in his power to meet the convenience of the Irish Members—at least, that has been my experience, and, I believe, it has been the experience of other hon. Gentlemen. What is the position of the Irish Members? Most of them, including myself, have come over here at the greatest possible inconvenience, in order to be present at the second reading of this Bill, and if the Chancellor of the Exchequer refuses to name a day, at some time or other, when the consideration of the subject may be resumed, we shall be placed in the position of being obliged to hang about the House waiting for the Bill to come on. On the other hand, if a day were appointed as requested, we could return with clear consciences to our pursuits in our own country. I do hope the right hon. Gentleman will re-consider the point.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL: I am glad the Chancellor of the Exchequer has not given a day. However, I merely rise to say that if there should be an adjourned debate on the question, I shall, after what I have heard to-day, ask permission to withdraw my Amendment, in favour of another Amendment, pure and simple, to the effect that the Bill be read a second time that day six months.

Motion agreed to.

Debate adjourned till To-morrow.

ENTAIL (SCOTLAND) BILL.

On Motion of Mr. JAMES BARCLAY, Bill to amend the Law of Entail in Scotland, ordered to be brought in by Mr. JAMES BARCLAY and Mr. MACKINTOSH.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 193.]

House adjourned at ten minutes before Six o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Thursday, 22nd May, 1879.

MINUTES.]—SUPPLY—considered in Committee—Resolutions [May 19] reported.

PUBLIC BILLS—Second Reading—Costs Taxation (House of Commons) [190].

Committee—Report—Local Government (Poor Law) Provisional Orders* [155]; Local Government Provisional Orders (Axminster Union, &c.)* [154]; Local Government (Highways) Provisional Orders (Buckingham, &c.)* [161].

Considered as amended—Summary Jurisdiction [169].

Third Reading—Public Health (Scotland) Provisional Order (Bothwell)* [162]; Local Government (Ireland) Provisional Orders (Waterford, &c.)* [133], and passed.

QUESTIONS.

MERCHANT SHIPPING ACTS—"KAIN v. FARMER."—QUESTION.

Mr. MAC IVER asked the President of the Board of Trade, Out of what funds the Department will provide the £1,600 damages required to be paid to Mr.

Mr. Parnell

Kain, owner of the barque "Dora," under a recent decision of the Court of Common Pleas, and confirmed on Appeal; what is the amount of legal expenses incurred by the Board of Trade in the matter, and which they will have to pay in addition to the damages and Mr. Kain's costs; and, whether the experience of working the Survey Clauses of the Act of 1876 has not been such as to show that they require amendment?

VISCOUNT SANDON: Provision is annually made for law charges in the Board of Trade Vote, and out of this Vote the damages in the case of "Kain v. Farmer" will, I believe, be paid. The costs have not yet been made out, so I cannot give the information desired on this point. As to the third part of the Question, I would remind my hon. Friend that the case of the Dora, about which the trial was held, arose under the Act of 1873, and not under that of 1876, under which the Board of Trade at present takes its proceedings. I cannot say that my experience of the Board of Trade, which, of course, has not been a long one, has at all made me feel that the Survey Clauses of the Merchant Shipping Act of 1876, which were adopted by Parliament after long and full consideration, ought at present to be altered.

CRIMINAL LAW (IRELAND)—THE DUNGARVAN MAGISTRATES.

QUESTIONS.

MR. O'DONNELL asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland, Whether it had come to his notice that, on the 3rd instant, before the Dungarvan magistrates, a poor woman, who had never before been accused of any crime (and with a destitute family, the youngest being an infant in arms), was sentenced to three months' imprisonment, with hard labour, for the theft of a small quantity of milk of the estimated value of two pence; whether, on the same date, and before the same magistrates, another prisoner, convicted of the theft of some articles of clothing of the estimated value of one pound, was sentenced to only seven days' imprisonment; and, whether, if the facts be so, he will take steps to procure the remission of her punishment?

MR. J. LOWTHER: Mr. Speaker, as far as I have been able to ascertain the circumstances of the two cases alluded to, I am disposed to think that the magistrates were right in the course they adopted. The case first referred to was that of a woman named Mary Hefernan, who was employed in a situation of trust, having charge of a dairy, of which the keys were placed in her possession. It was proved by witnesses that she had been seen on more than one occasion making away with the property of her employer; and I consider that the Bench was fully justified in taking these circumstances into consideration in apportioning the sentence. With respect to the second case, which was that of a woman named Catherine Maloney, she pleaded guilty to the charge of stealing articles of clothing valued at 7s. 6d.; but urged as an excuse that there were arrears of wages due to her at the time amounting to £2 16s., and that she had pawned the stolen goods as a payment on account. The fact of the wages being due was admitted; and although, of course, it could afford no justification for the robbery, the magistrates were, I think, justified in taking into consideration all the circumstances of the case, as well as the mere question of the pecuniary value of the stolen articles, which, in the majority of instances, forms only a limited portion of the matters to be considered in apportioning sentences.

MR. O'DONNELL: I would ask the right hon. Gentleman, if it is true that this was the first offence with which this woman was charged; and, being only a very small offence, whether the punishment was not excessive?

MR. J. LOWTHER said, he understood it was the first time she had been charged; although it was proved at the same hearing that she had been seen on more than one occasion committing the act referred to.

CONGRESS OF BERLIN—THE GREEK FRONTIER—QUESTION.

MR. LAING asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether the influence of the British Government is being exerted to procure the acceptance by Turkey of the line of frontier for Greece recommended by the Congress of Berlin, or, on the contrary, in supporting Turkey in offering a less favourable line; and, specially, whether Her Majesty's Government are supporting or opposing a line which would include the City of Janina in the Kingdom of Greece?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Her Majesty's Government do not think it would be convenient, at the present time, to enter into details with regard to these proceedings; but I may say that the influence of the Government has been, and is being, exerted in order to procure the acceptance by Turkey of the recommendations of the Congress of Berlin, which were of a general character. Papers are being prepared on the subject, and will be laid on the Table.

PATENTS—THE PATENTS FOR INVENTIONS BILL.—QUESTIONS.

MR. B. SAMUELSON asked Mr. Attorney General, When he will lay upon the Table the promised statement showing the number of Patents prolonged by the Privy Council in each year since 1870? He also desired to ask what were the intentions of the Government with reference to the Patents for Inventions Bill?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir JOHN HOLKER): I have obtained the statement referred to; and I will take steps to lay it on the Table of the House to-morrow. I hope [to] be able to pass the Patents for Inventions Bill this Session; and if the House would only allow the measure to be read a second time, I think I could agree to every Amendment which has been proposed.

ARMY—BALANCES OF DECEASED SOLDIERS.—QUESTION.

MAJOR O'BEIRNE asked the Secretary of State for War, If it is possible to devise a more effectual method of publication than the present one, in order to make known to the relatives of deceased soldiers the balances they are entitled to receive?

COLONEL STANLEY: The list of unclaimed balances belonging to deceased soldiers was formerly advertised in The London Gazette, The Standard, The Irish Times, and other papers; but in consequence of the expense involved—£93 odd—in one publication, it was decided to publish a list in The London Gazette only. I am not certain, at the present moment, what better mode can be suggested for making known to the relatives of deceased soldiers the balances they are entitled to; but I am inclined to think that if the brigade depôts were made more generally the centres of information respecting men, some advantage might be secured.

ARMY—VETERINARY WARRANT OF MAY 1, 1878.—QUESTION.

COLONEL ARBUTHNOT asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether any and what steps have been taken with a view to the amendment of the Veterinary Warrant of 1st of May 1878, in consequence of representations which have been made relative to the same; and, whether any decision has been arrived at?

COLONEL STANLEY: No, Sir; no decision has yet been arrived at.

POST OFFICE—THE CHINA MAILS. QUESTION.

MR. DALRYMPLE asked the Postmaster General, If his attention has been specially called to the inconvenience and loss caused to persons engaged in the China trade by an arrangement contained in the new Postal Contract with the Peninsular and Oriental Company, by which a stoppage on the homeward voyage of forty-eight hours at Hong Kong has been assented to, when no mail necessity can be pleaded in justification (as twenty-four hours are sufficient on the outward voyage), in order that the steamer carrying the mails may load homeward cargo?

LORD JOHN MANNERS, in reply, said, the duration of the stoppage at Hong Kong of the homeward packet from Shanghai, under the new Contract with the Peninsular and Oriental Company, was the same as at present—namely, 48 hours, and it was understood that this interval was of advantage to the China merchants, most of whom had branch houses or agencies at Hong Kong. This stay of 48 hours at Hong Kong was a stipulation of the Peninsular and Oriental Company in their tender, and formed part of it.

CONSPIRACY AND PROTECTION OF PROPERTY ACT, 1875—"BESETTING." QUESTION.

MR. BURT asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, If his attention has been called to a case tried before the stipendiary magistrates a few days ago at Birkenhead, when Thomas Critchley and William Suxden were fined one shilling each and £5 12s. costs between them, or in default to go to gaol for seven days, for "besetting the approaches to Messrs. Brassey's Engine Works, with a view to compelling two of the workmen to leave their employment;" whether, as the defendants were admitted by the magistrates to have used "no threats or violence" their conviction can be justified; and, whether, in this case, due regard has been had to the definition of "besetting," as given in the latter part of the seventh section of "The Conspiracy and Protection of Property Act, 1875?"

Colonel Stanley

MR. ASSHETON CROSS: This, Sir, is an important point; and the parties have very properly appealed. That being so, and as the matter is awaiting the decision of a Court of Law, it would be manifestly improper on my part to express any opinion on the subject.

SOUTH AFRICA—THE FORCES IN ZULULAND—QUESTIONS.

MR. WADDY asked the Secretary of State for War, What is the total number of British and Colonial Forces, naval and military, and of all arms now in Zululand; and, what troops, if any, are on their way thither or are under orders to depart?

COLONEL STANLEY, in reply, said, the total number, according to the last Return of the British Forces, was 16,959, in addition to 1,064 men on the passage out and 1,615 under orders to embark. The Colonial troops were, so far as he had been able to ascertain, something like 4,453 of all arms. He had no Returns of the Naval Force. The troops under orders to embark were, for the most part, drafts.

MR. WADDY said, that perhaps the First Lord of the Admiralty could inform the House what was the amount of the Naval Force?

MR. W. H. SMITH: The number of men landed from the ships is 850 blue-jackets and Marines.

INDIA—THE DISTURBANCES IN BOMBAY.—QUESTION.

MR. HANBURY asked the Under Secretary of State for India, Whether it is true that there has been a renewal of popular disturbances, accompanied by incendiary fires, in the Bombay Presidency; to what cause it is attributed; and, what steps the Government have taken to carry out the pledge given three years ago of measures for the relief of the agricultural population in the Deccan?

MR. E. STANHOPE: My noble Friend the Secretary of State for India (Viscount Cranbrook) telegraphed the other day to the Governor of Bombay with the view of obtaining the latest information on the subject; and, with the permission of the House, I will read the reply, dated May 21, of Sir Richard Temple—

“Your Lordship’s telegram regarding Deccan troubles.—Recent Dacoities occurred in villages, either side, above and below mountains, western border, Poona and Sattara districts. Robbery only, not murder. Plans laid for seizing money and valuables, to be secreted in hilly jungles for future use. Dacoits, hill men of hardy, daring character, led by one or two educated persons. Numbers small; not exceeding 300. They are in two or three gangs; but steep hills and thick jungle favour their operations. First symptoms early last March, when we placed detachments of troops at all the principal places near Eastern side of mountains to prevent evil spreading, besides increased police precautions. Original leader and gang soon captured. Trouble checked end March to middle April; began again end April. Additional detachments of troops despatched, and special pursuing parties organized under European officers. Capture of one desperate gang just effected, and stolen property recovered; leader not caught, but systematically pursued. Poona city fires directed against two old Maharratta palaces, used by British for public purposes. The incendiarism probably intended to annoy Government. Dacoities at present quite localized. Cause believed to be general. No local reason yet shown to exist. No sign of agrarian trouble. Distress increasing in Eastern Deccan, but relief administered.”

As regards the last Question of the hon. Gentleman, I have only to say that the subject has been under the very careful consideration of Her Majesty’s Government; and the Government of Bombay have recently prepared a Bill, mainly in accordance with certain suggestions sent out to them from the Secretary of State in Council. That Bill is now under the consideration of the Government of India. There will be no objection, when a conclusion has been arrived at upon it, to lay it on the Table.

ARMY—REGIMENTAL COMMANDS— THE FIVE YEARS’ RULE.

QUESTION.

MAJOR NOLAN asked the Secretary of State for War, If the general rule in regiments of Cavalry and Infantry is that Officers hold their commands for five years only; if, however, there are certain exceptional regiments in which the Commanding Officers hold their commands for terms beyond five years, whether the practical effect of such exceptional retention of command will be to cause junior Officers to be retired against their will under the new retiring scheme; and, if so, whether steps will be taken to mitigate the exceptional severity which the combined effect of the new retirement scheme and the exceptional prolongation of the Lieutenant Colonels’ command will have on the prospects of junior Officers in such regiments?

COLONEL STANLEY: As a general rule, in regiments of Cavalry and Infantry, officers should hold commands for five years only; but, in the concluding sentence of the Royal Warrant, provision was made for the extension of the term in the case of lieutenant colonels in command, in the event of their being called on, or engaged in, active service in the field, or under other special circumstances. The practical effect on the junior officers might possibly be prejudicial in bringing them under the operation of the compulsory clause of the Warrant; and it is a matter worthy of consideration whether in such cases the retirement of the officers should be dated from the five years’ tenure; or, in other words, that the appointments in succession to them should be ante-dated to that extent. I think that such an arrangement might answer financially and otherwise.

ARMY—CIVIL EMPLOYMENT FOR DIS- CHARGED SOLDIERS.—QUESTION.

SIR HENRY HAVELOCK asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether, considering the universally acknowledged and daily increasing difficulties of obtaining old and experienced non-commissioned officers for the Army, he has taken any steps to carry out the recommendations of the Select Committee presided over by the Right honourable Member for Pontefract in 1875 and 1876, on the civil employment for discharged soldiers, as to placing at the disposal of the Army, as inducements to non-commissioned officers to prolong their service to twenty-one years, that limited number of permanent posts in the Civil Service of the Country which that Committee found to be available for that purpose, after all the legitimate and reasonable requirements of the Civil Departments have been complied with; and, whether he can give any hopes that this great inducement will shortly be held out to non-commissioned officers to prolong their service?

COLONEL STANLEY: This question has not been lost sight of; and we are at present in correspondence with the Treasury as regards those appointments which affect the War Office. As to rural post messengers, it was found that, practically, there were no candidates.

ARMY—THE 88TH REGIMENT—VOLUNTEERS.—QUESTIONS.

SIR HENRY HAVELOCK asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether it is a fact that, a few months ago, while the 88th Regiment was virtually on active service, volunteers were actually called for and given from the depôt of that regiment to other regiments in South Africa; whether, when more reinforcements were subsequently required, volunteers from other regiments at home had not to be again called for to fill the deficiencies thus wholly unnecessarily caused in the strength of the 88th Regiment; whether this departure from the principle of the supply of a regiment with men from its own depôt was simply a blunder, or was intended as a new method of developing the brigade-depôt system; and, whether it was done with the knowledge and approval of the Commander-in-Chief?

COLONEL STANLEY: I am informed that no volunteers have been called for or taken from the depôt of the 88th Regiment since the outbreak of hostilities. No volunteers have been called for or required by the 88th, which are still in excess of the establishment.

SIR HENRY HAVELOCK asked whether volunteers were not called for between the cessation of hostilities with the Galekas and the breaking out of the Zulu War?

Sir Henry Havelock

COLONEL STANLEY: It is very possible that that may have been so; but the point of the Question is answered by the fact that the 88th is in excess of the establishment.

ARMY—FIRST-CLASS ARMY RESERVE. QUESTION.

COLONEL MURE asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether, in view of the long time which must elapse before the Army Discipline and Regulation Bill can possibly become Law, Her Majesty's Government will introduce a Bill into Parliament amending the existing Law which regulates the service of the First Class Army Reserve, enabling Her Majesty to call for volunteers from that body during the present emergency in Zululand?

COLONEL STANLEY, in reply, said, that if an understanding could by any means be arrived at, and a Bill of one clause, enabling the men of the First Class Army Reserve to volunteer for service, could be passed through the House without prolonged discussion or the opening up of general questions, he would be willing to introduce such a measure. If, however, it was likely to lead to lengthened discussion, it would, he thought, be better to proceed in the matter by means of the Army Discipline and Regulation Bill, in which there was a clause of a similar nature.

COLONEL MURE said, the Secretary of State for War could only discover whether it would be allowed to pass without discussion by bringing forward the Bill. The onus was upon the right hon. and gallant Gentleman; but, at the same time, he, personally, did not think there would be much opposition.

LUNACY LAWS—LEGISLATION.

QUESTION.

MR. DILLWYN asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, If he can state when the Lord Chancellor intends to bring in the Bill relating to the Lunacy Laws, which, a short time ago, he informed the House to be his Lordship's intention to introduce?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS, in reply, said, his noble and learned Friend would be very glad to introduce it; but he was waiting until some progress had been made in the measures already before the House.

MALTA — THE MALTESE CIVIL SERVICE.—QUESTION.

MR. ANDERSON asked the Secretary of State for the Colonies, When Sir P. Julian's Report on Maltese matters is to be laid before Parliament, and why the Papers as to the Maltese Riots of 15th May last, promised on the 20th March, have not yet been laid upon the Table?

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH, in reply, said, that the Report related to the Maltese Civil Service, and that it had only recently reached the Government; but he could not say positively whether he would be able to lay it on the Table. It must first be laid before the Council of Malta, whom it primarily concerned. He regretted that Papers as to the riots, presented on the 15th of May last, had not yet been circulated; but they would be in the hands of hon. Members in a few days.

EDUCATION (SCOTLAND) ACT, 1878—EXAMINATION OF HIGH CLASS SCHOOLS.—QUESTION.

DR. CAMERON asked the Vice-President of the Council, Whether the Scotch Education Department has yet arranged with the Treasury for the carrying out the provisions of section twenty of "The Education (Scotland) Act, 1878," for the examination of higher class schools under the management of school boards; and, if not, whether there is still hope of the matter being arranged in time to relieve the school boards concerned from the necessity of appointing their own examiners under the Education (Scotland) Act of 1872?

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON: No change has been made in the decision of the Treasury to refuse to allow the cost of the examination of higher class schools under the management of school boards to be defrayed from public funds since a Question was asked on the subject by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of Edinburgh (Mr. Lyon Playfair). Considerable difficulty has been found in completing the arrangements for these examinations on the terms which were accepted by some of the school boards in small towns; but we hope that, in the case of these boards, this difficulty may be overcome in time to admit of the examinations being undertaken, before the close of the winter session, by Examiners appointed by the Department.

WESTMINSTER IMPROVEMENT COMMISSIONERS.—QUESTION.

MR. J. R. YORKE asked the First Commissioner of Works, Whether the Westminster Improvement Commissioners, appointed by "The Westminster Improvement and Incumbered Estate Act, 1861," to forthwith wind-up the affairs of the Commissioners appointed by "The Westminster Improvement Act, 1845," have concluded their labours; if not, when it is expected they will do so; and, whether the Report and Accounts, which were required by "The Westminster Improvement Act, 1847," to be rendered half-yearly, have been so rendered; and, if so, whether the Government will lay the same before Parliament?

MR. GERARD NOEL: The Commissioners have not yet concluded their labours, and possibly it may take three or four years to realize the remainder of the estate and to pay off the incumbrances. The Commissioners state that they furnished accounts to the Office of Works—then Woods and Works—up to the 16th of November, 1849, at which date their obligation to do so ceased by the operation of 11 & 12 Vict. c. 124. I may add that the Chairmanship of the Commissioners being vacant, I appointed Sir Henry Hunt to that post about 18 months ago, with the view of winding-up the affairs of the estate; and from communications I have had with him, I am sure he will spare no exertion to carry into effect that object with as little delay as possible.

BOARD OF WORKS (IRELAND)—CARRICK ON SUIR BRIDGE.—QUESTION.

MR. A. MOORE asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland, Whether it is true that the Irish Government have ordered the Board of Works to prepare plans for a new bridge at Carrick on Suir, and have called upon the grand juries of the three adjoining counties to present sums of money for carrying out the work; whether the people of the district have begged that a swivel arch or portcullis be included in the plan; and, whether the Government have ignored this appeal, and have insisted on a plan which will impair the navigation of the river?

MR. J. LOWTHER: The facts are correctly stated in the first part of the Question. As to the second part, if the word "town" is substituted for "district," that is also correct. As regards the action of the Government, the case was referred to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, which is the final Court of Appeal in cases of the kind, and the duty of the Government is simply to give effect to the decision of that Court.

MR. A. MOORE: Sir, I beg to give Notice that I shall draw attention to this matter on the Vote for the Board of Works.

SOUTH AFRICA—THE ZULU WAR—ALLEGED CRUELITIES.—QUESTION.

MR. O'DONNELL asked the Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether his attention has been called to the following account of the slaughter of a wounded Zulu Chief in the Durban Correspondence of the "Daily Telegraph" of Monday the 19th instant:—

"The following from Colonel Bellairs, D.A.G., has just reached me: Captain Prior, 80th Foot (on April the 5th) proceeded with a mounted patrol, consisting of Lieutenant Ussher and four of his regiment, and Mr. Freter, junior, from Luneberg, in the direction of the Upper Pongola Drift. Having come up with twenty friendly natives, and obtaining information that the Zulus were sweeping horses and cattle from the valley, he went in pursuit, and came within 800 yards of a few mounted men, who were hurrying on horses and cattle, which they abandoned and fled. After capturing the horses (eighteen), and leaving them in charge of Lieutenant Ussher, Mr. Froter, and two men, he went on with Private Bowen, their horses being freshest, following two Zulus who had taken the direction of Dombie. They came eventually within 400 yards, and exchanged shots with them; one of the Zulus was wounded by a bullet, and, the friendly natives coming up, was assegai'd. He was recognised as a younger son of Sihayo; the other, who got away, being ascertained to have been Umbelini;"

whether he has had his attention directed to the correspondence of the "Standard" of the same date, in which cases of refusal to give quarter and of the slaughter of wounded Zulus after the battle of Gingilhovo are mentioned; and, whether he proposes to take any steps in consequence of these statements?

Mr. A. Moore

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH: The account of the "slaughter of a wounded Zulu Chief" which the hon. Member has quoted from The Daily Telegraph is, I see, contradicted by a later account which appeared in the Press yesterday, from which it seems that of the two Zulus named one was killed by a bullet at 400 yards, and the other wounded, and that the wounded man escaped. I cannot say whether either story is accurate; but the later version certainly does not bear out the interpretation placed by the hon. Member on the passage which he has quoted. As to the cases mentioned in the correspondence in The Standard, they appear to be unsupported statements of a general character, resting on hearsay evidence, which I should not think it necessary to notice. Circumstances may unavoidably occur in the heat of action which all would regret; but if any English officer, or soldier, had intentionally refused quarter to an enemy who had submitted—which I do not believe—I am satisfied that the military authorities might safely be trusted to deal with the case.

SOUTH AFRICA—INDENTURE OF NATIVES IN NATAL.—QUESTION.

MR. O'DONNELL asked the Secretary of State for the Colonies, Why no Despatch from the Colonial Office has yet been published in the Blue Books laid before Parliament forbidding the South African authorities to indenture out captured Native women and children in servitude to the Colonial farmers; and, whether former British Administrations have not most strongly condemned this practice on the part of subjects of the Transvaal Republic?

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH: I believe that the practice of indenturing captured Native women and children to subjects of the Transvaal Republic, which was condemned, was one under which children were indentured for 21 or 28 years, and the rights of a master in the indentures of his apprentice were transferable by sale; and that nothing has now occurred which can fairly be compared to this system. So far as I know, in the only instances in which indenturing has now been resorted to, it was necessary to save from starvation destitute women and children who had been deserted by the men of their tribe; and I certainly gathered from the reports of these cases that the term of service was short, and that the conditions interfered no more with the liberty of the apprentice than indentures in this country. But, on looking at these reports again, I have thought it advisable, in order that the circumstances may be perfectly clear and any possible abuse prevented, to direct further inquiry to be made as to the precise action which has been taken; and I shall, of course, inform the House of the results of this inquiry, and of any measures that it may be necessary to take on the subject.

ELEMENTARY EDUCATION ACTS—THE BUCKINGHAM SCHOOL BOARD.
QUESTION.

MR. E. HUBBARD asked the Vice President of the Council, If his attention has been drawn to the letter of the Education Department of 12th March 1879, informing the Buckingham School Board that—to the present proposal of the Buckingham School Board to take a lease of suitable buildings to be erected for the accommodation of 300 children, at a rent that will pay five per cent. over the expenditure, the board reserving the right to purchase the buildings at any time at six months' notice; to the fact that sufficient accommodation exists already in the schools of Buckingham and Gawcott for the educational wants of the borough; and, whether the Department could make such local investigations and tender such advice to the Buckingham School Board as would save them from saddling the borough of Buckingham with unnecessary school accommodation?

“My Lords are unable to sanction the borrowing of money by your board for the provisions of a school for 300 children;”

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON, in reply, said, he was aware of the discrepancy which existed as to the sufficiency of the school accommodation in the borough of Buckingham. The Education Department had declined to sanction a loan for the building of new schools, or to express any opinion upon a proposal of the Board to lease premises for the accommodation of 300 children. The question was now one entirely for the ratepayers and the School Board to decide; and in refusing to sanction the loan which had been proposed, the Education Department had done all they could do in the matter.

SOUTH AFRICA—THE ZULU WAR—THE REINFORCEMENTS.—QUESTION.

MR. OTWAY asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether it is true as reported that reinforcements are about to be sent to South Africa; and whether the soldiers forming these reinforcements are to be taken from various brigades in England; and, in that case, whether the efficiency of those brigades will not be greatly impaired; also, whether, to give a stimulus to volunteering, gratuities of a guinea a head have not been offered?

COLONEL STANLEY: It is true that drafts have been, and are being, sent out from time to time to South Africa; it is also the fact that for some time past it has been contemplated to send out reinforcements, if casualties in the command become very numerous. Soldiers forming these drafts have in some cases been taken from various brigades in England, and it, of course, follows that the efficiency of those brigades has to that extent been impaired. As to the last part of the hon. Member's Question, perhaps he will ask that again, as I have no means of positively answering it now. My impression is, that a gratuity may have been given in certain cases, in accordance with the recommendations of the Committee which sat some years ago.

SOUTH AFRICA—THE ZULU WAR—
THE ROYAL MARINES.—QUESTIONS.

MR. OTWAY asked the First Lord of the Admiralty a Question which, to some extent, followed upon the one which had just been answered by the right hon. and gallant Gentleman. It was, Whether it is not the case that there in this country and disposable for foreign service about 2,000 seasoned soldiers of the Royal Marines; and, if so, what hinders the employment of these soldiers on service for which they are especially qualified in South Africa; and, whether difficulties exist in consequence of a difference of views between the Admiralty and War Department as the employment or command of the Royal Marines on such service?

MR. W. H. SMITH: It is perfectly true that there are about 2,000, or even more, Royal Marines, seasoned soldiers, and fit to embark for the seat of war if their services are required. I have already stated in this House that it is the intention of the Government, should it become necessary to send out battalions for the seat of war, to send first of all a battalion of Marines. There is nothing to hinder the employment of these soldiers in the Service, for which they are specially qualified. In answer to the latter part of my hon. Friend's Question, I may say there is the most perfect agreement between the Admiralty and the War Department in this matter, and their views are entirely identical.

MR. RYLANDS asked when the despatch from Lord Chelmsford, in which he asked for three additional battalions, would be laid upon the Table?

COLONEL STANLEY: I received a despatch last night slightly extending the telegraphic request. I did not wish to convey the idea that reinforcements had been refused. At the present moment the matter is still under consideration, and some drafts have been placed under orders, that is all. I generally publish such despatches as are of interest in the earliest Gazette; and other Papers are in course of time, and as occasion requires, laid before Parliament. The larger portion of the Correspondence received is of a Departmental character, and could not be laid before the House.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: Will this particular despatch be given to us?

COLONEL STANLEY: Oh yes.

THE STATE OF TRADE—STATEMENT OF THE PRIME MINISTER.

QUESTION. OBSERVATIONS.

MR. MAC IVER desired to ask his noble Friend the President of the Board of Trade a Question with regard to a statement quoted from a speech of the Prime Minister's in an article in The Times of to-day. He wished to say a few words in explanation of his Question, and, therefore, to put himself in Order, he would conclude by a Motion. The Prime Minister was represented to have used the following words in reference to a previous speech of his own:—

"I said that while the value of our exports had fallen off, their volume remained unchanged. That statement was made upon official authority, and upon facts the accuracy of which no one can impugn."

He and everybody who was connected with shipping would impugn these facts. He should like to know in what port of the United Kingdom the exports were as large in volume now as they used to be, and what was the character of those exports? ["Order!"]

MR. SPEAKER: I understand the hon. Member to be referring to words spoken in this House in the present Session; if that is so, he is out of Order.

MR. MAC IVER said, he was referring to an article which appeared in that day's Times. It looked as if that statement was based upon something or another which the Board of Trade had supplied; and he was most anxious to know what were the ports at which exports were going out in the same volume as formerly, and what was their character? He maintained that they could not be manufactured goods; they were probably such things as coals, pig iron, and other materials, which, being sent abroad, would enable foreigners to compete with our manufactures. He did not believe the exports of English or Irish manufactures were large enough to justify the statement. ["Order!"] He thanked hon. Gentlemen opposite for the patience with which they had listened to him. He did not propose to put his Question now; but he gave Notice that he would ask for information on the subject on Monday next. He concluded by moving the adjournment of the House.

MR. SPEAKER: Does any hon. Member second the Motion?

MR. BENTINCK seconded the Motion.

Motion made, and Question, "That this House do now adjourn,"—(Mr. Mac Iver,)—put, and negatived.

PARLIAMENT — PUBLIC BUSINESS— UNIVERSITY EDUCATION (IRELAND) BILL.—QUESTION.—OBSERVATIONS.

THE O'CONOR DON: I trust I may be permitted to ask a Question of the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and that is—Whether the Government now sees its way to hold out any hopes to us of our being able to resume the debate on the important subject which was under the consideration of the House yesterday? and, in asking this, I trust the House will permit me to say one or two words in explanation. I only wish to say that we, who are interested in the Bill, do not desire to make any unreasonable demand of the Government. We do not wish to ask them to name to-day any particular date for the resumption of the debate; but we really do wish to impress on Her Majesty's Government the importance of the subject, and that some hopes should be held out to Members of the resumption of the debate taking place at a reasonably early time after Whitsuntide. I make this appeal entirely on public grounds; and even were I to make it on personal grounds, I think I might have some claim on the Government, considering that immediately I became aware that it was the wish of the Government and of the House that the debate of to-night on an important subject should be continued to-morrow night, I, who had the first place on the Paper for to-morrow, at once waived my right, and the result will be to place to-morrow at the disposal of the Government for the convenience of the House. Well, Sir, I do not really base this appeal on any personal ground at all. I am quite aware that the Government have many important Bills which they desire, and which they have the right, to see pushed forward; and what I would respectfully ask of them is, making all due allowance for these claims on their time, that they would hold out some hope to us of our being able to resume the debate at an early time.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I fully acknowledge the considerate manner in which the hon. Member who has just sat down has made his appeal, and I wish also to acknowledge the way in which he has acted with regard to to-morrow night. I can assure him that I wish to meet his appeal in the same spirit in which he has made it; and I trust the House will allow me to draw their attention to the present position of Public Business. We have brought in, on the part of the Government, no fewer than 28 Bills, all of which are now before the House. Of these, a great number—14—have not passed the second reading, and upon seven of these the Speaker has not been moved out of the Chair, and five are in

Committee, and have to be considered on Report. Of the five in Committee, one is the Valuation Bill, with 112 clauses, and at the present time is on Clause 6; while the Army Discipline and Regulation Bill, which contains 180 clauses, has only reached Clause 44. So much for the Bills. Then, with regard to Supply, we have had only two Votes out of 26 in the Army Estimates, and we have also only got two Votes out of 18 in the Navy Estimates, and 71 out of 142 in the Civil Service Estimates. Well, under these circumstances, the House will see that there is a very considerable amount of Business—not all of equal importance, I admit; but the House is quite aware that there are several Bills which are of very great public importance; and in regard to one—the Army Discipline and Regulation Bill—I must remind the House that that is a Bill that stands in a very peculiar position, because it is necessary to carry that Bill before a certain day, or else great confusion will arise. That being so, what is the allowance of time at our disposal? Reckoning from to-day to the end of July, I find that there are nine Mondays and nine Thursdays—making 18 days—eight Wednesdays, nine Tuesdays, and eight Fridays. Now, the Wednesdays, Tuesdays, and Fridays are all more or less at the disposal of the independent Members of the House, while Mondays and Thursdays are at the disposal of the Government. That gives 18 days for the Government, which are clearly their own, and 17 days—a portion of which, up to 7 o'clock in the evening, the Government usually have in the form of Morning Sitzings; while the remainder of the time and the Wednesdays are, of course, not at all at the disposal of the Government. Under these circumstances, it will be seen that, looking at the large amount of Public Business the Government have before them, and looking to the scanty amount of time at their disposal, and at the disposal of independent Members, the balance is not so greatly in favour of the Government as in popular estimation may be supposed to be the case. Of course, I do not lay down a hard-and-fast line. Some of the Bills we have brought forward are of a more general character, such, for instance, as that to which the hon. Member for Burnley (Mr. Rylands) has given Notice. Under these circumstances, I think I should not be dealing fairly with the House if I held out at the present time any definite expectation of our being able to accommodate the hon. Member. At the same time, I fully recognize the importance of the subject; and I hope the hon. Member will be able to find a day for the continuation of the discussion. I can assure him that if the Government are assisted by the House in prosecuting the important Business which they have in hand, they will find that it will greatly facilitate our complying with the request, which at the present time it is impossible to do.

MR. SHAW: I trust the House will allow me to make a few remarks on the subject before the House, although I am extremely reluctant to interpose between my hon. Friend and the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and to put myself in Order I shall conclude with a Motion. I cannot but express my own very great disappointment at the answer just given by the right hon. Gentleman; and I think if the Chancellor of the Exchequer had given us a more definite answer he would have served his own purposes much better. Obstruction has become almost a fine art, and the right hon. Gentleman has, in fact, almost said to the House that if they keep these Bills about long and do not allow them to pass, he will not give us a day for the discussion of the University Education (Ireland) Bill. What is the state of this Bill as it now stands before the House? This Bill, be it remembered, has been received and acknowledged as necessary by nearly three-fourths of the Members of the House, and it has been acknowledged it would have been a very useful thing if it could be passed this Session. There is no doubt in the world that there are points in it which we, and the hon. Member who introduced the Bill, are willing to look at and consider fairly—

MR. NEWDEGATE rose to Order. There was no Question before the House.

MR. SPEAKER said, he understood that the hon. Member intended to conclude with a Motion.

MR. SHAW: I am quite prepared to move the adjournment of the House. I say that those who are responsible for the Bill are most anxious to meet the objections which are urged in a fair and reasonable way. But how have we been met? I take the answer of the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer as nothing but a distinct refusal to give us another opportunity of discussing this measure. Yesterday, when I addressed the House, I did so under feelings of very great difficulty. I have to acknowledge that usually, whenever I address this House, I receive nothing but kindness; but yesterday I had an impression that there was a great disposition on the part of the House to yield to that ignorant cry of "No Popery," which I should have thought had been dead and buried many years ago, and which, in my heart I believe, nine-tenths of the Members of this House despise.

SIR WILLIAM FRASER, who rose to address the House from one of the cross seats close to the Bar, was received with loud cries of "Order! order!" and "Bar!" He said: Mr. Speaker, I rise to Order—[Loud shouts of "Order!" and "You cannot speak outside the Bar!"]

MR. SPEAKER: If the hon. Member desires to address the House, he should present himself within the Bar.

SIR WILLIAM FRASER then came inside the Bar, and said: Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of Order. A Motion for the adjournment of the House having already been moved and negatived, it is not open to the hon. Member to make a fresh Motion to that effect without some other Motion having intervened.

MR. SPEAKER: No doubt that Rule applies when a Question is under debate as proposed from the Chair; but I cannot say that the Rule applies on the present occasion.

MR. SHAW: Mr. Speaker, I wish to get through the few observations I have to make as quickly as possible; but I cannot sit down without again expressing my disappointment that when the noble Lord at the head of the Opposition appealed for a day for the further consideration of this measure—

MR. SPEAKER: I must point out to the hon. Member that he will be out of Order in discussing the merits of a Bill which has been ordered for consideration at another time.

MR. SHAW: I should be very sorry, indeed, to transgress the Rules of this House; but I was really only wishing to point out the reasons why I thought the Chancellor of the Exchequer should have acceded to the request of my hon. Friend the Member for Roscommon. The feelings in my mind yesterday were those of sorrow and regret. My wish, and that of those with me, has always been to minimize as much as possible the points of difference between this country and Ireland, and to endeavour to find some common ground upon which we can meet to remedy and reform the great evils which exist in Ireland. But what a message we shall have to take back to the people of Ireland on a subject so important and essential to the well-being of the country.

MR. SPEAKER: I must again remind the hon. Member that he is infringing the Rules of the House.

MR. SHAW: I must express my regret, Mr. Speaker, that I have transgressed the Rules of the House. I have been carried away by my feelings, and I must say that there was no premeditation on my part. I now move that the House do now adjourn.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That this House do now adjourn."—
(Mr. Shaw.)

MR. SULLIVAN: I do not know that at any time since I have had the honour of sitting in this House any message from the Treasury Bench has been sent to the people of Ireland so full of despair and irritation. There is no doubt on the part of Her Majesty's Ministers—there is no doubt on the part of the Members of this House—that the subject of the interpellation to Ministers this evening is one of momentous importance to the people of Ireland. Her Majesty's Ministers own the fact—they own it is most exigent and most necessary; and yet they have to-night told my hon. Friend the Member for Roscommon (the O'Connor Don) that he may take his Bill under his arm and walk out of the House with it. Let us recognize the fact that the present Ministry have, like other Ministries that have preceded them, mocked the claims, baffled the hopes, and sported with the expectations of the people of Ireland, cruelly to deride and deceive them. Now, I charge, across the floor of this House—and let us have no beating about the bush—I charge that negotiations—semi-official negotiations—were carried on last December on this question in Ireland. There is no use in concealing this any longer—we shall have it out. I say the persons in the confidence of Her Majesty's Government have approached the Catholic authorities in Ireland; and I told them at the time, when I was privately consulted, that the Government approached them to betray them. They know it to-night. The Catholic authorities of Ireland were told if a moderate compromise were offered, the liberal feeling and common sense of this Assembly would welcome the solution of so knotty a problem, and the Members would be delighted to have this question out of their way. They were told that this question was embarrassing alike to the Government and the Opposition. We were told, and the Catholic authorities were told—let it be denied if it can—it was told upon what I call quasi-official authority, in Dublin—that this proposal was to meet with a cordial, or, at all events, a friendly, reception from the Government. I said, when I heard that, that I was sceptical. There are Catholic Friends about me now who know that I was sceptical then. I told them what would happen, and it has happened here to-night. I am vindicated now. My hon. Friend the Member for Roscommon undertook the unpleasant duty of proposing a compromise which might have imperilled his popularity in Ireland. He hears me, and he knows that the man who stands between a strong popular demand and the House of Commons, as a middle course, subjects himself to the misunderstanding of his motives, to the possible loss of popularity, and, lastly, to the possible failure of his attempt. I ask my hon. Friend, for whom I have the greatest regard, not to dig the grave of his own public position by any effort to settle the question, or to extricate the Government from their difficulty. I told him the Government were strong; and if there was any proposition to be made in the way of a compromise it lay upon them to make it. I told him that for the weaker party to make a compromise on this subject would be to put himself in the wrong; and that it was my sorrowful fear that it would lead to cruel disappointment and irritation of the feelings of the Irish people. One hundred and fifty years ago, we braved the penalties of felony for education. We are a people who have bled and suffered for our desire to give education to our youth. To-day we come to your House with a proposal which every man recognizes as likely to afford the basis of a happy solution of the question. Her Majesty's Government have 18 days at their disposal, and they cannot listen to us. "Come to-morrow," they say. I might write over the portals of this House for all Irish Members—"Abandon hope all ye who enter here." When we came here as an Irish Party in 1874, hon. Gentlemen who, like myself, then entered the House for the first time, said—and I believed them, and I believe them sincerely now—"Do not ask for Home Rule, or for separation, but show us what Parliament can do, and we will show you what Parliament will do. Put your finger upon practical questions requiring solution in Ireland, or that an Irish Parliament would deal with, and we will show you that English Gentlemen can solve them for you here." Here is one of these questions. Is it a question of magnitude? I appeal to the Government themselves—I appeal to the previous Government, with whom the question prevailed when they were in power—is this a question of pressing importance? I see here one of the greatest statesmen that England or Europe has ever produced. Yes; I repeat it. I did not then believe the proposal made by the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Gladstone) acceptable; but that never shook my confidence in the gigantic ability of his character. He proclaimed equally, with his Conservative opponents, that this was a question pressing and goading so far as the feelings of the Irish people were concerned, and he essayed a solution of it. You cannot deny that the Irish Party in bringing forward this Bill offered—I will not say the last, but one of the last, of the tests by which they endeavoured to ascertain if this Assembly is prepared to give that which the Irish nation with an Irish Parliament would give. What you give us now is the confession of impotence to deal with the question as regards time, or unwillingness as regards disposition. I tell the Chancellor of the Exchequer to-night—a Gentleman for whom every Member of the Party with whom I serve entertains unbounded respect—that by the answer he has given to-night he has struck a pang of sorrow and regret into the breast of every Irishman who had hoped to see removed a cause of bitterness, irritation, and exasperation existing between the Irish people and this House. I will also tell the Government this—that they have not facilitated the discharge of Public Business by what they have done. Let the Chancellor of the Exchequer realize this fact—that we fail to recognize in any one of the measures he has laid before the House one at all deserving to be ranked in its pressure and importance with the settlement of the question of University Education in Ireland. For my own part, I feel, after the answer of the Chancellor of the Exchequer to-night, that it would be a mockery for my hon. Friend the Member for Roscommon to attempt to persevere with his Bill. If he takes my advice, he will rise in his place and remove the Bill from the Order Book, and go back to his constituents and his countrymen, and tell them that his efforts—recognized as he is in this House and in Ireland as a Gentleman of moderate opinions—that even his efforts were vain to extract from the British Parliament this simple measure of justice to our country.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER ventured to interpose, because he really thought that a great amount of indignation that had been excited by what he said was thrown away, being founded on a complete misapprehension of what he intended to convey. He was told that he had made a distinct refusal, that he had sent a message of "despair and irritation" to Ireland, and so forth, in regard to this Bill; whereas what he had said was of a wholly different character. He appealed to hon. Gentlemen from Ireland to consider the matter from a common-sense point of view. They knew perfectly well that there was a considerable amount of Public Business which must be got through, and also that there was but a limited time usually given for a Session. They might, however, feel assured that it was the desire of the Government, if it was in its power, to facilitate the discussion of the important subject which was before the House yesterday. The Government had shown that, by the arrangement they made to enable the hon. Member for Roscommon to bring the Bill in. With regard to the time for its resuming consideration, he had said that the Government were unable at the present moment to make a proposal, because of the state of their Business; that what he hoped was that the House would assist them to get on with the Business, and, if they made satisfactory progress with it, they would be glad to do what they could as to giving a day for the University Education (Ireland) Bill. He called attention to the distribution of the time which remained till the end of the Session as between the Government and private Members; and he thought it would be borne in mind that as there was yesterday so there might be again other occasions between this and the time at which they might be able to offer him a day when the hon. Member for Roscommon might have an opportunity of renewing the discussion of his measure. Commanding, as it justly did, very great interest on the part of hon. Gentlemen throughout the House, he thought it very probable that the hon. Member would be able to find another day on which the same thing might happen as occurred yesterday, when hon. Gentlemen having priority on the Notice Paper would give way, and so allow the Bill to be proceeded with without interrupting the Business of the Government. He wished distinctly to say that he had in no way endeavoured to stop or to stifle the discussion of the Bill; but he felt that, in the first instance, the Government ought to receive the assistance of the House in advancing the important Business they had in hand.

THE O'CONNOR DON felt it necessary, after what had fallen from the hon. and learned Member for Louth (Mr. Sullivan), and from the Chancellor of the Exchequer, to say a few words. He confessed that he could not regard the answer given by the Chancellor of the Exchequer in as completely hopeless a light as the hon. and learned Member for Louth did. At the same time, he felt deeply disappointed at its not being in the right hon. Gentleman's power to give a more definite encouragement to the promoters of the Bill than he now found himself able to do. But he understood the right hon. Gentleman to state that at the present moment the Government was not in a position to give them a day, and he did not think it would be wise on their part to press the right hon. Gentleman further on the matter at the present moment. It was not his intention, however, to abandon every hope of passing the Bill; and he would, under any circumstances, put it down for an early day after Whitsuntide, when he and others would repeat the appeal they had made to the right hon. Gentleman to afford them facilities for the discussion of that important measure. He might add that every word which the hon. and learned Member for Louth had said with regard to his conversation with him was perfectly accurate. The hon. and learned Member had pointed out to him, in the very terms he had used to-night, the danger that would be run in the introduction of the Bill. But even if the Government were to treat them in the manner in which the hon. and learned Member for Louth thought it might treat them—and in which, perhaps, it would—he, nevertheless, was not a bit ashamed of having introduced the measure. He did not at all regret having done so; and, whatever the result might be—whether the Bill passed or was thrown out—he did not think he would have any reason to regret that he had proposed a measure which was not of an unreasonable character, but one which, if it had been brought forward by the Government, he ventured to say, would have been deemed moderate and reasonable. Whether the proposal led to the settlement of that question or not, it would, at least, have shown that those who were interested in the matter—and especially those who belonged to that community in Ireland which was particularly interested in the settlement of that question—were not unreasonable in their demands; that they knew what they wanted, and understood how to put their demands in such a shape that they might be fairly considered by Parliament. Whether Parliament rejected those demands or not, they had no reason to regret having made the proposal. In these circumstances, he thought the best solution now, on the eve of the Holidays, was to postpone the Bill; and then, after Whitsuntide, when the Government were better able than at present to give him a definite answer, he would repeat the Question he had put to them to-night.

MR. O'CONNOR POWER: On this matter we are not discussing the Irish University question, but we are discussing the conduct of Her Majesty's Government, and I wish to point out the difference which exists between the position which the right hon. Gentleman took up some time ago and his present position. The impression he made on a former occasion was that the Government were anxious, and were almost prepared, to give facilities for the further discussion of the measure; and he almost announced that they would consider immediately as to the day on which the Bill should be taken. It happened, however, that some private Members—the hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for Galway (Major Nolan) being the first—offered to give up Wednesday last in order that the second reading of the Bill might be taken. What is the impression the conduct of the Government will make out-of-doors? It will be said Her Majesty's Government are waiting to see how the wind may blow on the subject of Irish University Education. The manner in which the Chancellor of the Exchequer has dealt with the subject shows that the Government are not able to make up their minds, and are waiting to see how the tide of public opinion will run to determine their attitude. I do not think it contributes to the dignity of the Leader of this House that an important question like this should be dealt with as he has dealt with it. My hon. Friend has been asking him for further facilities for the purpose of this Bill; the right hon. Gentleman was able to find facilities for the introduction of the measure, and the state of Public Business was then much the same as it is now; but as he had not ascertained what the state of public opinion is out-of-doors, he has not been able to offer any further facilities at present. Surely, a most unsatisfactory position for a Leader of the House and a Member of the Government. As a Representative of an Irish constituency, I protest against—I will not say the juggling, but I will say the equivocal and ambiguous conduct of the Government in reference to this Bill. I regret the rather too conciliatory tone which I think the hon. Member for Roscommon has adopted on this occasion. [Mr. BIGGAR: Hear, hear!] I am one of those who put very little faith in any compromise that may be sanctioned by hon. Gentlemen opposite. But I felt it my duty to preserve silence, and to give my hon. Friend all the assistance in my power, because I felt that my hon. Friend was engaged in a difficult and dangerous task. There is a time when conciliation must come to an end, and when compromise is only another word for surrender; and, looking at the action of the Government, I think that that time has come, and that the Irish Members, who have been sent here to endeavour to settle this question, should take the very earliest opportunity of consulting together in order to see what course should be taken in reference to the Bill and the shifting conduct of the Government.

MR. NEWDEGATE expressed a hope that if the Government intended to give an opportunity for the further consideration of this Bill, it would not be brought on so near the end of the Session as was the case with the Intermediate Education (Ireland) Bill of last year, which was taken after a large number of hon. Members had left London. Referring to what had fallen from the hon. Member who had just resumed his seat, he said that the Members of the House must make up their minds whether they would exercise control over their own Business; because it appeared to him that the section of the House to which the hon. Member belonged had undertaken to exercise a kind of lordship over their time. For his own part—and he believed he was speaking the feeling of the majority of the English and Scotch Members—he refused to submit to such a control.

MR. COGAN approved of the course which his hon. Friend (the O'Connor Don) had taken in not yet abandoning the Bill. That was a step of the most serious import, and the political feeling it would create in Ireland would be most disastrous and dangerous to the common weal of the United Kingdom. He believed the course which had been already taken by Government with regard to the measure would create a feeling of uneasiness, a feeling of want of confidence in the Parliament being able to deal with matters of great importance to Ireland, and a feeling of distrust, the effects of which he felt would be impossible to exaggerate. He had already stated in that House that he believed it would be an ill day for the United Kingdom if the people of Ireland came to believe that a question which had been admitted by two great Parties in that House to be a question that required settlement, and to be inevitably interesting to the welfare of their country—if they came to believe, after it had been admitted that this question was so important and so necessary to be dealt with, that, after all, their hopes had been trifled with, and that neither the Government nor the House was prepared seriously to take the question into consideration. Whatever might be the fate or the result of the Bill now before the House, he felt that his hon. Friend the Member for Roscommon had done a wise and good act in placing before Parliament a moderate and reasonable proposal for settling this question. In that proposal he had had the concurrence of many Irish Members who sat on the opposite of the House, as well as on this; and it was so reasonable and so evidently fair that it had elicited the warm support of even so strong an advocate of secular education as the right hon. Member for the University of London (Mr. Lowe). In the few sentences which the right hon. Gentleman uttered yesterday in that House, he spoke what he (Mr. Cogan) believed to be wise advice, when he asked hon. Members to consider whether they would not enter on a new departure in dealing with this question, and endeavour, as an act of great statesmanship, to secure on the part of the Irish people feelings of love, and not of hate. He felt those words of the right hon. Gentlemen were true; and as one who had been for many years an Irish Representative in that House, he had not himself abandoned the hope that the Parliament of the United Kingdom was able and willing to deal with questions that affected the welfare of his country. It would be a matter of deep regret to him if the day came when he should feel it necessary to abandon that hope. He confessed those feelings would be greatly influenced by the future course of Her Majesty's Ministers and the influential Leaders of public opinion who sat in that House; and if—which he would deeply regret—he should be forced to come to the conclusion that this Parliament would not be prepared to deal with this question, as he believed was required by justice and the interests of his countrymen—deeply as he should regret it—having now for 27 years been a Member of that House—he should feel that the time had arrived when he should abandon the hope. He should no longer ask to be elected to this House, when he felt that he was utterly powerless to aid in carrying out the wishes of those who sent him there; and he should feel it to be his duty to retire into private life, deeply regretting that the course taken by this House should have done the most serious thing possible in endangering the continuance of the union between the two countries.

MAJOR NOLAN: I wish to ask if the country can be expected to believe that it is the difficulty of time which prevents the Government giving a day? The Chancellor of the Exchequer says "Yes;" but I must say that it is a new event in Parliamentary history, when a matter is before the House which may determine whether Gentlemen on this side of the House or Gentlemen on that side shall form the Government after the next Election, that we should be told the want of a day prevents the matter being discussed. Why, there are plenty of ways of doing it. You might make the Session one day longer, or sacrifice a Saturday, or adopt various other methods which will be obvious to the youngest Member. It is quite in accordance, however, with previous experience that the Leader of the Government may not want to commit himself on a great question, and that he may so manœuvre as to keep dangling a particular bait before a large section of the country, and, by refusing to give a day for the matter to be debated, so tide over the time till the next General Election. The Chancellor of the Exchequer has taken great credit to himself for giving us an hour and a-half for this Bill the other night. That was the first time he had given us an hour for any purpose this Session, and, after all, what did that hour and a-half give us? We know what a first reading is. It gives the Mover an opportunity of making his speech and stating the substance of his measure; but it does not force the Government to express any opinion. The Chancellor of the Exchequer gave us a hour and a-half, knowing he would not be obliged to commit himself to any promise of support. Perhaps the Bill being put down for Wednesday was a little surprise to the Government; but with a great skill they managed to let the debate go on for five hours without showing any sign. At the end of that time the Chancellor of the Exchequer did get up, and he said there were a great many good things in the Bill and a great many bad things, and there were various things that he recommended for consideration. He went into other points; but he never said Yes or No. He never told us whether he was going to support the Bill or oppose it. At the present moment we are perfectly baffled. All we know is that certain Conservative Irish Members have put their names on the back of the Bill; and, on the other hand, we certainly attach some importance to some cheers with which hon. Members below the Gangway opposite greeted some of the arguments against the measure. I believe the Chancellor of the Exchequer wants to ascertain the feelings of his own Party; and, therefore, to put off committing himself either way till the last day. Now, I will tell you how he will probably treat my hon. Friend the Member for Roscommon. He will give him a day very late in the Session, and then at the end of the debate he will say there is no use going on with the measure at such a period of the Session, and that it had better be put off. I believe that is the position in which we shall be placed, unless we obtain some more definite promise than we have yet received. If we have to put the Bill off till next Session, then we shall have to put it off till next Parliament; and at the General Election the constituents in some parts of the Kingdom will be told the Government are against the measure, and those in Ireland will be asked to believe they are in favour of it. In that way the Government hope to secure a majority, if their cards are well played. I do not think this is a high way of governing the country; but we have sometimes seen it done, and it is not inconsistent with the action of the Government up to the present hour. To say that a day cannot be found for a measure supported by three-fourths of the Irish people—for it is supported by Irish Members on that side as well as on this—and a measure which may largely influence the General Election, is to show that the Government wish to retain in their hands, till after the Dissolution, the power of either supporting or opposing us.

MR. A. MILLS said, the Chancellor of the Exchequer had given the House no reason to suppose that the Government were trifling in the matter. On the contrary, he said he would do his best to appoint another day for the consideration of the subject. They had now been discussing the matter for an hour, and he hoped they would be allowed to proceed to Business.

MR. O'DONNELL: I shall not detain the House very long; but I wish to point to one or two observations made by the Chancellor of the Exchequer. When the right hon. Gentleman refers to a number of Government Bills, and to his desire for getting through these Bills before he can consider the question of granting a day for this important Irish measure, and when he allows other determined opponents of justice to the Roman Catholics of Ireland to exercise the time of the House in the discussion of these Government measures, so as to make it impossible for them to grant a day, I think we have a right to assume that there is little probability of our obtaining further facilities. For all we know of the extreme violence—I would add, virulence—of the anti-Christian party of this country, there cannot be the slightest doubt but that they will be able to bring sufficient influence upon probably well-meaning, but susceptible, Members of the House, to use the time of the House in what may be considered legitimate discussion. The Government will, doubtless, give them the opportunity which they require, and which may render it impossible to deal with the subject of University Education. Whatever may have been the charges brought against me on many occasions, I have certainly no desire on this occasion to address the House in language which may be considered, in the slightest degree, aggravating. I may, in my conduct, have shown a disposition slightly to amend and alter a Christian precept, and to have asked the House to do unto others as they would do unto us. But, on the present occasion, I am singularly disposed to act in the most conciliatory manner towards the Government and Opposition; but I cannot conceal from myself that there is a resolute determination to refuse justice to the Roman Catholics of Ireland amongst an influential party in this country. In reference to the suggestion, I have only one other observation to make. It is too commonly reported—and I am afraid too commonly believed—that this demand for denominational education in Ireland, for Catholic education, for freedom of Catholic education in Ireland, for liberty and equality of education, is a mere sacerdotal and episcopal demand, originating in, and supported by, the priests. It is said that the Catholics of Ireland are merely moving like a drilled battalion at the command of their episcopal commanders-in-chief. I beg to say that nothing of the sort is the case. No man reverences more than I do the Catholic clergy and hierarchy of Ireland; but I, as a Catholic Member of the House, take upon myself the responsibility of saying that, if there were a hesitation, if there were a variation, in the attitude of the Catholic Bishops and priests of Ireland, with regard to the absolute necessity of the Catholic education of the Catholic people of Ireland, dearly as the people of Ireland love their faithful pastors, from that day a gulf would be fixed between the people and the clergy. If, by an impossible and monstrous hypothesis, the Catholic clergy and Bishops of Ireland were to be in favour of secular education, they might go to Zululand, they might go to Patagonia; but a new class of priests and Bishops would have to appear in Ireland to resume the unbroken traditions of Catholic Ireland. That is, as I have said, a monstrous and impossible hypothesis. The priests and the people are united on the subject; but I beg to assure the House that the question of Catholic education in Ireland is a layman's question. If the present moderate demand of the Irish people is refused, the Catholic laity of Ireland will take it up with determination, and there is no doubt as to what will be the result. Supposing there is any irresolution on the part of the clergy, the laity will insist that the Irish people shall receive an education which will fit them for the combat of life, for progress in every department of the world's affairs, in conformity with the conscience, the hereditary instincts, and the glorious traditions of the Catholic people of Ireland, who look back upon 45 generations of Catholic ancestors.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: I must confess there appears to me to be hardly sufficient cause for the expressions of despair and irritation which have reached us from a certain quarter of the House. If hon. Members representing Irish constituencies will consider the position of this Bill, I think they will be obliged to acknowledge that they have cried out before they are hurt. I really cannot remember any

Bill of similar importance to the Bill which is before us having made such rapid progress. If they will take the trouble to consider the matter, they will find that it was only introduced by the assistance of the Government on this day last week, and it has already received a considerable amount of discussion on the second reading. I rose yesterday, immediately upon the adjournment of the debate, to press upon the Government the expediency of making some arrangement as to its resumption; and I do not think that anyone will suspect I am indifferent to the importance of the subject, or that I have refrained from impressing the importance of it upon the notice of the Government. I think that the Government, upon further consideration, will see that it is not only desirable, but absolutely necessary, that a question which has excited so much attention as this, not only in Ireland, but also in England, and in this House, should receive further and full consideration before the close of the Session. The reason for this was given by the hon. Member for North Warwickshire (Mr. Newdegate), and the hon. and gallant Member for Galway (Major Nolan); and I hope the opportunity will be afforded before we arrive at a late period of the Session. I do not detect in anything which fell from the Chancellor of the Exchequer an absolute refusal to give an opportunity for further discussion. I understood him to state simply the position of the Government Business, and to say, under these circumstances, it was not in his power to fix at this time a day for continuing the debate. The hon. Member for Roscommon (the O'Connor Don) has taken a proper and reasonable course in putting the Bill down for an early day after Whitsuntide, when the House and the Government will be able to see what progress they have made, or are likely to make, with some of the most important measures, and the Government will also have an opportunity of further considering the importance of this great subject, and the necessity of giving the Bill some further consideration. I really think that hon. Members from Ireland might wait, at all events, until after Whitsuntide, before they express their condemnation of the conduct of the Government; but, so far as I am able to judge, there is nothing which has fallen from the Chancellor of the Exchequer to-night that in the slightest degree approaches an absolute refusal to give the consideration required on behalf of the Bill.

DR. WARD said, hon. Members had complained that the House had been taken by surprise in this matter, and that very short Notice had been given of the Bill. The question, however, had been before the House for the last 20 years. It had been brought forward by responsible Ministers of the Crown of opposite sides; and, under those circumstances, were they to be told that they were taken by surprise? Why, this Parliament had heard the arguments over and over again. There was no proposal in the present Bill which had not already been before the House. Surely the House had by this time made up its mind; and if the Government were in earnest in this business, it certainly must be within their power to give them a Saturday for the discussion of the subject. Hon. Members might say that if such a course was pursued the Motion would be against the Irish Members. But if that were so, often as they differed, he could assure the House that they would pass the Bill in a proper form. What he wanted to impress upon the Chancellor of the Exchequer was this—The right hon. Gentleman knew he would have to give in at some time, that he would have to sacrifice a day sooner or later. Let him, then, make the sacrifice graciously now. Give them a day—say a Saturday; that would not sacrifice the time of the Government, but it would meet the requirements of this Bill.

MR. PARNELL: I do not join in the belief that has been expressed by hon. Members that it is hopeless to try to pass the Bill. The hon. Member for Roscommon (The O'Connor Don) has adopted a courageous course in persevering with the measure for a while longer. At the same time, I do not agree that the Chancellor of the Exchequer has done everything that is required of him. The hon. Member for Roscommon has asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer to give a day for the resumption of the debate, and he did not ask for the day to be mentioned at the present moment, but what was the reply? The Chancellor of the Exchequer went over a long list of Bills introduced by the Government, and he pointed out how very few had been passed, and the small amount of progress which had been made with others. We should have been children, did we not see that he did not mean to afford opportunity for the resumption of the debate upon this Bill. If the Chancellor of the Exchequer retains his present ideas, it is hopeless to suppose the Bill can be passed; and I see no reason why he should retain the unfortunate idea he has taken up. I will not prolong the debate; but I should not abandon the Bill hastily if the Government retain their opinion after Whitsuntide. We shall have had an opportunity of considering the matter, and we may take such measures as may seem desirable and necessary in reference to the subject.

MR. SHAW: I think we need not continue the debate further, especially after the appeal to the Government by the noble Lord. I shall, therefore, ask permission to withdraw the Motion.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

THE "HOME RULE" PARTY.

QUESTION.

SIR JULIAN GOLDSMID: I beg to ask the hon. Member for Cork County (Mr. Shaw) the Question of which I have given him private Notice, Whether we may in future look to him as the Leader of that section of the House below the Gangway, called the Home Rule Party?

MR. SPEAKER: The Question of the hon. Baronet does not refer to any Bill or Motion before the House, and cannot, therefore, be put.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

INDIA — EAST INDIA REVENUE ACCOUNTS—FINANCIAL STATEMENT.

COMMITTEE. [FIRST NIGHT.]

Order for Committee read.

MR. E. STANHOPE, in rising to move "that Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair," in order that the House should go into Committee upon the East India Revenue accounts, said, that in making the usual Statement with regard to the finances of India he felt, looking to the numerous and intricate subjects with which that Statement must necessarily deal, and to the public interest which the subject of Indian finance had recently evoked, that no one who had ever occupied the post which he had the honour to hold deserved more the consideration and indulgence of the House. But whatever might be about to happen in the course of the debate, he felt it to be his duty, in the interests of India, to make as clear and as impartial a Statement as he could, even if, in so doing, he should have to trespass for some considerable time upon that indulgence. No subject was more commonly discussed in the debates of last year than the difficulty which some hon. Members experienced in consequence of the changes that had taken place in the form of the Revenue accounts. At that time he had pointed out that these changes had been adopted in consequence of representations made in the House at different times as to the desirability of assimilating, as far as possible, the form of the Indian to that of the English accounts. It was, however, quite impossible to deny that there was a great deal of force in the arguments of some hon. Members; and, therefore, he had endeavoured to prepare a Statement in accordance with their views. And before leaving the subject of the forms of accounts, he would remark that the India Revenue accounts were, as usual, converted in accordance with the conventional system of taking 10 rupees to the pound. The main reason for this was convenience. Indeed, it would scarcely be possible in any other way to make the accounts really intelligible. It would, of course, be open to the Government to convert the accounts at the rate of exchange of the year; but that would prevent any possibility of comparison, and would cause great difficulty in the presentation of Estimates for a coming year, as the rate of exchange itself would be a mere guess. It would, also, be productive of inconvenience in other ways—for instance, if the Government should want to convey to the House a clear idea of the salary of a member of the Council, or other official, such salary would necessarily appear in varying amounts, whereas they all knew it was really a fixed payment in gold, quite independent of the rate of exchange.

He now came to the figures which it was his duty to lay before the House for the three years under review. The accounts for 1877-8 showed a gross Revenue of £58,969,300, and a gross Expenditure of £62,512,400, leaving a deficit of £3,543,100. This result, as the House was aware, was mainly due to the famine in Southern India. It approximated so closely to the regular Estimate which was given last year that there was no need for him to trouble the House by dwelling upon the details.

The figures for 1878-9, as set out in the regular Estimates, showed a considerable increase on both sides of the account. As he explained last year, this was mainly due to the incorporation into the general accounts of provincial income and expenditure amounting to about £2,000,000, and on the Revenue side, also, to the proceeds of the new taxation imposed last year. The gross Revenue was accordingly taken at £64,687,000, and the gross Expenditure at £63,236,000, leaving a surplus of £1,451,000. When it was remembered that, in addition to the expenditure which he anticipated last year, they had had an enormously increased loss by exchange, and had paid £670,000 on account of the war in Afghanistan, this result did not compare unfavourably with that which was predicted last year, or with the Estimate which he gave in December last, based upon such information as the Government then had. It was then calculated that, after payment of the war charges of the year, the surplus would not exceed the sum of £600,000. The real surplus had turned out to be £1,451,000.

The finances of India had been terribly affected by the recent famine. The direct loss of Revenue, owing to this cause, was estimated at about £9,400,000, in addition to the loans to Native States and the cost of a railway constructed as a famine relief work. Altogether, the Government of India believed that the disbursements necessitated by the famine amounted to no less than £13,000,000, the loss to the country being still greater. From Mysore and Madras, in which parts of the country the famine had made such terrible havoc among the people, the Government had, he was glad to say, received the most conclusive testimony of the great good effected by the charitable funds so largely subscribed in this country. Houses had been restored, thousands of horses had been given or let on hire, seed had been provided, and looms, ploughs, and other implements furnished in numerous cases. From Mysore the Government learnt with gladness that the crops were in good condition, and that there was a prospect of a speedy return to the former prosperous condition of that country. From Madras, for a time, the accounts had not been so good, but recent rains had caused a great improvement in the prospects of the Province; while it had been found possible to discontinue relief works at the end of last year. The Government of India, therefore, in framing their Estimates for the coming year, were able to lay aside any considerable anxiety with regard to the two districts to which he had referred.

[First Night.]

But one or two difficulties had to be surmounted. They had to provide for what he was glad to be able to call the late war in Afghanistan, and they had to meet the enormous loss which would be sustained in the operation of transmitting to this country the full amount of £17,000,000 required to meet all their home payments during the year. The actual payments on account of the war, which had been brought into the accounts of 1878-9, amounted to £670,000, which was considerably less than the sum at which his noble Friend the Secretary of State for India (Viscount Cranbrook) and he (Mr. E. Stanhope) had ventured to estimate it in December last—an estimate which was much criticized at the time. For the present year, the cost of those operations was estimated at £2,000,000. He had heard it said that this was an inadequate estimate, and that various high authorities shared this opinion. With all due respect to those authorities, he submitted that when their opinion was formed it was impossible for them to have correct data before them. The Government of India, who were responsible in the matter, had made that estimate, believing it to be a correct one, after full consideration of the circumstances in which they were placed by the position of affairs in Afghanistan, and the policy which was being pursued there. And, accordingly, it was arranged that a sum of £2,000,000 should, with the consent of Parliament, be advanced out of the Imperial Exchequer, no interest being payable, and re-payment to be made in the course of seven years; so that the Government of India would not only have cash in hand for their immediate necessities, but would be able to reduce their remittances to this country by that amount.

The difficulty due to the Afghan War having been disposed of, there remained one other matter to be considered before the Estimates could be framed. He alluded to the import duties upon cotton goods. The House would recollect a famous Resolution in connection with this subject passed two years ago. In consequence of that Resolution, the Secretary of State, not only in his own name but in that of the Council also, sent a despatch to the Government of India, in which he said that, looking to the condition of their finances, he did not think it probable that they would be able then to achieve the repeal of the whole of the cotton duties, but in which he also pressed upon their immediate attention the necessity of dealing with those portions of the duty which were undoubtedly protective in their effect. Upon those instructions Lord Lytton immediately acted, issuing a Commission to inquire into and investigate the whole subject; and, in the meantime, he exempted from the duty certain coarse descriptions of cotton goods, about which there could be no doubt as to the operation of the duty. That policy was universally approved. Since that time the Report of the Commission had been published; but to judge from certain minutes which had been delivered to the House, it had not been fairly studied by everyone interested in it. What did that Report show? It showed—first, that the extent to which the duty was directly protective had been very much under-estimated, and that it was desirable to extend, at the earliest possible date, relief to the suffering branches of the import trade in those goods; and, secondly, that that part of the duties thus shown to be undoubtedly protective could be removed without any very serious loss of revenue. It then remained for the Government of India to decide whether they would attempt to maintain a limit which was logically indefensible and practically utterly impossible to maintain, and so keep up the sources of irritation that existed between England and India; or whether they would follow the lines of policy laid down by the Secretary of State in Council, commenced last year, and approved by that House, and extend the limits of exemption to all those portions of the duties that were distinctly protective. The Government of India chose the latter course, and what had happened since? A discussion had taken place in that House, and the course determined upon by the Government of India had been entirely approved by a vast majority. Whatever objection might be made, either in reference to the merits of the course pursued or to the mode in which it had been carried out, he was perfectly satisfied that the Governor General of India would not have sanctioned that course except in the belief that it was the best, under all the circumstances, for the interests of India.

Mr. E. Stanhope

He came now to the Budget of the year. Including, then, the whole of the war expenditure which could at present be in any way foreseen, but excluding, as he had throughout done, the capital expenditure upon productive Public Works, the figures for 1879-80 were as follows:—The gross Revenue was taken at £64,562,000, the gross Expenditure at £65,917,000; or, according to the calculation of net income and expenditure which had been placed in the hands of hon. Members, the net Revenue amounted to £43,623,100, and the net charges to £44,978,100, leaving a deficit for the year of £1,355,000. But if the Bill which his right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer would introduce for the advance of £2,000,000 from the Imperial Exchequer became law, there would remain in hand a sum of £600,000 to meet any contingencies which might arise. Before he proceeded to attempt any general view of the financial position of India, it was right that he should call attention to the changes in some of the items of Revenue and Expenditure which the tables recently distributed would enable any hon. Member to follow as he traced them during the three years under review. Some of the principal variations which were to be observed were due to the great disturbing element of the famine in Southern India and the scarcity which prevailed elsewhere. The net proceeds of land revenue, for instance, were abnormally depressed in 1877-8, and they were largely swollen in the intermediate year by the arrears which had been collected in Madras to an extent beyond expectation. Although a small amount of arrears had still to come in, the revenue under that head was almost restored to its normal condition. In the same way, the drought in Upper India seriously affected the proceeds from the Forests and from Excise; but under both those heads some improvement was expected this year. The receipts from Customs were more difficult of comparison, because of the changes in taxation and the reforms in the import tariff. Last year, mainly by the abolition of the sugar duties, but also by striking out of the tariff articles which yielded only an insignificant amount, and certain coarse cotton goods, revenue was sacrificed to the extent of £232,000. This year the exemptions from the protective import duty of all cotton goods containing no yarn finer than 30's and the changes in the tariff valuations involved a loss of £192,000, making a total of £424,000. In spite of this, and also of the very great commercial depression which had existed, some recovery had taken place in the Revenue. The net receipts from opium showed an extraordinary fluctuation. In 1878-9, they exceeded the estimate by no less than £1,584,000. In consequence of the abundant crop of 1876-7 the stock in hand in 1877-8 was very large. Owing to a reduction of the payments to the cultivators and a failure of the crop, the charges were considerably less; but the saving appeared in the accounts of 1878-9. It was altogether an exceptional year, and the Estimates this year, though very much lower, showed, when compared with ordinary years, the expectation of more than the average receipts. The new taxation recently imposed, and which could be traced in the accounts, partly under the head of assessed taxes and partly under that of provincial rates, was expected to bring in this year about £1,300,000; and there would still remain for future years a small addition for a portion of the famine cess in the North-Western Provinces, which had not yet been levied.

The salt revenue showed only a very slight increase. The rise which was to be noticed last year, as compared with 1877-8, was due partly to the rectification of an erroneous procedure in the accounts from Madras, and partly to the fact that in the earlier year traders held back in the expectation of the reduction of duty, which did, in fact, take place a few months later. The revenue was now in its normal condition, the recent reforms in the salt duties having produced no particular effect upon the net proceeds. But, even at the risk of keeping the House from subjects of more general interest, he was bound, in justice to the Government of India, to explain what had recently happened with respect to these duties. Last year, he had described at some length the various steps in the process of equalization, and showed how the great and scandalous barrier of the Inland Customs Line—at one time 2,300 miles in length—might very shortly, in consequence of the reforms which had been effected, be altogether dispensed with. This line virtually ceased to exist on the 1st of April last, with the exception of the Trans-Indus section, about 400 miles in length, which it would be necessary to maintain for a short time. The accomplishment of that great reform, accompanied as it had been by the abolition of the sugar duties, which operated as protective duties against our own and in favour of foreign sugar, could not but be regarded as a great step in advance. It had enabled the Government to get rid of the vexatious system of search, of the transit duties upon salt, and, in the case of four of the Native States, of all other local transit duties also. Although the arrangements with the Native States, which had been rendered necessary in consequence, were not yet in perfect order, they were working more smoothly than could possibly have been expected. As the House was aware, it was no part of the original scheme for the equalization of the salt duties throughout India to add anything to the salt revenue. Nor was the increase of duty imposed in Southern India intended to form part of the Famine Insurance Fund. It was intended only to enable the Government to get rid of the Customs Line, while it was expected that the revenue would be the same as formerly. It was now thought that, after deducting the compensation payable to the Native States, and the loss of revenue incurred by the remission of the sugar duties, the net results of the equalization were to cause a loss to the Exchequer of £48,000 a-year, at first, but that this would speedily be recovered by the increased consumption in many parts of British territory, and in some Native States. It was, of course, too soon to form any confident opinion as to the effect of these measures upon consumption. Among the 130,000,000 of people to whom the duty and the cost of salt had been reduced, it was, naturally enough, expected to increase. And, accordingly, there had been a steady increase in the quantity consumed in Bengal. The amount which paid duty last year was larger than in any previous year. Among the 47,000,000 of people to whom the tax had been increased, it was necessary to watch the effect very carefully. The amount that paid duty in Madras and Bombay in 1877-8 was exceptionally large. Since that time the duty had been raised; but, in spite of the terrible losses of wealth and population which those districts had sustained, the consumption last year was only 3 per cent less than in 1877-8, and, with that exception, greater than in any previous year. As showing the effect of the spread of railways and other causes upon the price of salt, he might say that although in 10 years the duty on salt in Southern India had been increased 66 per cent, the price had only risen 20 per cent; and when hon. Members spoke of the oppressive nature of the tax, he thought they did not pay sufficient attention to the way in which it was collected—namely, by infinitesimal payments reaching over the whole year. It had been stated last year by a very high authority—he meant Lord Northbrook—that the tax which weighed least upon the people and caused least discontent was the salt tax. On the whole, he thought he might say that the great work of equalization had been accomplished without undue strain upon the people, and with remarkable success. It was an achievement of which Lord Lytton and his Government might very justly be proud.

[First Night.]

Having detained the House, he was afraid, too long in considering some of the details of the Estimates, he had to ask its attention to a more general review of their financial position, and before coming to the special case of the present year it would tend to a clearer understanding if he dwelt for a moment upon the results of the last few years. He would take the five years ending with the 31st of March last, during which the present Government had been in Office, and the finances in India had been administered partly by Lord Northbrook and partly by Lord Lytton, because they served to illustrate very plainly the main causes of the difficulties with which they had had to contend. They had undoubtedly been exceptional years. The Government of India had first of all to deal with terrible famines. They had been forced to undertake public works to an exceptional extent for the relief of the suffering. And so far from the pressure of public opinion in England having always been to restrict that expenditure, it was notorious that it had sometimes been in the direction of a great, almost an unlimited, increase. The right hon. Gentleman opposite—the Member for Birmingham (Mr. John Bright)—for instance, actuated by the highest motives, pressed upon the Government the immediate investment of £30,000,000 in irrigation works. Then, in 1876, came the sudden fall in the exchanges. And all those difficulties had to be met with a revenue diminished by the recent repeal of the Income Tax. The result of those five years, excluding the proceeds of any new taxation, was a deficit of about £3,000,000 only. But what was the extraordinary expenditure of those years? He was not going to mention the public works expenditure, although that was swollen to an unusual degree by the demands of the famine, because it was not a new policy, but one long accepted and pursued, and it was, undoubtedly, to some extent at least, under the control of the Government of the day. Limiting himself, therefore, to extraordinary expenditure, which arose from causes entirely beyond the control of any Government, what did he find? India had had to provide for famine relief no less than £12,000,000. She had found for net loss by exchange no less than £7,250,000. If he included the present year, the sum would be enormously greater; but, comparing it with the corresponding previous period, it would be found that it represented an excess expenditure of £5,500,000. So that those two items alone, both entirely beyond the control of the Government, had caused an extraordinary expenditure during this period of £19,250,000, or nearly £4,000,000 a year, while the realized deficit had only been £3,000,000, part of which had been met by increased taxation. Not only did this seem to show a most creditable effort on the part of the Government of India to meet its engagements and reflected great credit on the Governments both of Lord Northbrook and Lord Lytton; but he confessed that after these figures it surprised him to be told that a war charge of £2,000,000 for the present year was the sole cause of any difficulty that existed. The Government had had great difficulties to contend with, and it had met them with vigour and very considerable success. But the great object of directing the attention of the House to this period was to show in a clear light to what an extent the two great and paramount difficulties of Indian finance were the uncertainties which were introduced into it—first, by the loss by exchange incurred in obtaining remittances; and, secondly, by the recurrence of famine. He would deal with those in turn.

Mr. E. Stanhope

He came first to the item of "Loss by Exchange," and at the outset it was, perhaps, desirable that the House should understand clearly what was meant by that term. The Government of India received its revenue in silver, and had, of necessity, to make very large payments annually in London in gold. According to the form adopted in the accounts, the rupee was taken at 2s.; but, as its value in London was now only 1s. 7d., a very much larger number of rupees had to be provided in India to make those payments in England. When he spoke of the rupee being worth 1s. 7d., he referred, of course, only to its value in relation to gold. The extent to which prices in India itself had been affected it was almost impossible to determine. Some thought that no appreciable disturbance of internal values had followed the fall in silver. But, however that might be, it was certain that the internal change was very much less than that which had occurred in the foreign exchanges. The gross loss by exchange—which was practically, therefore, the cost of obtaining remittances from India—appeared upon the face of the Estimates this year as £3,552,000. But, on the other side of the account, there was the item of gain by exchange, which mainly represented the gain of the Government of India in its transactions with the guaranteed railway companies under the contracts fixing the rate of remittances at 1s. 10d. per rupee. Deducting this amount, he arrived at a net loss by exchange of about £3,500,000. It had recently been frequently stated that this was an exaggerated statement of the real loss sustained by the Government of India. Well, of course it was. He was careful to explain last year—and his noble Friend and Predecessor (Lord George Hamilton) did the same—that that amount, being calculated according to the conventional system adopted throughout the accounts of reckoning 10 rupees to the pound, did represent more than the actual loss. That had always been obvious to anyone who examined the accounts of the Indian Government. There was no mystery in the way of calculating the loss by exchange, and he would endeavour to explain the matter as simply as he could, taking arbitrary figures for the purpose. To remit £100 at 2*s.* the rupee, 1,000 rupees were required. To remit £100 at 1*s.* 7*d.* the rupee, 1,263 rupees were required. That was to say, the loss was represented by the excess number of rupees required to be sent home at the rate of 2*s.* the rupee; and, therefore, the sterling loss was 263 multiplied by 2*s.*, or £26 6*s.* That being the principle upon which the loss was calculated in the accounts, he would now try to state, not what the loss this year was according to the conventional system of taking the rate of exchange at 2*s.*, but what it was compared with the average rate of exchange for some years past, which was certainly not less than 1*s.* 10½*d.* Taking the whole amount of the remittances required to meet the Home charges this year, and taking the rupee at the rate of 1*s.* 7*d.*, as compared not with 2*s.*, but with 1*s.* 10½*d.*, he arrived at the result that the real loss to India on the total amount of the remittances that ought to have been made this year would have been £3,130,000 sterling. As they only proposed to remit £15,000,000, however, the real loss would be £2,750,000. But the point to which he especially desired to direct the attention of the House was, not so much the actual amount of this loss, as the great and recent increase of expenditure under this head. For the four years before the heavy fall of silver in 1876, the net average annual loss to the Indian Exchequer upon the face of the accounts was £432,000. In the four years since that time, it had been £1,920,000. This year it was in the same way, and, as he had already explained, £3,500,000. Speaking of this evil in 1876, when it was far less serious than at present, the late Mr. Bagehot, whose authority everyone in that House would fully recognize, said—

[First Night.]

“So grave a misfortune has seldom happened to any Government so suddenly and so completely from causes out of its control. . . . The great peculiarity of the case is the position of the Indian Government, which has so great a burden so rapidly thrown upon it, and is so little able by additional taxation with equal rapidity to find means to bear it.”

Again, it was said that the Indian Government was to some extent compensated for this by the increased purchasing power of its gold in this country. What the effect of that had been he was not competent to discuss, and the subject was too intricate to enter upon at the present moment; but it was clear that the gain could apply only to a very small proportion of the whole remittances of the Indian Government to this country. After all, however, they were really not concerned in calculating what the exact amount of real loss might be. He had only to guard against the idea that it was necessary to exaggerate it in order to prove its gravity. Taking it at £2,750,000, or what they liked, the worst difficulty of all was the disturbing effect which it had suddenly exercised, and continued to exercise, upon all the calculations of the Government of India. What a discouragement to all careful and prudent estimates on the part of the Government of India, when the rise or fall of 1*d.* in the exchange from causes wholly beyond their control might put a totally different aspect upon their financial position! It was, in such circumstances, as the Government of India said—

“Extremely difficult to follow any settled financial policy, for the Government cannot even approximately tell what income will be required to meet the necessary expenditure of the State.”

Of course, it had not been the only disturbing element in their calculations. Famine had been another; but, even for that, some definite idea of the average annual expenditure over a term of years had been arrived at. Then there was the direct loss sustained by all Europeans in the employment of the State, who, being in receipt of fixed salaries, had to make remittances to this country. And, lastly, there was the injury to trade. No doubt, there was great difference of opinion as to the precise effect of these fluctuations in exchange upon the trade of India. Into that question it was not necessary to enter; but hardly anyone would deny that with these fluctuations in exchange trade transactions must necessarily be of a speculative, not to say a gambling, character. No ordinary amount of margin would make a merchant safe, and the result was that day after day men withdrew themselves from Indian business, and invested their capital in enterprizes where prudence and foresight were of more avail. In such circumstances it was only natural that the Government of India should have had the subject of the disturbing effect of these fluctuations in the exchange under their careful consideration. And very recently they had addressed to the Home Government a proposal which they believed, if carried out, would remedy the evil. As soon as that despatch was received, however, it became apparent that it could not be discussed with reference to the interests of India alone. Accordingly, not only on account of the importance of the subject, or the weight to be attached to the opinions of those who had put it forward under a deep sense of responsibility, but also because of the other great interests involved, which it was equally their duty to watch over, the Government decided to refer it to the careful and detailed examination of a small Committee. At the outset, it appeared that there were certain points on which it was impossible to arrive at anything like a positive conclusion. To what extent the present disturbance was due to the depreciation of silver, or the appreciation of gold; whether the balance of evidence pointed, on the whole, to a long continuance of the present disturbance, or whether they might hope within a reasonable period for the establishment of a more fixed ratio between the precious metals; when and how the German Government would dispose of any surplus of silver it might possess; and what would be the policy of the Latin Union—these were questions which it was only necessary to mention to show the gravity of the considerations involved. The opinion of the Committee having been received, and the Government having had time to examine the proposals of the Government of India, as regarded their suitability to the peculiar circumstances of India, as well as in all their other bearings, they had arrived at the conclusion that it would be impossible to sanction them, and a despatch to that effect would shortly be sent to India. They recognized fully the motives with which those proposals were put forward; they sympathized cordially with the difficulties for which they were suggested as a remedy, and they felt that in spite of that decision, no Government, of whatever Party, could cease to give the subject a watchful and constant attention. The result of that decision was that the loss by exchange, whatever it might be, must be manfully faced.

Then there came also the difficulty of famine. The House was well aware that last year the Government of Lord Lytton first took practical steps for the provision of an adequate surplus revenue to meet the average annual sum required for famine expenditure; and as the nature of their proposals had been somewhat misrepresented, it might be well to state exactly what they were. The conclusion arrived at by Sir John Strachey, after a careful review of the finances, was that, in order to place them in a perfectly sound condition, it was necessary to provide for a clear annual surplus of £2,000,000—to assist in which he imposed certain new taxation, which last year brought in £1,200,000. Of these £2,000,000, £500,000 was the normal surplus of income over expenditure, which every Government, like that of India, ought to provide in order to meet any contingencies that might occur, and £1,500,000 was to be devoted to the relief and prevention of famine. It was at the time urged by some people that the sum so raised should be formed into a separate fund, with a separate account; but Sir John Strachey pointed out the difficulties of such a course on the 9th of February, 1878, when he said—

“With all my desire to see the pledges maintained that we have given, as to the application of a sum not less than £1,500,000 as an insurance against famine, I think it would be irrational, in many circumstances that I can conceive, to object to the temporary diversion of any necessary part of the revenue from this purpose, with the view of obtaining relief which might be no less urgently required than that which experience has taught us to be requisite in meeting famine. . . . Without thinking of a future far removed from us, events might, of course, happen which would make it impossible even for us who have designed these measures to maintain our present resolution."

[First Night.]

So, at the time this fund was established, ample notice was given that, in extraordinary circumstances, it might be necessary to suspend its operation. It was hardly possible to conceive how it could be otherwise. Suppose an insurrection — which God forbid! — or any other cause of extraordinary expenditure, they must either have new taxation, or they must suspend the operation of this system. In England they could at once impose new taxation to meet the difficulty; but in India they could not adopt any such course, and the only alternative was the temporary suspension of the arrangements for a surplus. The ultimate results of the arrangements for famine insurance were to be as follows: —It was estimated that the expenditure upon every 10 years famine relief was £15,000,000. Apply £1,500,000 annually to its relief and prevention, or the diminution of debt, and at the end of the 10 years you would have met all your estimated expenditure upon famine, without any addition to the debt. The precise mode of applying this sum to these objects was a matter of much difficulty. It had been the subject of much correspondence; but the final conclusion arrived at was that one half of it was to be held available for remittance to this country in discharge of our gold debt, and the other half was to be appropriated to the extinction of debt in India, or to the construction of Public Works designed to ward off, or to afford material assistance, in the event of famine, or which would guard against future outlay in relief. Well, last year the Government of India did pay in famine relief £550,000, and they provided at the end of the year a surplus of £1,450,000. It was perfectly true they were unable to make any remittance to this country in reduction of the gold debt; that under the state of exchange it was perfectly impossible to accomplish, and the result was that the £1,450,000 remained in the cash balances. This year the very contingency contemplated by Sir John Strachey had arisen; adverse circumstances had to be dealt with. The consequence was that no surplus was provided upon the face of the Estimates; and the Government of India frankly told them why. While the subject of the exchanges was under special consideration, they did not feel justified in imposing new taxation, or in adopting other steps which might, after all, prove to be unnecessary; but now that a decision had been come to, an endeavour must be made to balance income with expenditure. They had, therefore, to provide for the full loss by exchange, and also to obtain that surplus of income over expenditure which was admitted to be necessary.

There was an estimated deficit of £1,355,000; but if only the state of exchange had been a little more favourable there would have been a large surplus. But, in addition to that deficit, they had not made provision in the Estimates for the £1,500,000 for famine insurance, nor for the further small surplus required to meet contingencies. The result, therefore, was that, speaking roughly, the total deficiency of the year amounted to £3,250,000. He did not forget the increase of debt to be made, in addition. That he would deal with presently. For the moment they were considering only the deficiency shown upon the Revenue and Expenditure of the year. Of this sum of £3,250,000, £2,000,000 was on account of the war, which was an entirely exceptional expenditure, and it was proposed, not unreasonably, to borrow it from the Imperial Exchequer, and to repay it by instalments. Putting that aside as extraordinary expenditure, he arrived at the conclusion that the excess of ordinary expenditure over ordinary income, after fulfilling all pledges and providing for all liabilities, was £1,250,000. It could not be said that that was a satisfactory state of things. It was caused, undoubtedly, by a combination of adverse circumstances; but it was a state of things which, although it was not satisfactory, need not, in the smallest degree, alarm them, for India had surmounted equal difficulties, and would surmount them again. But the House would not be satisfied with any such general assurance; and it would desire to consider how the equilibrium between Revenue and Expenditure could best be re-established. That was the view taken by the Government of India also, and the state of affairs had formed the subject of anxious consideration at home and in India. The conclusion arrived at was that the first step to be taken to overcome the difficulty was a large reduction of expenditure. That reduction of expenditure was to be not only a theory, but also an established fact. The task was a difficult one, and Lord Northbrook, in speaking of it last year in "another place" said—

Mr. E. Stanhope

"Although he thought something might be done in the way of reduction of expenditure—and he was satisfied that the Government of India were not neglectful of any opportunity that might occur for effecting reductions—he did not think it likely that the cost of the Government of India could be very considerably diminished. Whatever savings might be made in one direction would be met by the increasing demands for improvements of different kinds throughout India."—[3 Hansard, ccxlii. 1160.]

In spite of that somewhat discouraging opinion, the Government was determined to make the attempt; and they considered that the reduction should be applied to more than one branch of expenditure. And if the House would allow him to trespass upon its attention, he would take in turn each principal head of expenditure.

First came the Civil charges, in which—looking to the increased demands which would be necessarily made upon them, as improved government extended itself in India, and by the growing intelligence and civilization of the people—there was a natural tendency to increase; and if they were to attain that most desirable object of reducing their military expenditure, it could only be by renewed efforts to promote the contentment and happiness of the people. And if any attempt were made to raise that great question whether it would be possible, after giving full consideration to all vested interests, to revise the future scale of civil salaries and pensions—which he admitted to be well worthy of attention—they should not forget the grave dangers which they might incur if they failed to attract to their service in India the same class of zealous and intelligent public servants as were supplied under the existing system. But there was one means of reducing the Civil charges which had constantly occupied successive Governors General of India—he meant the increased employment of the Natives. Parliament had on more than one occasion deliberately held out such a prospect; it had been embodied in more than one Act of Parliament; and it had been the declared policy of the country for more than 40 years. But the efforts to put it into practice had been spasmodic, unsystematic, and altogether incomprehensible to the mass of the Native population, while the great increase which had taken place in the number of Europeans in some branches of the Public Service, and various other acts, might have seemed to them to be in partial violation of this policy. It could not be denied that, whatever might have been the intentions of successive Secretaries of State, very little progress had been made in giving effect to it. But ever since his arrival in India, Lord Lytton had applied himself with characteristic vigour to its development; and, accordingly, it had now been decided not only that higher offices should be thrown open than those for which Natives had hitherto been eligible, but also that by diminishing the number of covenanted civilians sent out from this country, larger openings might be given to the employment of Native Civil servants. The process could only be a very gradual one. They must not forget that it was not a quarter of a century since our first systematic efforts had been made for the improvement of the education of the Natives; and so far as experience had hitherto gone, the higher class of administrative offices could only in exceptional cases be intrusted to Native officials; but he was quite sure that in the hands of one who had taken so much interest in the question as Lord Lytton, and who felt so strongly the political importance of associating the subject-race with ourselves in the government of the country, this great reform would be pushed on as quickly as was consistent with prudence. A long time must, however, elapse before any great diminution of expenditure could be looked for from this source. But, quite recently, another practical step had been taken in this direction under the head of Civil charges. The central establishments were to be overhauled and curtailed. The arrangements with the Provincial Governments were to be revised, care being taken, on the one hand, not to interfere with the policy, so successfully inaugurated by Lord Mayo, of extending the power and responsibility of local governments, and, on the other, not to create the necessity for any further local taxation. There could be little doubt that the general effect of these measures would be to effect a considerable saving, which was estimated by the Government of India at about £250,000 a-year.

The second great head of Expenditure to which he would call attention was that of Public Works, which was necessarily a little confusing, because it included the expenditure upon productive Public Works, which was treated as capital; secondly, the results of that outlay; and, lastly, the ordinary expenditure upon Public Works paid out of Revenue. He would deal first with the capital expenditure upon productive Public Works. Now, it was very constantly alleged by those who had not looked closely into the matter, that this class of expenditure had largely increased of late years. It would not be difficult to show that this was not the case. Again, its nature was not always fairly described. The hon. Member for Hackney (Mr. Fawcett) often tried to insist upon its being treated as part of the ordinary expenditure of the year. Its real nature was that of an investment of capital, which was hereafter to bring in a return, and whether that investment was made by guaranteed companies or by the State itself was very much the same thing. In order, therefore, to form a correct estimate of the sums spent upon the construction of railways, they must add the expenditure of capital by the guaranteed companies to that of the State. Calculating in this way, he found that in the 20 years following the Mutiny the capital invested in railways alone averaged about £5,000,000, besides what was spent upon works of irrigation. But the House was aware that, for some years past, the system of constructing railways under the guarantee system had been superseded; and now all railways, as well as irrigation works, were constructed under the direct agency of the State. Those of them which were expected to be remunerative were classed as extraordinary or productive, as distinguished from ordinary works to be paid for out of revenue—a classification which, so far from having originated with the present Finance Minister, dated as far back as the time of the right hon. Member for Tiverton (Mr. Massey), though it had since undergone considerable modification. The capital expenditure upon productive Public Works amounted in 1877-8 to £4,791,000, and in 1878-9 to £4,599,000. But in these years the expenditure was abnormally swollen by the necessity of finding labour for the famine-stricken population of Southern India, and of pressing on such works as would immediately contribute to their relief. The Budget Statement of the Government of India showed that this year the capital expenditure upon railways and irrigation works was reduced to £3,500,000, being £1,100,000 less than last year, the chief reduction being under the head of railways. And now, before attempting to lay down any general principles as to the prosecution of these public works, it would have been highly desirable to have been able to place before the House some idea of the results derived from those which had been already constructed. But he was in this difficulty. This very point was under the special consideration of a Committee up-stairs, which was engaged in considering a comprehensive Report, laid before them by his noble Friend the Vice President of the Council. He would not for a moment venture to steal any of the facts, or to forestall the Report, which had not yet received the sanction of the Committee. Upon that point the House must be content to wait for further information. But there was one way in which, he thought, he could give to the House some idea of the results obtained for all the works hitherto constructed, including those made by the guaranteed railway companies. Large sums of money had been borrowed for this purpose. And, therefore, he thought it would not be uninteresting to the House if he endeavoured to explain, first of all, the precise position of the Debt of India, and, secondly, the effect produced upon that Debt by the system of constructing Public Works. The Debt of India amounted, on the 31st of March last, to very nearly £139,000,000 sterling. Of this amount £52,250,000 was borrowed before the Mutiny, £37,750,000 was added at that time, or, it might be said generally, in consequence of it, and the remaining £49,000,000 had been incurred since, or at the rate of rather more than £2,500,000 a-year. Now, he desired to analyze that sum of £49,000,000, and see to what it was due. Some importance might be attached to this investigation, because, although it was quite true that the Debt of India was increasing, the causes of that increase were very often misunderstood. Well, of that amount £4,500,000 were raised to redeem the capital stock of the East India Company, which had been an exceedingly profitable operation to the Government, and had saved £450,000 a-year; £14,500,000 had been borrowed for famine relief, and was, undoubtedly, a dead weight charge upon the finances; and £24,000,000 had been raised for other purposes, and which certainly could not be so described. He found, as a set off against that sum, that during the same period they had advanced as loans to municipalities and Native States for the relief or the prosecution of useful works, upon all of which they received interest at an average rate of $4\frac{1}{2}$ per cent, the sum of £8,250,000; and £33,500,000 had been invested in productive Public Works, which, if not remunerative in what he admitted to be the proper sense of the term, did, at any rate, pay some interest upon the capital invested in them. The result was that, of the whole amount of Debt raised since the Mutiny, only £14,500,000 was entirely unproductive. But, in addition to this sum of £139,000,000, they had borrowed through the agency of the guaranteed companies about another £100,000,000, upon which they had guaranteed interest at the rate of 5 per cent. They had, therefore, to pay interest upon a capital sum of £239,000,000; and the point to which he desired to direct the attention of the House was, that while the amount of this Debt had steadily increased, the charge for interest upon it had steadily diminished. And, in order to make a comparison fair to the results of these works, he did not for the moment take into account the recent fall in the exchanges. But 10 years ago the charge for interest upon the general Debt, upon the debt incurred by the guaranteed companies, and by the State for Public Works, amounted to £8,094,000. This year it was £5,750,000, showing a reduction of £2,340,000. That was a very remarkable diminution. Of this £500,000 was due to reduction in the rate of interest, and the remainder was due to the increased productiveness of the railways. Although he could not suppose that equally good results were to be anticipated from the development of the railways and irrigation works constructed by the State, this he would say, that the total abandonment of Public Works would be about one of the greatest evils which could befall India. That was not the time to enter fully into the discussion of all the beneficial result which had accrued to India from the construction of those works; but he thought that the financial results alone justified the position which the Government of India had taken upon this question—namely, that it was right to proceed with these works, but in a cautious and prudent manner. He thought, upon the whole, that the expenditure under this head might have been somewhat in excess; but they should never forget that the smallest access of famine might, indeed would, create an enormous demand for Public Works. The pendulum swung now in one direction, it might swing in the opposite directions in a few months. The one essential point, therefore, as he submitted to the House—a point far more important than the precise amount of this expenditure—was to take a prudent and far-seeing estimate of the future, and to fix upon a limit which, looking to the demands likely to be made upon them, it was desirable to establish and to maintain over a series of years. Of all things, the most desirable was a settled policy—fix the limit where they would, but endeavour to maintain it when fixed. In the opinion of the Secretary of State in Council, the principle upon which that limit ought to be fixed was this. Ever since Lord Salisbury had laid down the rule, the principle had been maintained—though in practice it had been somewhat departed from—that money required for Public Works should be borrowed in India, and not in England. To that principle they still gave a most unhesitating adherence. That being so, the limit for Public Works, they thought, should be fixed according to the amount which the Government of India could fairly be expected to borrow in India in an ordinary year without undue disturbance of the money market. That amount had been ascertained to average £2,500,000, and, therefore, they had decided that the limit of expenditure on Public Works ought to be £2,500,000. It was not without great regret that they would abandon a great many Public Works which it had been their desire to push on; but they felt, under all the circumstances, that it was necessary to make a considerable sacrifice, and they were therefore prepared to make it. As compared with last year, it was a reduction of more than £2,000,000. Of course, the whole of the reduction to be effected could not be made for a short time, looking to the contracts they had already entered into. He had now a word to say on the Public Works ordinary. These works were not only roads and civil and military buildings, but also such railways and irrigation works as were not directly remunerative, but were, nevertheless, considered to be necessary; and it included, also, the cost of working and of maintenance. Upon these works the Government of India were of opinion that a great reduction could be made. No new works were to be undertaken, even if already sanctioned, without the special consent of the Supreme Government; a rigid investigation was to be made into the necessity for them. Establishments which were excessive were to be cut down. In the result, it was anticipated by the Government of India that an annual saving of £750,000 would be effected.

Mr. E. Stanhope

He now came to the head of Army Expenditure. The net charge for the Army was about £14,500,000; but that did not include the whole of the cost, because the expenditure on military buildings, about another £1,000,000, was taken under the head of Public Works. Last year that amount was, unfortunately, exceeded, partly owing to the increase of prices, and partly owing to other circumstances over which neither the Government of India nor the Home Government had any control. The House was hardly aware of the extent to which the increased cost of the Army was owing to recent legislation or to circumstances over which the Government had not any control at all. Whenever a reduction of expenditure was spoken of, the economical eye fixed at once on the Army accounts. The hon. Member for Orkney (Mr. Laing) said, the other day, that retrenchment in India meant reduction in the Military Expenditure. Therefore, he need scarcely say, they had not overlooked the matter. It might be said that during the war, which he hoped was now brought to a happy and successful termination, it was difficult for the Government of India to attempt any reduction, and that, even on its conclusion, some additional expenditure would be necessary. That was a controversial matter, into which he was desirous not to enter. But, at the outset, he wished to say that the Government did not look forward to being able in any way to reduce the British garrison in India. That was a question which must be considered and decided upon grounds of which the financial constituted only one of the elements. But the Government of India did believe that reduction of Military Expenditure was possible, and they had considered how it was to be done. And accordingly, with the consent of Her Majesty's Government, a Commission of civil and military officers was about to be appointed to inquire in India into the organization and expenditure of the Army, placing before that Commission certain special points of inquiry which had been the subject of recent correspondence, and directing their attention particularly to the reduction of expenditure, where it could be accomplished without loss of efficiency. One member of the Commission would represent the English Army, and would be nominated by the Secretary of State. Of course, it was impossible for him to give to the House any indication of what the results of that inquiry might be. But the Government of India believed that they would be substantial, and they were satisfied that it was the only way in which a successful reduction of Army Expenditure could possibly be accomplished.

Having dwelt on the three great heads of Expenditure, the House would now allow him to turn to the Home charges generally, which formed, probably, the greatest difficulty with which the Government had to deal. In any circumstances, the remittance to this country of £16,000,000 or £17,000,000 in a year must be attended with risk. These charges had very considerably increased; but their real rise dated from the Mutiny. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for the City of London (Mr. Goschen), in his admirable Report upon the depreciation of silver, pointed out that the full effect of those charges, though they had previously increased, was only recently felt. While railways were being constructed on a large scale in India under the guarantee system, the money raised in England was paid into the hands of the Government here, and was applied in reduction of the remittances. But after 1871, when that mode of construction practically ceased, they suddenly jumped up to £10,000,000, and were now £15,000,000. The practice of denouncing those charges as extravagant had led many to suppose that the Home Government had drawn enormous sums from India and recklessly squandered them in this country. An examination of the real state of the case would dispel that idea. The total amount of Home Expenditure, exclusive of mere banking operations, was about £15,000,000 a-year. Of that sum, the interest on Debt, guaranteed interest, superannuation, and furlough allowances—all practically fixed charges—absorbed £11,250,000; the effective charges for the Army, £1,000,000; stores supplied on demand of the Government of India, about £2,000,000. This last would undoubtedly, now that the Public Works Expenditure had been cut down, be diminished. But the whole cost of administration in England, which was practically the only amount under the direct control of the Secretary of State in Council, was £275,000. He was not going to argue that that amount could not be reduced—possibly it could be; he was only now endeavouring to point out the smallness of the sum. But the hon. Member for Hackney did not hesitate to charge the Home Government with the most reckless extravagance. In a recent article, the hon. Gentleman said—"The examination of the Home charges will at once show that a year never elapses without various acts of extravagance being committed." That was a serious charge. The hon. Gentleman went on to say—"I might quote innumerable instances," and, accordingly, he gave two instances. But, unfortunately for the argument of the hon. Gentleman, it happened that in both instances the charges were fixed by Act of Parliament. Now, upon these facts it was quite obvious that, without gross injustice to individuals, which he was sure no one would desire to perpetrate, it was impossible to hold out any great hope of a large and immediate reduction of those charges. But they had received many suggestions on the subject. Quite recently, he had seen it proposed that they ought to pay their pensions in silver. Independently, however, of the fact that any such change could have no immediate effect, it was perfectly obvious they might, by so doing, run the risk of discouraging a great many excellent persons from entering the Public Service at all. All he could say as to the Home charges—and he knew he could speak not only for the Secretary of State, but for his Council, who felt deeply their responsibility in this matter—was that they would lose no opportunity of reducing them as much as possible. The House was already aware that the effective charges of the Army had recently been settled for all past years on a basis which involved a considerable concession to India, and, as regarded future years, the subject was now being considered by an able Committee, of which Lord Northbrook was the Chairman.

Mr. E. Stanhope

Summing up these figures, he arrived at the conclusion that, independently of the results which might be produced by the Army Commission about to be appointed, and independently of a reduction of the expenditure on productive Public Works to the extent of £2,000,000, they would have improved their position by the reductions of which he had spoken by £1,000,000 a-year. The House would not expect him to say, then, what proportion of that reduction they might expect to realize in the present year; but, under favourable circumstances, he fully believed that they would be able, at the end of the year, to establish an equilibrium between their income and expenditure, and to provide for every possible claim upon them.

But then they were told that the position must be eminently unsatisfactory, because of the large amounts which they were about to borrow in India and in England. In the article he had already quoted, the hon. Member for Hackney left, no doubt quite unintentionally, the impression on the mind that they proposed to borrow at once £15,500,000, and to increase the Home charges by £400,000 a-year, and that, therefore, a crisis was at hand. Nothing could be further from the truth than that. He would tell the House very shortly what they were forced to borrow. In the first place, India had to provide for the cost of the war. For that purpose they proposed to borrow £2,000,000 from England. That was a temporary loan, and not in any sense an addition to their permanent Debt. Secondly, for the productive Public Works in India they proposed to borrow £3,500,000 this year. The policy of these loans might be good or bad; but the borrowing of a sum of money for the purpose of investing it in productive Public Works was no more a sign of insolvency than loans were which were raised in this country for improvements by the Metropolitan Board of Works or by the great town of Birmingham. Lastly, there remained the sum of £1,500,000, which was required to pay off the untransferred portion of the 5½ per cent loan which was just being paid off. That loan would now be entirely got rid of, and a saving to the finances of India of about £100,000 a-year would be effected. Still, no doubt, that £1,500,000 a-year was an addition to the Debt, and it was the only real unremunerative addition made this year. The cash balances had been reduced to an exceptional extent, first of all, by the great expenditure upon Public Works during the Famine, and then by the abnormal demands made upon them for advances in connection with the war. They in England could hardly realize the difficulty of transporting treasure in India. It became necessary, therefore, before the hot weather set in, to place an enormous sum of money in the Frontier Treasuries. That made an undue call on the cash balances, and reduced them to an amount lower than the Government of India considered safe. Accordingly, the amount to be borrowed in India was £5,000,000, and a loan was issued to that amount; £4,000,000 of that loan was accepted at 9½. Considering the present position of the silver market, the large amount of the loan, and the somewhat depressing articles and speeches to which the public mind had recently been subjected, he thought that was a very satisfactory result. Whether the remaining £1,000,000 would be obtained, he was not yet in a position to state; but if it were possible, they would undoubtedly endeavour to raise that sum also in India.

Then it was said that they were likewise proposing to borrow sums of money in England. He was afraid that when he brought forward his proposals a few weeks ago, the objects which he stated they desired to attain had been a great deal misunderstood. It was alleged, in the first place, that they desired to raise at once a large loan. Nothing, in fact, was further from their intentions, and he distinctly explained to the House on that occasion that they hoped they might have to raise nothing at all in England, at any rate not in the form of addition to their permanent Debt. Then it was said that they desired to control the exchanges, and that the fact of their wanting a loan having somehow leaked out, a favourable effect had, in fact, been produced upon the exchanges. It did not at all surprise him that it had leaked out, considering that notice of his intention to apply for a loan was for six days upon the Notice Paper, and everybody might have known perfectly well that a loan was to be applied for. Undoubtedly, the main ground upon which his proposals had always been based was the difficulty in obtaining their remittances. But, certainly, they had also anticipated that some part of the loan, which was being advertised in India, might not be obtained, and that, therefore, they would have to borrow it in England. Then there was the sum which it would be necessary to borrow in order to offer stock to the shareholders in the East Indian Railway Company, who desired to commute the annuity to which they were entitled by the terms of the recent purchase. It would be out of Order for him to discuss this subject then, and upon careful consideration they thought that this might be best dealt with in a separate Bill.

Therefore, it was not necessary for them to borrow anything at all at the present moment; but the borrowing powers for which they asked had been so much misunderstood that he was bound to explain, as shortly as he could, the difficulty in which they were placed with regard to their remittances from India. In the time of the old East India Company not only was the amount to be remitted very small, but the Company always reserved to itself the right of bringing over the necessary funds in the manner it deemed best for its own interests, and did in fact do so, to a very great extent, by buying produce bills in India. Since the transfer of the Government to the Crown that plan had been given up, as being an operation hardly suited to the Government. Other modes, indeed, had been adopted. They had bought some gold in India, and transmitted it to this country. They had sometimes bought bills upon England—last year, indeed, they attempted rather a large operation in this direction, but with limited success, because the effect of it was to disorganize for a time the market for their bills at home. Practically, therefore, they were reduced to the mode of drawing bills upon India and selling them to the highest bidder; and although the amount offered varied, of course, from time to time, practically, the rule was to go on selling some of them weekly throughout the year. And this they did, partly because they were obliged to regulate their drawings so as to suit the convenience of the Government of India which had to meet them as they were due, and partly in order to accommodate their customers by letting them make their calculations with greater certainty. There were some who attacked this mode of proceeding altogether, and said that the Council of India were the most unbusiness-like people in the world, because, whether there was a demand for the commodity which they had to sell, or not, they went on pressing their bills upon the market, sometimes in increasing amounts when that demand was at its minimum, and forced down artificially the price by their own action. The answer was that they were obliged to do it, because they must have the money at any sacrifice. But it happened sometimes that they could not sell their bills at all, and what were they to do? The only remedy for such a state of things appeared to them to consist in having a certain reserve of borrowing power which enabled them to withhold their bills when there was no demand for them; and, considering the magnitude of their remittances, that reserve ought to be a large one. The House would bear in mind that after Parliament was prorogued there was an interval of six months, during which they were obliged to bring money home at the rate of £1,000,000 to £1,500,000 a-month—and if the demand for remittances were suddenly to cease, and they were unable to sell their bills even at any sacrifice, they would be left entirely without any means of paying their way. Therefore, after a very careful consideration of the whole case, and after consultation with those most competent to form an opinion upon its difficulties, they had come to the conclusion that such a reserve of borrowing power was absolutely necessary. Looking, however, to all the altered circumstances of the case, to the recent slight improvement in the exchanges, and to the fact that the success of the Indian loan rendered any addition to the permanent Debt in this country, as they hoped, unnecessary, they thought that the borrowing power for which they asked need not be so large as they had previously anticipated. They had considered what was the smallest amount to which they could limit their demands consistently with safety. And here he might quote the opinion of Sir Thomas Seccombe, who after 50 years of service in the India Office still gave them the advantage of his ripe experience. Now, no man in England was more averse to borrowing in England, under ordinary circumstances, than Sir Thomas Seccombe. But, upon the whole, he now entirely concurred in the opinion which the Government had formed, that they could not, without danger, ask for any less sum than £5,000,000. Accordingly, when the proper time came, he would propose to substitute that amount in the Resolution now before the House. As to half of that sum, power would be asked to borrow it upon debentures.

Mr. E. Stanhope

And now, his case was complete. It remained only for him to thank the House for the kind attention which it had given. Whatever judgment might be formed upon the facts now put forward, they would not, as he thought, justify in any way the opinions of those who went about so loudly proclaiming the impending bankruptcy of India. Many facts pointed to a very different conclusion. Her external trade had doubled in 20 years. The gross receipts of her railways testified to the growing activity of her internal commerce. And though, like other countries, she was at present passing through a period of severe commercial depression, and struggling with the difficulties created by the fall in the exchanges, her credit was still high. Sometimes they might have been tempted to make too much of the riches of India. Let them not, under the influence of an unfounded panic, exaggerate her poverty. The future of India, God willing, might be a great one. It ~~was~~ grand mission of the English people to insure it.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."—(Mr. E. Stanhope.)

Mr. FAWCETT said, he had intended moving a Resolution, declaring—

"That this House regards with apprehension the present state of the Finances of India, and is of opinion that measures should at once be taken to reduce expenditure;"

but after the speech of the Under Secretary of State for India, he considered that his Resolution had virtually been accepted by the Government; and as on Indian questions he was always desirous that, if possible, there should be no entanglement between the two sides of the House, he should move a somewhat different Resolution from that of which he had given Notice. Accepting the assurance of the Under Secretary of State that expenditure would be reduced, and accepting also the declaration of the hon. Gentleman as one for which the Government would be held responsible, that that reduction would be carried out thoroughly and sincerely—in other words, that the declaration would not prove a mere empty promise—he should, at the close of his observations, submit a Resolution which, so far as he could see, it would be impossible for the Government to reject if they were sincere in their desire for economy. He should ask hon. Members to express their opinion—

"That this House, regarding with apprehension the present state of Indian Finance, approves the decision to reduce Expenditure."

It might be asked why he did not rest satisfied with the assurances which had been given by the Government, and why he proposed a formal Resolution? His answer was, that the Records of that House showed that there had been Vote after Vote in favour of an increase, instead of the reduction, of expenditure in India; and the reason was that the interests of India had been regarded as an abstract thing, and that the House of Commons represented the popular feeling which erred from the belief that India was an extremely wealthy country. It seemed to him, therefore, that a great deal might be gained by passing a Resolution which was intended, not to censure the Government, but to encourage them in the path which they had declared it to be their intention to pursue. While there was much in the speech of the Under Secretary of State with which he agreed, and though he was perfectly free to acknowledge the ingenuity and ability with which he explained his figures, there were, he thought, one or two remarks which he might just as well not have made. At the conclusion of his speech he referred to the loan in India, and he said that £4,000,000 of this loan, at 4½ per cent, had been taken up at 94½. This, he added, was not altogether satisfactory; but he thought it was so—and here was the sneer at himself—considering the alarmist speeches which had been made. But could the hon. Gentleman, he would ask, point to anything which he (Mr. Fawcett) had said in that House, or which he had written, which took an alarmist view as to the state of Indian finance at all to be compared with the opinions on the subject which were held by men of the highest position in that country, and even by members of the Council of the Viceroy? Mr. Whitley Stokes, a very good authority on the subject, had said that the finances of India were intolerably bad; and that it would be found, when we desired to increase taxation, that we had exhausted all sources of indirect taxation, and could only fall back upon the direct taxes, at the expense of producing much just discontent. There were still stronger expressions of opinion in the Minutes lately laid before Parliament, and which bore the names of men in high official position. He (Mr. Fawcett) had never spoken about the certain insolvency of India, nor had he ever believed in the insolvency of India. What, however, he had said was, that if the Indian Government was not checked in the course it was pursuing there was nothing else before it but financial insolvency. The truth of this remark had been abundantly proved by the Under Secretary of State himself—indeed, every single thing he (Mr. Fawcett) had ever contended for had now been more than conceded. When he spoke about the excessive expenditure on public works, he had never suggested, as the Government had done in a perfect panic of alarm, that they should suddenly cut down expenditure under that account from £4,000,000 or £5,000,000, to £2,500,000.

Mr. E. Stanhope

He had never proposed any such step. The proposals of the Under Secretary of State showed, notwithstanding the phraseology in which they were wrapped up, that the truth had at length dawned on the Government, and that every opinion that he (Mr. Fawcett) had expressed about the financial condition of India had been expressed in too moderate language, and that the Government knew now that their straits were desperate. Had they awakened four or five years before, and had they then admitted some facts that they were now obliged to admit, so considerable a reduction of the expenditure on public works would not now have been necessary, and they would not have had to make proposals that were at once humiliating and unavoidable. It was all very well to say that but for this or that contingency all would be well; all Indian Budgets were dependent on "ifs." There was not a country in the world whose finances would not be in a satisfactory condition if it were not for certain circumstances. If Turkey had not been mismanaged, if her revenues had not been farmed, if her officials had not been corrupt, her financial position would, no doubt, be satisfactory; and so in India; if the Government had not forced the country into an unnecessary war, if her Home charges had not been permitted to increase year by year, if there had been no Famine—if, in short, everything had gone on well, then, obviously, her finances would leave nothing to be desired. In speaking of what might have been, he would not touch upon controversial topics unnecessarily; but he could not regard war as an inevitable act of Providence. Nor, in speaking of the exchange, could he ignore the fact that the policy of the present Government had tended to render it more and more unfavourable. He knew full well, from letters confidentially written to him by persons holding high official positions in India, that the financial condition of India at the present moment was such, and the feeling of discontent there was so deeply-seated, that he was fully sensible of the responsibility with which he spoke. The Government were going to raise £5,000,000 in India, and to take power to raise the same sum in this country, while £2,000,000 was to be lent free of interest.

Notice taken, that 40 Members were not present; House counted, and 40 Members being found present,

MR. FAWCETT, resuming, said, that when the Bill for raising the loan came before the House, it would be possible to insert provisions defining the purpose for which the loan was granted; but still it was clear that India was about to borrow in one single year no less a sum than £12,000,000. It was said with regard to one of the £5,000,000 loans that £1,500,000 was to be devoted to paying off the balance of another loan; but it was to be remembered, at the same time, that, in order to enable the Indian Government to do with a loan of £5,000,000, it was necessary to reduce the public balances by £1,350,000. It might, therefore, be said approximately that India in a single year would borrow about £7,000,000, take authority to borrow £5,000,000 more. In order to obtain a real view of the financial condition of India, it must be remembered that this sum of £7,000,000 was required at a time when additional taxation had been imposed, for the purpose of providing India with a surplus of £2,000,000, of which sum £1,500,000 was to constitute a Famine Fund, and the other £500,000 was to form a surplus without which no Government in the position of that of India could consider itself solvent. Notwithstanding this, India at the present moment was not only without a surplus, but had to obtain advances to the extent of £7,000,000 in one year. It was, therefore, fair to say that at the present moment the amount of the Indian deficit could not be less than £9,000,000. But, in order to appreciate the grave issues which were associated with these proposals of borrowing, it was of the first importance to remember that this borrowing had not been accompanied by any attempt to raise a single shilling of additional revenue by taxation; but the Indian Government was surrounded with such sinister influences that in the midst of this exceptional borrowing they could not maintain the revenue already in their possession, and had been obliged to sacrifice a revenue of no less than £200,000. The Under Secretary of State said that if England had a great exceptional expenditure and had to borrow largely, such were the resources

[First Night.]

mission of the English people to insure it.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."—(Mr. E. Stanhope.)

Mr. FAWCETT said, he had intended moving a Resolution, declaring—

"That this House regards with apprehension the present state of the Finances of India, and is of opinion that measures should at once be taken to reduce expenditure;"

but after the speech of the Under Secretary of State for India, he considered that his Resolution had virtually been accepted by the Government; and as on Indian questions he was always desirous that, if possible, there should be no entanglement between the two sides of the House, he should move a somewhat different Resolution from that of which he had given Notice. Accepting the assurance of the Under Secretary of State that expenditure would be reduced, and accepting also the declaration of the hon. Gentleman as one for which the Government would be held responsible, that that reduction would be carried out thoroughly and sincerely—in other words, that the declaration would not prove a mere empty promise—he should, at the close of his observations, submit a Resolution which, so far as he could see, it would be impossible for the Government to reject if they were sincere in their desire for economy. He should ask hon. Members to express their opinion—

"That this House, regarding with apprehension the present state of Indian Finance, approves the decision to reduce Expenditure."

It might be asked why he did not rest satisfied with the assurances which had been given by the Government, and why he proposed a formal Resolution? His answer was, that the Records of that House showed that there had been Vote after Vote in favour of an increase, instead of the reduction, of expenditure in India; and the reason was that the interests of India had been regarded as an abstract thing, and that the House of Commons represented the popular feeling which erred from the belief that India was an extremely wealthy country. It seemed to him, therefore, that a great deal might be gained by passing a Resolution which was intended, not to censure the Government, but to encourage them in the path which they had declared it to be their intention to pursue. While there was much in the speech of the Under Secretary of State with which he agreed, and though he was perfectly free to acknowledge the ingenuity and ability with which he explained his figures, there were, he thought, one or two remarks which he might just as well not have made. At the conclusion of his speech he referred to the loan in India, and he said that £4,000,000 of this loan, at 4½ per cent, had been taken up at 94½. This, he added, was not altogether satisfactory; but he thought it was so—and here was the sneer at himself—considering the alarmist speeches which had been made. But could the hon. Gentleman, he would ask, point to anything which he (Mr. Fawcett) had said in that House, or which he had written, which took an alarmist view as to the state of Indian finance at all to be compared with the opinions on the subject which were held by men of the highest position in that country, and even by members of the Council of the Viceroy? Mr. Whitley Stokes, a very good authority on the subject, had said that the finances of India were intolerably bad; and that it would be found, when we desired to increase taxation, that we had exhausted all sources of indirect taxation, and could only fall back upon the direct taxes, at the expense of producing much just discontent. There were still stronger expressions of opinion in the Minutes lately laid before Parliament, and which bore the names of men in high official position. He (Mr. Fawcett) had never spoken about the certain insolvency of India, nor had he ever believed in the insolvency of India. What, however, he had said was, that if the Indian Government was not checked in the course it was pursuing there was nothing else before it but financial insolvency. The truth of this remark had been abundantly proved by the Under Secretary of State himself—indeed, every single thing he (Mr. Fawcett) had ever contended for had now been more than conceded. When he spoke about the excessive expenditure on public works, he had never suggested, as the Government had done in a perfect panic of alarm, that they should suddenly cut down expenditure under that account from £4,000,000 or £5,000,000, to £2,500,000.

Mr. E. Stanhope

He had never proposed any such step. The proposals of the Under Secretary of State showed, notwithstanding the phraseology in which they were wrapped up, that the truth had at length dawned on the Government, and that every opinion that he (Mr. Fawcett) had expressed about the financial condition of India had been expressed in too moderate language, and that the Government knew now that their straits were desperate. Had they awakened four or five years before, and had they then admitted some facts that they were now obliged to admit, so considerable a reduction of the expenditure on public works would not now have been necessary, and they would not have had to make proposals that were at once humiliating and unavoidable. It was all very well to say that but for this or that contingency all would be well; all Indian Budgets were dependent on "ifs." There was not a country in the world whose finances would not be in a satisfactory condition if it were not for certain circumstances. If Turkey had not been mismanaged, if her revenues had not been farmed, if her officials had not been corrupt, her financial position would, no doubt, be satisfactory; and so in India; if the Government had not forced the country into an unnecessary war, if her Home charges had not been permitted to increase year by year, if there had been no Famine—if, in short, everything had gone on well, then, obviously, her finances would leave nothing to be desired. In speaking of what might have been, he would not touch upon controversial topics unnecessarily; but he could not regard war as an inevitable act of Providence. Nor, in speaking of the exchange, could he ignore the fact that the policy of the present Government had tended to render it more and more unfavourable. He knew full well, from letters confidentially written to him by persons holding high official positions in India, that the financial condition of India at the present moment was such, and the feeling of discontent there was so deeply-seated, that he was fully sensible of the responsibility with which he spoke. The Government were going to raise £5,000,000 in India, and to take power to raise the same sum in this country, while £2,000,000 was to be lent free of interest.

Notice taken, that 40 Members were not present; House counted, and 40 Members being found present,

Mr. FAWCETT, resuming, said, that when the Bill for raising the loan came before the House, it would be possible to insert provisions defining the purpose for which the loan was granted; but still it was clear that India was about to borrow in one single year no less a sum than £12,000,000. It was said with regard to one of the £5,000,000 loans that £1,500,000 was to be devoted to paying off the balance of another loan; but it was to be remembered, at the same time, that, in order to enable the Indian Government to do with a loan of £5,000,000, it was necessary to reduce the public balances by £1,350,000. It might, therefore, be said approximately that India in a single year would borrow about £7,000,000, take authority to borrow £5,000,000 more. In order to obtain a real view of the financial condition of India, it must be remembered that this sum of £7,000,000 was required at a time when additional taxation had been imposed, for the purpose of providing India with a surplus of £2,000,000, of which sum £1,500,000 was to constitute a Famine Fund, and the other £500,000 was to form a surplus without which no Government in the position of that of India could consider itself solvent. Notwithstanding this, India at the present moment was not only without a surplus, but had to obtain advances to the extent of £7,000,000 in one year. It was, therefore, fair to say that at the present moment the amount of the Indian deficit could not be less than £9,000,000. But, in order to appreciate the grave issues which were associated with these proposals of borrowing, it was of the first importance to remember that this borrowing had not been accompanied by any attempt to raise a single shilling of additional revenue by taxation; but the Indian Government was surrounded with such sinister influences that in the midst of this exceptional borrowing they could not maintain the revenue already in their possession, and had been obliged to sacrifice a revenue of no less than £200,000. The Under Secretary of State said that if England had a great exceptional expenditure and had to borrow largely, such were the resources of the English people that it was easy to meet part of the exceptional expenditure by additional taxation. It might be easy; but, unfortunately, it was just the very thing the Government, of which the Under Secretary of State was a Member, did not do during the present year. They were afraid to meet exceptional expenditure by putting on a shilling of additional taxation, and there was no financial authority of repute out of the House who had not described the policy of the Government in that respect as a policy which was alike unsound and improvident. But unsound and improvident as was the English financial policy this year, what was the language which would accurately characterize the financial policy of the Indian Government, when, in the face of such large indebtedness, they not only made no attempt to raise additional revenue by additional taxation, but actually had not the courage to maintain the revenue already in their possession, and sacrificed a portion of the revenue raised from the import duties upon cotton goods, to meet a cry which had come from Lancashire? Even if it could be shown that these duties might be ten times more objectionable than they were said to be, yet, although it might be wise to remit them if there was a surplus revenue, it became the height of folly and imprudence to remit them under present circumstances; for what had really been done in India had been to borrow money in order to reduce duties which were probably paid with more satisfaction than any other duty in the whole fiscal system of India. The most extreme caution was necessary in reference to borrowing money in India. The Under Secretary of State had himself stated that it was not prudent to borrow more than £2,500,000 in India in any one year; but it was now proposed to borrow double that sum in the present year. The advance of £2,000,000, free of interest, by England to India, raised a question of greater financial importance than any proposal that for some years had been submitted to the House. It could be looked upon only in two ways—either as a gift or charitable offering, or a contribution which England was legally and equitably bound to make to India. If it were a gift or charitable offering, he believed it would be most mischievous. If, however, the advance was to be looked upon as a contribution which England was legally bound to make, it was most inadequate in amount. Regarded in the light of the first proposition, he thought that if India was to come to England to relieve her from present necessities, both countries were starting on a path fraught with financial peril. They were told that the Afghan War did not concern India only, but that it was an Imperial question, and had been undertaken to maintain the influence of England both in the East and in Europe. The charge of the war, therefore, should be borne fully as much by England as by India. In advancing £2,000,000, free of interest, to be repaid in seven equal annual instalments, the amount of pecuniary sacrifice made by England in the loss of interest would be about £320,000; and if the Afghan War cost £2,600,000, as estimated by the Under Secretary of State, India would have to contribute £2,280,000 for an expenditure which was to maintain the influence and character of England in Europe. In other words, for every £1 contributed by wealthy England, £7 would have to be contributed by impoverished and embarrassed India. Whenever any spirited act of foreign policy was to be performed, in which the interests of England were involved, if England was only to pay £1 for every £7 paid by India, what an encouragement would be given to throw additional burdens on the finances of India! In consequence of this war, the Native Army had been increased by no less than 12 per cent. That additional expense must be borne by India; but, after all their boasting about what they were going to do for India, the result of their proposal would be that India should pay £7 where England paid only £1. He did not believe that the House of Commons would ever sanction such a proposal. Then, with regard to the loan of £5,000,000, to be raised in this country, the speech of the Under Secretary of State was halting and hesitating. He told them a Committee had been appointed to investigate the subject of the exchanges; but he did not tell them what the Government were going to do. He would, therefore, endeavour to explain what the Government intended to do with the £5,000,000 loan. They meant to become speculators in silver.

[First Night.]

Mr. Fawcett

What would be the effect of their affecting the price of silver? Their proposal was simply a temporary expedient in which they might succeed for a few days; but, in the end, their position would be worse than before. Every additional £1,000,000 borrowed in England would increase the Home charges, and they would thus be bringing into operation an influence which would make the exchanges still more unfavourable. Silver had become depreciated, and they had been heavy losers in consequence. Why? Simply because for years the Indian Government had been pursuing the perilous course of having the Revenue received entirely in silver, and perpetually increasing the payments to be made in gold. The proposal of the Government, instead of diminishing the payments to be made in gold, would still further increase them, and thus their position would be aggravated. It was said they should limit the coinage of silver in India, and introduce a gold currency. But that would still more unfavourably affect the value of silver, and would be looked upon, from one end of India to another, as a breach of faith with the people. It would be regarded as a roundabout way of trying to screw something more out of them in the form of taxation. The course to be pursued was simply one of common sense; but it was exactly the opposite of that now proposed. Every effort should be made to reduce the Home charges and to diminish the amount of remittances India had to make to England. Last year a Famine Insurance Fund was established, and various new taxes were imposed to create it. Among them was the licence tax, which was virtually an income tax of 5*d.* in the pound on incomes of not more than 4*s.* a-week. Every artificer, and even many labourers, had to pay that impost; but not a professional man, with his thousands a year, nor an officer of the Army, nor a civilian, not even the Governor General, with his £20,000 a-year, had to contribute a farthing to it. The only justification put forward for those extraordinary exemptions was that the proceeds of that tax should be solely devoted to the relief of Famine, and that it was only just that those who were to be thus relieved should provide the Famine Insurance Fund, and, consequently, the professional and civilian classes should not be called on to contribute. That was a very sorry excuse for what was done. What would have been thought if this country were threatened with Famine and a Famine Insurance Fund were created, to which the poor should be made to contribute and the wealthy should be exempted, because the former class would be affected by the calamity and the latter would not? But even that plea had been entirely swept away, because not one sixpence of that Fund had been devoted to the purposes for which it was established. How could they, then, with common justice or decency, continue one hour longer those exemptions which made that tax the cause of so much discontent in India? It had gone forth throughout India, on the authority of some of the highest officials in that country, that revenue had been sacrificed, and that the solemn promises of the Viceroy had been disregarded, in order to meet the exigencies of English politics. He did not say whether that charge was true or not; but it had been made, and it ought to be answered. Lord Lytton declared, when the taxes for creating the Famine Fund were imposed, that not a single rupee which they yielded should be devoted to any other purpose than that to which they were pledged; and Sir John Strachey also said that no administrative reform, however necessary, no fiscal change, however wise, could justify the application of the proceeds of those taxes to any other object than that of relief from Famine. Notwithstanding those assurances, that money had been spent in paying the cost of the Afghan War, and in enabling the Government to remit £200,000 of the cotton import duties. That being so, he thought the first part of his Resolution was amply justified. It was not the question whether this or that individual was highly paid; but whether India had got the money to make the payments she now had to make. She must put up with inferior or different service; anything was better than growing financial embarrassment. The Under Secretary of State had fully admitted that there was only one remedy for the existing state of things—namely, the immediate reduction of expenditure. Economy was, undoubtedly, quite practicable. Let them look to the Army. Unless they were prepared greatly to reduce their expenditure on the Army,

[First Night.]

he believed that they would make no sensible impression in improving the financial position of India. The present Finance Minister for India said some three years ago, in a time of peace, that the military expenditure of that country was not less than £17,000,000 a-year. Since then it had increased by, at least, £1,000,000; and if something was not done, it would very soon reach £20,000,000, or more than one-half of the entire net revenues of India. The Under Secretary of State had told them that the Government were going to appoint a Commission. But what was the Commission going to do? For a great part of the increased military expenditure the present Government was not responsible. It was the result of changes carried out in the English Army. The short-service system was for India one of the most costly arrangements that human ingenuity could devise. It enormously increased the charge for transport and other expenses, while it diminished the efficiency of the Army. If we returned to the old system, India could also obtain recruits at much less cost. India was bound hand-and-foot to our costly military system, and charge after charge was thrown upon her. The increased military expenditure was the more disappointing, because a great portion of the unremunerative public works were intended to have a military value and ought to lead to a reduction of the military expenditure. He would now turn to the Department of Public Works. Here, like the Under Secretary of State, he could not speak with perfect freedom, because he, also, was a Member of the Committee that had been referred to. The Under Secretary of State had quoted elaborate figures to show that these works were productive. But these Returns must be accepted with extreme caution. It would be easy to quote figures on the other side. During the last three years there was no point in the Indian Budget on which the Under Secretary of State had dwelt with more satisfaction than the increasing railway returns. But in the Budget Statement of the present year it was calculated that the returns from the guaranteed railways would show a falling off of £1,800,000, and that they would yield a smaller net return than in any year since 1873-4. He hoped the proposed reduction of expenditure in the public works would be carried out, not too precipitately, but with fairness and consistency. He had heard of thousands of poor labourers being dismissed, but not of a single person with a salary of £1,000 a-year being affected. He hoped the economy, of which the Under Secretary of State had given pledges this evening, would not be of that miserable and contemptible kind which touched the poor, and left untouched everyone who had sufficient influence to make himself heard in that House. The Under Secretary of State had made them promises which, if carried out, would give India cause to congratulate herself upon to-night's debate. He had truly said that for the last 40 years the most magnificent promises had been made with regard to the larger admission of Natives into the Public Service, and yet their number might be almost counted on the fingers. The number of covenanted servants must be reduced, because India could not afford her present staff. This would also greatly reduce the charge for pensions, which was too great to be borne. Out of a Revenue of £37,000,000, a sum of £2,800,000 was paid away in this country in the form of pensions, superannuations, and compassionate allowances. The Under Secretary of State seemed to think he had been unjust when, in a recent speech, he characterized these Home charges as extravagant. But he thought the charge could not be denied. Even with regard to the two items the Under Secretary of State had referred to—namely, £1,200 for the outfit and passage money of a member of the Council of the Governor General, and £2,500 for the outfit and passage money of two Bishops and certain chaplains, he thought the charge sufficiently made out. Why should India pay a single sixpence for a Bishop? The Under Secretary of State said he was compelled to allow these items by an Act of Parliament; but, if that was so, why did he not get the Act of Parliament repealed? It was a mistake to suppose that the Home charges could not be reduced. Let them but compare the salaries received by certain officials in the India Office with the salaries of officials who did the same work in some of the English Government Offices, and they would see that a reduction was not impossible. Instead of diminishing the Home charges, the Government were

pursuing a policy which would tend still further to increase them. While advising the Government to carry out in India a policy of rigorous retrenchment, he by no means underrated the difficulties which they had to encounter. He knew perfectly well that the very moment some private interest was attacked it summoned around it a host of friends, who became the keen assailants of the Government who were desirous of practising economy. Nothing would be more unfair or unjust than an attempt to add to the difficulties which the Government would have to encounter if they should carry out the promises of economy which they had made that evening. It was not his intention to make any direct attack upon the Government, for no fair person could hold them solely responsible for the present state of the finances of India. Strongly as he objected to some things which the Government had done—the Afghan War, for instance, and the reduction of the cotton duties—he still admitted that many of the causes that had brought financial trouble upon India were in operation long before the present Administration came into Office. He held that no single circumstance had done so much to bring financial trouble upon India as the amalgamation of the two Armies—a step for which a Conservative Government were not responsible. Nothing, he thought, would be more mischievous than to waste time in recriminations about the past, and in attempting to apportion blame between this Government and that. The House of Commons itself was by no means free from blame. In a country like ours, the policy of the Government became, sooner or later, the reflex of the feelings of the House of Commons, whose Members represented the feelings of the nation. Until recently, public opinion, with regard to the financial administration of India, had always been on the side of expenditure. The English people thought that India was an extremely wealthy country, and could not be too expensively governed. But, within the last year or two, there had been a change in their ideas, and language entirely different from that which was heard a few years ago was now on men's lips. On all sides, now, we heard the financial embarrassments of India spoken of. Although he did not believe in the insol-

veny of India, he did believe that if that which had occurred during the last five years were to continue unchecked in the future, India would one day find herself unable to pay her way, and Ministers would have to seek a grant in aid of our Eastern Dependency. If this should ever happen, a burden would be imposed upon England which would be felt in every English home. If anyone should ask him why he brought forward the Resolution which stood upon the Paper in his name, he would reply that he wished to do the little that could be done by a single individual to keep the influence of the House of Commons on the side of economy with regard to Indian administration, and not on the side of extravagance. He accepted, in no grudging spirit, the promise of the Government, that they would pursue a policy of strict economy. He hoped that they would not refuse to accept the Resolution which he was about to move. It placed no censure upon them; it only acknowledged a principle to which the Government themselves had subscribed. He would probably be asked to withdraw his Resolution; but he hoped the Government would refrain from making such an appeal to him, for they would have to encounter many obstacles in their efforts in the direction of economy, and he believed that by accepting his Resolution they would be strengthening, and not weakening, their hands. The hon. Gentleman concluded by moving his Resolution.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "this House, regarding with apprehension the present state of Indian Finance, approves the decision to reduce Expenditure,"—(Mr. Fawcett.)

—instead thereof.

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

MR. BIRLEY observed, that the concluding remarks of the hon. Member for Hackney very much mitigated the force of his preceding criticism. Nothing could be more easy than to draw, at the present moment, a gloomy picture of the finances of India. He regretted that the speech of the hon. Member had not partaken of the character of a reply to the admirable speech of the Under Secretary of State for India. He entirely agreed with that part of the hon. Member's Resolution which spoke of the necessity for economy in the administration of the Indian Revenue; but he could not say that he regarded the condition of the finances of India with apprehension. There was certainly great reason for caution in connection with the administration of the finances of that country; but this necessary caution was being faithfully exercised by those who were responsible, both in this country and in India itself. When they considered the enormous losses the Indian Government had sustained on account of Famines, and on account of loss by exchange, the answer to the charges of the hon. Member was obvious; and he thought it was a matter for some degree of congratulation that in the last year referred to in the Accounts, if they excluded the expenditure on account of Famine, the loss by exchange, and unproductive public works, there would be a favourable balance of very nearly £3,000,000. There was a point to which attention had been called by the Under Secretary of State for India, and that was as regarded the salt revenue. It had been frequently said that, salt being an article of universal necessity, it was hard that a revenue of something like £6,000,000 should be derived from it. But when they considered that that was equal to only about 1*d.* per month per head of the population, and that it was the one means by which some slight contribution could be brought to the Revenue from all classes, much of the objection disappeared, and a still larger portion of the objection disappeared when they considered the measures taken by the Government of India for the supply and distribution of salt. It was more important even than the question of the tax that the Natives should be able to receive regular supplies of salt, of which there had sometimes been a famine. The hon. Member for Hackney referred to the cotton duties. At an early period of the Session the House had devoted an evening to this question, on the Motion of the hon. Member for Blackburn (Mr. Briggs), and it was impossible to get up even a semblance of opposition to the resolution which had been come to by the Government of India to remove all those duties which had anything of a protective character; and he confessed he listened with great surprise to the remarks of the hon. Member for Hackney, who professed to be a Free Trader, and who yet advocated this tax. The hon. Member said, however, that it was a tax which was paid by the Natives of India with the greatest satisfaction. The hon. Member must have forgotten that that was one of the arguments used by those who were favourable to the adoption of the principle of Reciprocity. Indirect taxes were always preferred to direct taxes, and that was the argument which was used everywhere in favour of indirect taxes. That the duty in question was a protective duty there could be no question whatever. It had been said that the duty had been removed at the instance of the English Government, and at the behest of the Lancashire Members. That was an unworthy observation; but the hon. Member said it was not his observation, but one which had been made by members of the India Council. Why, almost as soon as Lord Salisbury came into Office—in 1874 or 1875—he declared to the Indian Government his strong objection to this tax, and said it must be got rid of as soon as possible; and the noble Marquess had spoken to him about it in terms almost as strong as those he used in his despatch, and explained how much he objected on financial, political, and commercial grounds, to this unjust and impolitic tax. The clear and admirable statement of the Under Secretary of State had, he thought, completely cut the ground from under the feet of the hon. Member for Hackney, and also from under the feet of the hon. Member for Kirkcaldy (Sir George Campbell), and their supporters, and he was confident that the House would agree with the Under Secretary of State as to the future administration of Indian finance. The hon. Member for Hackney had claimed Sir John Strachey as an authority in favour of the statement that the Famine Fund had been unjustly absorbed in the expenditure of the year. What Sir John Strachey said was that "the propriety of the course taken by the Government had been justified by the event." That "any other decision would have resulted in the necessity of imposing new taxation;" and he added that if serious circumstances arose they would have had to choose between fresh taxation and an abrogation of the Fund. The charge, therefore, made against Sir John Strachey was not borne out by the facts. Then, again, the hon. Member said that the licence tax was one in favour of the rich as against the poor. [Sir GEORGE CAMPBELL: Hear, hear!] He was not going to argue the question generally, and he did not know that the tax was founded on an equitable basis; but it was a tax on trade such as was known in many European countries, and it was, in some degree, a substitute for the Income Tax, which failed in India because the Natives would not submit to it. With regard to the question of exchange, the hon. Member for Hackney said there was a tendency on the part of the Government to become speculators in silver; but the Under Secretary of State had carefully guarded himself from suspicion on that point, and every merchant knew that there were times when it would be exceedingly imprudent to sell exchanges. The question of allowances and pensions to European officials had been alluded to, and he was glad to hear the assurance given to the House by his hon. Friend that it was intended in future to employ Natives in a larger degree than heretofore in the Indian Civil Service. He had only, in conclusion, to congratulate his hon. Friend the Under Secretary of State on the valuable and remarkable address he had delivered—an address which he believed would have an effect, not only upon the House, but upon the country.

[First Night.]

Mr. Birley

Mr. LAING warned the House against the optimist view of the situation put forward by the Under Secretary of State in his able speech, in which he had stated many pleasant things in a very pleasant manner. The accounts presented to the House by the India Office at home were characterized by a greater degree of fairness than those which emanated from the Government of India. The latter were singular illustrations of the maxim that complicated accounts went along with embarrassed finance. The alleged increase of £5,000,000 in the Revenue of India during the past two years was really only nominal. When examined it was found to be due to a mere stroke of the pen, and the ordinary items of Revenue, instead of being buoyant, were stationary, or rather on the decline. Of course, the Government of India were not responsible for the great calamities of Famine and the depreciation of silver; but it seemed to him they were to blame for not having realized the situation soon enough, and prepared for it by a rigid economy. It was as apparent three years ago as now; yet, instead of practising economy, the Government of India plunged into the Afghan War, of which he would say no more than that it might either have been averted or postponed. The accumulated deficit of the last few years exceeded the interest of the Debt. India had thus, in fact, been paying the interest of its Debt out of borrowed money, which was just what Egypt and Turkey had been doing. No doubt, he would be met by the argument of productive public works. The Statistical Abstract contained some figures showing what had been the expenditure upon, and the revenue from, public works during the last 10 years. The expenditure on works of irrigation had been £9,620,000, and on State railways £14,622,000, making a total of £24,302,000. The revenue from irrigation works in 1876-7 was £520,000, and the working expenses were £587,000, showing a loss of £60,000. The receipts from railways were £371,000, and the working expenses £263,000. The result was, the gross revenue was £871,000, and the working expenses were £850,000. Practically, there was no return at all for the expenditure. Returns which showed surpluses were, therefore, delusive, as were the Budgets of Napoleon III., which showed a surplus from year to year, while £100,000,000 was added to the Debt of France. Any Financial Statement was illusory and delusive which did not include the expenditure on public works in India. We had increased the public Debt of India by upwards of £50,000,000 in the last few years, of which more than £40,000,000 had been increased in the last six years. The actual deficit of cash expenditure over cash revenue was at the rate of not less than £7,000,000 a-year. He should be surprised if the Afghan War involved a capital charge of less than £4,000,000 or £5,000,000, which must be followed by an increased permanent charge for occupying Forces of 14,000 or 15,000 men, with camp followers, &c. Everyone would rejoice that the war had been brought near to its close, and they had now to look to the future. In occupying the new Frontier, there would be three Passes which would require protecting, and they were so distant from one another that each would have to rely upon its own strength. The estimated yearly expense of the Forces to be set apart for the defence of the new territory had been put down by Sir Henry Norman, who was the very highest authority, at £1,000,000. The good resolution of the Government as regarded economy, so essential to the salvation of the Indian finances, was badly answered by an extension of the Frontier, which, beyond the first outlay, would add £1,000,000 a-year to the permanent Expenditure. As to increasing taxation, the possibilities of doing so were pretty well exhausted. Indirect taxation was admitted to have nearly reached its limit; and as to direct taxation, the political danger arising from any attempt in that direction was so great, and the amount that could be obtained was so small, that all the wisest statesmen had abandoned the idea. In justification of that view he would proceed to examine the several sources of Indian Revenue, in order to show that little or no additional income could be derived from them. Two sources had been suggested from which additional revenue might be obtained—tobacco, and an income tax. As to tobacco, the first fatal objection to deriving revenue from it was, that a great part of the population of India was so poor that they could get no more out of them. Another fatal objection was, that being of almost universal growth, if they attempted to raise a revenue from it they must have an army of Native Excisemen going through the country and prosecuting every unfortunate man who grew it. The objections to an income tax he had often stated. They were based chiefly on the Oriental habit of mind, which was so jealous on the subject as to make any such imposition odious to the people. When he was in India, there was a well authenticated instance of a well-to-do man having hung himself, his mind being so much disturbed by having an income tax paper served upon him. After all, if they put on an income tax they would collect very little. The fact that last year the Government had fallen back upon the licensing tax was a proof how hardly they had been driven to find a fresh source of taxation, it being a tax amounting to 5 per cent upon incomes of

4s. a-week. The Government appeared to underrate the gravity of the situation with regard to Indian finance, and to over-estimate the amount of the reductions that could be made in the expenditure. There was a fixed annual expenditure of £17,000,000, in which no reduction could be effected; and under several other heads, such as that of "Famine," it was scarcely to be hoped that the expenditure this year would be less than that of last. There was also a loss to be expected with regard to silver; although he thought the conduct of the Government was wise in refusing to listen to any of the empirical schemes which had been put forward for changing the standard. As long as the credit of England stood, it would be easy to raise a succession of loans which they would meet until they approached the gulf of bankruptcy; and he concluded by warning the House that these Indian loans would ultimately fall back upon England.

MR. SAMPSON LLOYD said, he was certain the House had listened with much satisfaction to the peculiarly clear and lucid statement of the Under Secretary of State for India. He believed every Member of that House was a sincere friend of judicious economy; and he had equally little doubt that that economy would be practised by Her Majesty's Government, when it could be safely carried out, by following the uniform policy indicated in the speech of the Under Secretary of State. He had no doubt that the employment of Natives in the subordinate posts would lead to this, and also have a very beneficial effect on the loyalty of the people. He need not follow the hon. Gentleman in his suggestions as to economy. No doubt, anyone who had paid attention to Indian finance would find that considerable economy might be made in public buildings in India, and what was called ordinary public works. With regard to the Army, he remembered in a former Session the hon. Baronet the Member for Kirkcaldy (Sir George Campbell), whose experience gave his words great weight on questions of this sort, said that as regarded men very little reduction was consistent with the safety of India, and with regard to the officers no reduction need go very far. He submitted that in order to realize any great scheme of economy of the Indian Army, the House must deal with the standing Armies of the great feudatory Princes. So long as those Armies were maintained, numbering many tens of thousands of men, and large numbers of artillery, it was very difficult, indeed, to effect any measure of economy in the Army of India which would bridge over, to any extent, the deficit. As regarded public works, he quite agreed, from what little attention he had paid to the subject in the present circumstances of India, that they had no choice but to take the expenditure on public works. In dealing with these financial difficulties, there were two ways of meeting them—one was, by economy, to lessen the burdens on the ratepayer; and the other was by benefiting the condition of the ratepayer and enabling him to bear greater burdens. He could not help thinking that something might be done by the Government in that way. With regard to the question of manufactures, he thought that the people of India might, to a considerable extent, manufacture for themselves. If India were governed by Native Princes, or by any other Power than England, he could not help thinking that means would be taken to foster, to some extent, at all events, the system of Native manufactures; and for that reason he thought the true interest of India were not consulted by the recent reduction of the duties on the import of manufactures into that country. Referring to the depreciation of silver, he thought it was not due to any natural law, but to the demonetization of silver by Germany, and the reduction of mintage facilities by the States of the Latin Union. The loss to the Government last year from this cause amounted to £3,500,000, or more than the cost of the Famine and the Afghan War, and it was far from certain that the worst had passed. He believed that the grave character of this matter could scarcely be exaggerated, and should have been glad, had the very able statement of the Under Secretary of State for India comprised some indication that the Government were devoting their serious attention to it. He believed that it would be sometime before there would be an equilibrium in India.

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, although the hour has arrived at which, when a debate is expected to be prolonged, we usually adjourn, I do not rise for the purpose of moving the adjournment, but with the object of disentangling the different elements of this discussion, which it appears to me have no natural or proper connection with one another, and the conjunction of which, on the present occasion, may rather tend to perplex the public mind. The discussion upon the India Budget, although it is generally limited to a certain number of hon. Members in this House, yet necessarily, and upon all occasions, involves many topics of great interest and importance. On the present occasion it is obvious that those topics are unusually numerous and unusually weighty; and I do not think, nor do I expect or desire, that this discussion should be terminated at the point which it has now reached. But a very great change has taken place in the position of the House in relation to the question now before it since the debate began. We have had upon the Books for some days a Notice of Motion given by my hon. Friend the Member for Hackney (Mr. Fawcett), which appeared to raise a contentious issue; and I, for my own part, came down to the House at 5 o'clock to-day prepared to give strong support, to the best of my ability, to the Motion of my hon. Friend. I was entirely ignorant of what might be the intentions of the Government; all that I knew was that the many grave and even, in my view, alarming circumstances which surround the subject of Indian finance, called for the expression of a very decisive opinion on the part of this House, on behalf of strong, energetic, and effectual measures for the reduction of expenditure. There was the common expectation that we were to have, not merely the usual amicable discussion of incidental points connected with Indian finance, but that we were to have a great issue regularly raised, and that all arrangements had been made for clearing the Paper early in order that the debate might go forward, and the decision of the House taken by division upon the question raised by my hon. Friend. But, Sir, I listened with the utmost interest to the speech of my hon. Friend the Under Secretary of State for India, to which the hon. Member who has just sat down (Mr. Sampson Lloyd) has done, I think, no more than justice in expressing the feeling of the House that it was a most lucid and able exposition of the complicated facts which he had to lay

of the English people that it was easy to meet part of the exceptional expenditure by additional taxation. It might be easy; but, unfortunately, it was just the very thing the Government, of which the Under Secretary of State was a Member, did not do during the present year. They were afraid to meet exceptional expenditure by putting on a shilling of additional taxation, and there was no financial authority of repute out of the House who had not described the policy of the Government in that respect as a policy which was alike unsound and improvident. But unsound and improvident as was the English financial policy this year, what was the language which would accurately characterize the financial policy of the Indian Government, when, in the face of such large indebtedness, they not only made no attempt to raise additional revenue by additional taxation, but actually had not the courage to maintain the revenue already in their possession, and sacrificed a portion of the revenue raised from the import duties upon cotton goods, to meet a cry which had come from Lancashire? Even if it could be shown that these duties might be ten times more objectionable than they were said to be, yet, although it might be wise to remit them if there was a surplus revenue, it became the height of folly and imprudence to remit them under present circumstances; for what had really been done in India had been to borrow money in order to reduce duties which were probably paid with more satisfaction than any other duty in the whole fiscal system of India. The most extreme caution was necessary in reference to borrowing money in India. The Under Secretary of State had himself stated that it was not prudent to borrow more than £2,500,000 in India in any one year; but it was now proposed to borrow double that sum in the present year. The advance of £2,000,000, free of interest, by England to India, raised a question of greater financial importance than any proposal that for some years had been submitted to the House. It could be looked upon only in two ways—either as a gift or charitable offering, or a contribution which England was legally and equitably bound to make to India. If it were a gift or charitable offering, he believed it would be most mischievous. If, however, the advance was to be looked upon as a contribution which England was legally bound to make, it was most inadequate in amount. Regarded in the light of the first proposition, he thought that if India was to come to England to relieve her from present necessities, both countries were starting on a path fraught with financial peril. They were told that the Afghan War did not concern India only, but that it was an Imperial question, and had been undertaken to maintain the influence of England both in the East and in Europe. The charge of the war, therefore, should be borne fully as much by England as by India. In advancing £2,000,000, free of interest, to be repaid in seven equal annual instalments, the amount of pecuniary sacrifice made by England in the loss of interest would be about £320,000; and if the Afghan War cost £2,600,000, as estimated by the Under Secretary of State, India would have to contribute £2,280,000 for an expenditure which was to maintain the influence and character of England in Europe. In other words, for every £1 contributed by wealthy England, £7 would have to be contributed by impoverished and embarrassed India. Whenever any spirited act of foreign policy was to be performed, in which the interests of England were involved, if England was only to pay £1 for every £7 paid by India, what an encouragement would be given to throw additional burdens on the finances of India! In consequence of this war, the Native Army had been increased by no less than 12 per cent. That additional expense must be borne by India; but, after all their boasting about what they were going to do for India, the result of their proposal would be that India should pay £7 where England paid only £1. He did not believe that the House of Commons would ever sanction such a proposal. Then, with regard to the loan of £5,000,000, to be raised in this country, the speech of the Under Secretary of State was halting and hesitating. He told them a Committee had been appointed to investigate the subject of the exchanges; but he did not tell them what the Government were going to do. He would, therefore, endeavour to explain what the Government intended to do with the £5,000,000 loan. They meant to become speculators in silver.

Mr. Fawcett

What would be the effect of their affecting the price of silver? Their proposal was simply a temporary expedient in which they might succeed for a few days; but, in the end, their position would be worse than before. Every additional £1,000,000 borrowed in England would increase the Home charges, and they would thus be bringing into operation an influence which would make the exchanges still more unfavourable. Silver had become depreciated, and they had been heavy losers in consequence. Why? Simply because for years the Indian Government had been pursuing the perilous course of having the Revenue received entirely in silver, and perpetually increasing the payments to be made in gold. The proposal of the Government, instead of diminishing the payments to be made in gold, would still further increase them, and thus their position would be aggravated. It was said they should limit the coinage of silver in India, and introduce a gold currency. But that would still more unfavourably affect the value of silver, and would be looked upon, from one end of India to another, as a breach of faith with the people. It would be regarded as a roundabout way of trying to screw something more out of them in the form of taxation. The course to be pursued was simply one of common sense; but it was exactly the opposite of that now proposed. Every effort should be made to reduce the Home charges and to diminish the amount of remittances India had to make to England. Last year a Famine Insurance Fund was established, and various new taxes were imposed to create it. Among them was the licence tax, which was virtually an income tax of 5*d.* in the pound on incomes of not more than 4*s.* a-week. Every artificer, and even many labourers, had to pay that impost; but not a professional man, with his thousands a year, nor an officer of the Army, nor a civilian, not even the Governor General, with his £20,000 a-year, had to contribute a farthing to it. The only justification put forward for those extraordinary exemptions was that the proceeds of that tax should be solely devoted to the relief of Famine, and that it was only just that those who were to be thus relieved should provide the Famine Insurance Fund, and, consequently, the professional and civilian classes should not be called on to contribute. That was a very sorry excuse for what was done. What would have been thought if this country were threatened with Famine and a Famine Insurance Fund were created, to which the poor should be made to contribute and the wealthy should be exempted, because the former class would be affected by the calamity and the latter would not? But even that plea had been entirely swept away, because not one sixpence of that Fund had been devoted to the purposes for which it was established. How could they, then, with common justice or decency, continue one hour longer those exemptions which made that tax the cause of so much discontent in India? It had gone forth throughout India, on the authority of some of the highest officials in that country, that revenue had been sacrificed, and that the solemn promises of the Viceroy had been disregarded, in order to meet the exigencies of English politics. He did not say whether that charge was true or not; but it had been made, and it ought to be answered. Lord Lytton declared, when the taxes for creating the Famine Fund were imposed, that not a single rupee which they yielded should be devoted to any other purpose than that to which they were pledged; and Sir John Strachey also said that no administrative reform, however necessary, no fiscal change, however wise, could justify the application of the proceeds of those taxes to any other object than that of relief from Famine. Notwithstanding those assurances, that money had been spent in paying the cost of the Afghan War, and in enabling the Government to remit £200,000 of the cotton import duties. That being so, he thought the first part of his Resolution was amply justified. It was not the question whether this or that individual was highly paid; but whether India had got the money to make the payments she now had to make. She must put up with inferior or different service; anything was better than growing financial embarrassment. The Under Secretary of State had fully admitted that there was only one remedy for the existing state of things—namely, the immediate reduction of expenditure. Economy was, undoubtedly, quite practicable. Let them look to the Army. Unless they were prepared greatly to reduce their expenditure on the Army,

[First Night.]

he believed that they would make no sensible impression in improving the financial position of India. The present Finance Minister for India said some three years ago, in a time of peace, that the military expenditure of that country was not less than £17,000,000 a-year. Since then it had increased by, at least, £1,000,000; and if something was not done, it would very soon reach £20,000,000, or more than one-half of the entire net revenues of India. The Under Secretary of State had told them that the Government were going to appoint a Commission. But what was the Commission going to do? For a great part of the increased military expenditure the present Government was not responsible. It was the result of changes carried out in the English Army. The short-service system was for India one of the most costly arrangements that human ingenuity could devise. It enormously increased the charge for transport and other expenses, while it diminished the efficiency of the Army. If we returned to the old system, India could also obtain recruits at much less cost. India was bound hand-and-foot to our costly military system, and charge after charge was thrown upon her. The increased military expenditure was the more disappointing, because a great portion of the unremunerative public works were intended to show that these works were productive. But these Returns must be accepted with extreme caution. It would be easy to quote figures on the other side. During the last three years there was no point in the Indian Budget on which the Under Secretary of State had dwelt with more satisfaction than the increasing railway returns. But in the Budget Statement of the present year it was calculated that the returns from the guaranteed railways would show a falling off of £1,800,000, and that they would yield a smaller net return than in any year since 1873-4. He hoped the proposed reduction of expenditure in the public works would be carried out, not too precipitately, but with fairness and consistency. He had heard of thousands of poor labourers being dismissed, but not of a single person with a salary of £1,000 a-year being affected. He hoped the economy, of which the Under Secretary of State had given pledges this evening, would not be of that miserable and contemptible kind which touched the poor, and left untouched everyone who had sufficient influence to make himself heard in that House. The Under Secretary of State had made them promises which, if carried out, would give India cause to congratulate herself upon to-night's debate. He had truly said that for the last 40 years the most magnificent promises had been made with regard to the larger admission of Natives into the Public Service, and yet their number might be almost counted on the fingers. The number of covenanted servants must be reduced, because India could not afford her present staff. This would also greatly reduce the charge for pensions, which was too great to be borne. Out of a Revenue of £37,000,000, a sum of £2,800,000 was paid away in this country in the form of pensions, superannuations, and compassionate allowances. The Under Secretary of State seemed to think he had been unjust when, in a recent speech, he characterized these Home charges as extravagant. But he thought the charge could not be denied. Even with regard to the two items the Under Secretary of State had referred to—namely, £1,200 for the outfit and passage money of a member of the Council of the Governor General, and £2,500 for the outfit and passage money of two Bishops and certain chaplains, he thought the charge sufficiently made out. Why should India pay a single sixpence for a Bishop? The Under Secretary of State said he was compelled to allow these items by an Act of Parliament; but, if that was so, why did he not get the Act of Parliament repealed? It was a mistake to suppose that the Home charges could not be reduced. Let them but compare the salaries received by certain officials in the India Office with the salaries of officials who did the same work in some of the English Government Offices, and they would see that a reduction was not impossible. Instead of diminishing the Home charges, the Government were

Mr. Fawcett

pursuing a policy which would tend still further to increase them. While advising the Government to carry out in India a policy of rigorous retrenchment, he by no means underrated the difficulties which they had to encounter. He knew perfectly well that the very moment some private interest was attacked it summoned around it a host of friends, who became the keen assailants of the Government who were desirous of practising economy. Nothing would be more unfair or unjust than an attempt to add to the difficulties which the Government would have to encounter if they should carry out the promises of economy which they had made that evening. It was not his intention to make any direct attack upon the Government, for no fair person could hold them solely responsible for the present state of the finances of India. Strongly as he objected to some things which the Government had done—the Afghan War, for instance, and the reduction of the cotton duties—he still admitted that many of the causes that had brought financial trouble upon India were in operation long before the present Administration came into Office. He held that no single circumstance had done so much to bring financial trouble upon India as the amalgamation of the two Armies—a step for which a Conservative Government were not responsible. Nothing, he thought, would be more mischievous than to waste time in recriminations about the past, and in attempting to apportion blame between this Government and that. The House of Commons itself was by no means free from blame. In a country like ours, the policy of the Government became, sooner or later, the reflex of the feelings of the House of Commons, whose Members represented the feelings of the nation. Until recently, public opinion, with regard to the financial administration of India, had always been on the side of expenditure. The English people thought that India was an extremely wealthy country, and could not be too expensively governed. But, within the last year or two, there had been a change in their ideas, and language entirely different from that which was heard a few years ago was now on men's lips. On all sides, now, we heard the financial embarrassments of India spoken of. Although he did not believe in the insol-

veny of India, he did believe that if that which had occurred during the last five years were to continue unchecked in the future, India would one day find herself unable to pay her way, and Ministers would have to seek a grant in aid of our Eastern Dependency. If this should ever happen, a burden would be imposed upon England which would be felt in every English home. If anyone should ask him why he brought forward the Resolution which stood upon the Paper in his name, he would reply that he wished to do the little that could be done by a single individual to keep the influence of the House of Commons on the side of economy with regard to Indian administration, and not on the side of extravagance. He accepted, in no grudging spirit, the promise of the Government, that they would pursue a policy of strict economy. He hoped that they would not refuse to accept the Resolution which he was about to move. It placed no censure upon them; it only acknowledged a principle to which the Government themselves had subscribed. He would probably be asked to withdraw his Resolution; but he hoped the Government would refrain from making such an appeal to him, for they would have to encounter many obstacles in their efforts in the direction of economy, and he believed that by accepting his Resolution they would be strengthening, and not weakening, their hands. The hon. Gentleman concluded by moving his Resolution.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "this House, regarding with apprehension the present state of Indian Finance, approves the decision to reduce Expenditure,"—(Mr. Fawcett),

—instead thereof.

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

Mr. BIRLEY observed, that the concluding remarks of the hon. Member for Hackney very much mitigated the force of his preceding criticism. Nothing could be more easy than to draw, at the present moment, a gloomy picture of the finances of India. He regretted that the speech of the hon. Member had not partaken of the character of a reply to the admirable speech of the Under Secretary of State for India. He entirely agreed with that part of the hon. Member's Resolution which spoke of the necessity for economy in the administration of the Indian Revenue; but he could not say that he regarded the condition of the finances of India with apprehension. There was certainly great reason for caution in connection with the administration of the finances of that country; but this necessary caution was being faithfully exercised by those who were responsible, both in this country and in India itself. When they considered the enormous losses the Indian Government had sustained on account of Famines, and on account of loss by exchange, the answer to the charges of the hon. Member was obvious; and he thought it was a matter for some degree of congratulation that in the last year referred to in the Accounts, if they excluded the expenditure on account of Famine, the loss by exchange, and unproductive public works, there would be a favourable balance of very nearly £3,000,000. There was a point to which attention had been called by the Under Secretary of State for India, and that was as regarded the salt revenue. It had been frequently said that, salt being an article of universal necessity, it was hard that a revenue of something like £6,000,000 should be derived from it. But when they considered that that was equal to only about 1d. per month per head of the population, and that it was the one means by which some slight contribution could be brought to the Revenue from all classes, much of the objection disappeared, and a still larger portion of the objection disappeared when they considered the measures taken by the Government of India for the supply and distribution of salt. It was more important even than the question of the tax that the Natives should be able to receive regular supplies of salt, of which there had sometimes been a famine. The hon. Member for Hackney referred to the cotton duties. At an early period of the Session the House had devoted an evening to this question, on the Motion of the hon. Member for Blackburn (Mr. Briggs), and it was impossible to get up even a semblance of opposition to the resolution which had been come to by the Government of India to remove all those duties which had anything of a protective character; and he confessed he listened with great surprise to the remarks of the hon. Member for Hackney, who professed to be a Free Trader, and who yet advocated this tax. The hon. Member said, however, that it was a tax which was paid by the Natives of India with the greatest satisfaction. The hon. Member must have forgotten that that was one of the arguments used by those who were favourable to the adoption of the principle of Reciprocity. Indirect taxes were always preferred to direct taxes, and that was the argument which was used everywhere in favour of indirect taxes. That the duty in question was a protective duty there could be no question whatever. It had been said that the duty had been removed at the instance of the English Government, and at the behest of the Lancashire Members. That was an unworthy observation; but the hon. Member said it was not his observation, but one which had been made by members of the India Council. Why, almost as soon as Lord Salisbury came into Office—in 1874 or 1875—he declared to the Indian Government his strong objection to this tax, and said it must be got rid of as soon as possible; and the noble Marquess had spoken to him about it in terms almost as strong as those he used in his despatch, and explained how much he objected on financial, political, and commercial grounds, to this unjust and impolitic tax. The clear and admirable statement of the Under Secretary of State had, he thought, completely cut the ground from under the feet of the hon. Member for Hackney, and also from under the feet of the hon. Member for Kirkcaldy (Sir George Campbell), and their supporters, and he was confident that the House would agree with the Under Secretary of State as to the future administration of Indian finance. The hon. Member for Hackney had claimed Sir John Strachey as an authority in favour of the statement that the Famine Fund had been unjustly absorbed in the expenditure of the year. What Sir John Strachey said was that "the propriety of the course taken by the Government had been justified by the event." That "any other decision would have resulted in the necessity of imposing new taxation;" and he added that if serious circumstances arose they would have had to choose between fresh taxation and an abrogation of the Fund. The charge, therefore, made against Sir John Strachey was not borne out by the facts. Then, again, the hon. Member said that the licence tax was one in favour of the rich as against the poor. [Sir GEORGE CAMPBELL: Hear, hear!] He was not going to argue the question generally, and he did not know that the tax was founded on an equitable basis; but it was a tax on trade such as was known in many European countries, and it was, in some degree, a substitute for the Income Tax, which failed in India because the Natives would not submit to it. With regard to the question of exchange, the hon. Member for Hackney said there was a tendency on the part of the Government to become speculators in silver; but the Under Secretary of State had carefully guarded himself from suspicion on that point, and every merchant knew that there were times when it would be exceedingly imprudent to sell exchanges. The question of allowances and pensions to European officials had been alluded to, and he was glad to hear the assurance given to the House by his hon. Friend that it was intended in future to employ Natives in a larger degree than heretofore in the Indian Civil Service. He had only, in conclusion, to congratulate his hon. Friend the Under Secretary of State on the valuable and remarkable address he had delivered—an address which he believed would have an effect, not only upon the House, but upon the country.

[First Night.]

Mr. Birley

Mr. LAING warned the House against the optimistic view of the situation put forward by the Under Secretary of State in his able speech, in which he had stated many pleasant things in a very pleasant manner. The accounts presented to the House by the India Office at home were characterized by a greater degree of fairness than those which emanated from the Government of India. The latter were singular illustrations of the maxim that complicated accounts went along with embarrassed finance. The alleged increase of £5,000,000 in the Revenue of India during the past two years was really only nominal. When examined it was found to be due to a mere stroke of the pen, and the ordinary items of Revenue, instead of being buoyant, were stationary, or rather on the decline. Of course, the Government of India were not responsible for the great calamities of Famine and the depreciation of silver; but it seemed to him they were to blame for not having realized the situation soon enough, and prepared for it by a rigid economy. It was as apparent three years ago as now; yet, instead of practising economy, the Government of India plunged into the Afghan War, of which he would say no more than that it might either have been averted or postponed. The accumulated deficit of the last few years exceeded the interest of the Debt. India had thus, in fact, been paying the interest of its Debt out of borrowed money, which was just what Egypt and Turkey had been doing. No doubt, he would be met by the argument of productive public works. The Statistical Abstract contained some figures showing what had been the expenditure upon, and the revenue from, public works during the last 10 years. The expenditure on works of irrigation had been £9,620,000, and on State railways £14,622,000, making a total of £24,302,000. The revenue from irrigation works in 1876-7 was £520,000, and the working expenses were £587,000, showing a loss of £60,000. The receipts from railways were £371,000, and the working expenses £263,000. The result was, the gross revenue was £871,000, and the working expenses were £850,000. Practically, there was no return at all for the expenditure. Returns which showed surpluses were, therefore, delusive, as were the Budgets of Napoleon III., which showed a surplus from year to year, while £100,000,000 was added to the Debt of France. Any Financial Statement was illusory and delusive which did not include the expenditure on public works in India. We had increased the public Debt of India by upwards of £50,000,000 in the last few years, of which more than £40,000,000 had been increased in the last six years. The actual deficit of cash expenditure over cash revenue was at the rate of not less than £7,000,000 a-year. He should be surprised if the Afghan War involved a capital charge of less than £4,000,000 or £5,000,000, which must be followed by an increased permanent charge for occupying Forces of 14,000 or 15,000 men, with camp followers, &c. Everyone would rejoice that the war had been brought near to its close, and they had now to look to the future. In occupying the new Frontier, there would be three Passes which would require protecting, and they were so distant from one another that each would have to rely upon its own strength. The estimated yearly expense of the Forces to be set apart for the defence of the new territory had been put down by Sir Henry Norman, who was the very highest authority, at £1,000,000. The good resolution of the Government as regarded economy, so essential to the salvation of the Indian finances, was badly answered by an extension of the Frontier, which, beyond the first outlay, would add £1,000,000 a-year to the permanent Expenditure. As to increasing taxation, the possibilities of doing so were pretty well exhausted. Indirect taxation was admitted to have nearly reached its limit; and as to direct taxation, the political danger arising from any attempt in that direction was so great, and the amount that could be obtained was so small, that all the wisest statesmen had abandoned the idea. In justification of that view he would proceed to examine the several sources of Indian Revenue, in order to show that little or no additional income could be derived from them. Two sources had been suggested from which additional revenue might be obtained—tobacco, and an income tax. As to tobacco, the first fatal objection to deriving revenue from it was, that a great part of the population of India was so poor that they could get no more out of them. Another fatal objection was, that being of almost universal growth, if they attempted to raise a revenue from it they must have an army of Native Excisemen going through the country and prosecuting every unfortunate man who grew it. The objections to an income tax he had often stated. They were based chiefly on the Oriental habit of mind, which was so jealous on the subject as to make any such imposition odious to the people. When he was in India, there was a well authenticated instance of a well-to-do man having hung himself, his mind being so much disturbed by having an income tax paper served upon him. After all, if they put on an income tax they would collect very little. The fact that last year the Government had fallen back upon the licensing tax was a proof how hardly they had been driven to find a fresh source of taxation, it being a tax amounting to 5 per cent upon incomes of

[First Night.]

4s. a-week. The Government appeared to underrate the gravity of the situation with regard to Indian finance, and to over-estimate the amount of the reductions that could be made in the expenditure. There was a fixed annual expenditure of £17,000,000, in which no reduction could be effected; and under several other heads, such as that of "Famine," it was scarcely to be hoped that the expenditure this year would be less than that of last. There was also a loss to be expected with regard to silver; although he thought the conduct of the Government was wise in refusing to listen to any of the empirical schemes which had been put forward for changing the standard. As long as the credit of England stood, it would be easy to raise a succession of loans which they would meet until they approached the gulf of bankruptcy; and he concluded by warning the House that these Indian loans would ultimately fall back upon England.

Mr. SAMPSON LLOYD said, he was certain the House had listened with much satisfaction to the peculiarly clear and lucid statement of the Under Secretary of State for India. He believed every Member of that House was a sincere friend of judicious economy; and he had equally little doubt that that economy would be practised by Her Majesty's Government, when it could be safely carried out, by following the uniform policy indicated in the speech of the Under Secretary of State. He had no doubt that the employment of Natives in the subordinate posts would lead to this, and also have a very beneficial effect on the loyalty of the people. He need not follow the hon. Gentleman in his suggestions as to economy. No doubt, anyone who had paid attention to Indian finance would find that considerable economy might be made in public buildings in India, and what was called ordinary public works. With regard to the Army, he remembered in a former Session the hon. Baronet the Member for Kirkcaldy (Sir George Campbell), whose experience gave his words great weight on questions of this sort, said that as regarded men very little reduction was consistent with the safety of India, and with regard to the officers no reduction need go very far. He submitted that in order to realize any great scheme of economy of the Indian Army, the House must deal with the standing Armies of the great feudatory Princes. So long as those Armies were maintained, numbering many tens of thousands of men, and large numbers of artillery, it was very difficult, indeed, to effect any measure of economy in the Army of India which would bridge over, to any extent, the deficit. As regarded public works, he quite agreed, from what little attention he had paid to the subject in the present circumstances of India, that they had no choice but to take the expenditure on public works. In dealing with these financial difficulties, there were two ways of meeting them—one was, by economy, to lessen the burdens on the ratepayer; and the other was by benefiting the condition of the ratepayer and enabling him to bear greater burdens. He could not help thinking that something might be done by the Government in that way. With regard to the question of manufactures, he thought that the people of India might, to a considerable extent, manufacture for themselves. If India were governed by Native Princes, or by any other Power than England, he could not help thinking that means would be taken to foster, to some extent, at all events, the system of Native manufactures; and for that reason he thought the true interest of India were not consulted by the recent reduction of the duties on the import of manufactures into that country. Referring to the depreciation of silver, he thought it was not due to any natural law, but to the demonetization of silver by Germany, and the reduction of mintage facilities by the States of the Latin Union. The loss to the Government last year from this cause amounted to £3,500,000, or more than the cost of the Famine and the Afghan War, and it was far from certain that the worst had passed. He believed that the grave character of this matter could scarcely be exaggerated, and should have been glad, had the very able statement of the Under Secretary of State for India comprised some indication that the Government were devoting their serious attention to it. He believed that it would be sometime before there would be an equilibrium in India.

Mr. Laing

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, although the hour has arrived at which, when a debate is expected to be prolonged, we usually adjourn, I do not rise for the purpose of moving the adjournment, but with the object of disentangling the different elements of this discussion, which it appears to me have no natural or proper connection with one another, and the conjunction of which, on the present occasion, may rather tend to perplex the public mind. The discussion upon the India Budget, although it is generally limited to a certain number of hon. Members in this House, yet necessarily, and upon all occasions, involves many topics of great interest and importance. On the present occasion it is obvious that those topics are unusually numerous and unusually weighty; and I do not think, nor do I expect or desire, that this discussion should be terminated at the point which it has now reached. But a very great change has taken place in the position of the House in relation to the question now before it since the debate began. We have had upon the Books for some days a Notice of Motion given by my hon. Friend the Member for Hackney (Mr. Fawcett), which appeared to raise a contentious issue; and I, for my own part, came down to the House at 5 o'clock to-day prepared to give strong support, to the best of my ability, to the Motion of my hon. Friend. I was entirely ignorant of what might be the intentions of the Government; all that I knew was that the many grave and even, in my view, alarming circumstances which surround the subject of Indian finance, called for the expression of a very decisive opinion on the part of this House, on behalf of strong, energetic, and effectual measures for the reduction of expenditure. There was the common expectation that we were to have, not merely the usual amicable discussion of incidental points connected with Indian finance, but that we were to have a great issue regularly raised, and that all arrangements had been made for clearing the Paper early in order that the debate might go forward, and the decision of the House taken by division upon the question raised by my hon. Friend. But, Sir, I listened with the utmost interest to the speech of my hon. Friend the Under Secretary of State for India, to which the hon. Member who has just sat down (Mr. Sampson Lloyd) has done, I think, no more than justice in expressing the feeling of the House that it was a most lucid and able exposition of the complicated facts which he had to lay before us; and it was certainly with an amount of pleasurable surprise to me that, after my hon. Friend had, in the discharge of his duty, represented fairly and equitably the very grave state of affairs which exists, he proceeded to announce that Her Majesty's Government, having considered the state of Indian affairs, had arrived at the decision that it was their duty to take in hand effectual means for equalizing expenditure and charge. That was a most important announcement; but it did not appear to me to put an end to the occasion for discussion, because there still remained a great deal to be said upon a large number of incidental questions materially affecting the conditions of Indian finance. If you were to speak, for example, of import duties on foreign goods imported into India—that, of itself, was a topic which could not go by without discussion. I think there are Gentlemen in this House who feel a desire to discuss such matters; but it does appear to me that it would be most unfortunate that they should be discussed under the notion that we have now any contentious issue before us. The declaration of my hon. Friend is one of the utmost importance. He has made an announcement, and he has given encouragement to the House, for the fulfilment of which Her Majesty's Government are responsible. It may be that when they come to the development of their plans they may be such as to give entire satisfaction; and it is possible, on the other hand, that after those plans have developed questions may still remain on which there is a difference of opinion, and which, accordingly, must be debated between us. But what I feel strongly is that for the present moment the declaration made on the part of the Government has removed all reasonable grounds for anything in the nature of a contentious issue; and, therefore, speaking in the character of one thoroughly disposed to support the original proposition of the hon. Member for Hackney (Mr. Fawcett), I venture to say to him that I think it would be a great pity that the House, which is substantially unanimous in accepting the pledge of Her Majesty's Government, should be engaged in a debate with the prospect of its terminating with a Division. What I have to suggest to the hon. Member is that the Motion which, under the rather sudden pressure of the moment, he substituted for the original Resolution still leaves the subject clouded with a certain degree of ambiguity; and that, not having understood the amended Motion of the hon. Member to be acceptable to Her Majesty's Government, I do not, under the circumstances, think we can fairly expect that it should be accepted. The more natural and usual course, when the Government have evinced an intention on their part, which is substantially agreeable to the views which have been expressed by the House, is not to call upon the House in a formal shape, but to accept the assurance which has been received, trusting implicitly to its fulfilment, or, at all events, to postpone its consideration to a later date, when, if there is found to exist any difference of opinion, the matter can be referred to a Division between the two sides of the House. Sir, I do not know whether I express the views generally entertained upon this subject; but I think I express an opinion in conformity with the general experience of the House, when I say that it would be better, for the unprejudiced and dispassionate consideration of the subjects of great importance and difficulty connected with the present state of Indian finance, if we were to allow the hon. Member to get quit of anything in the nature of a Motion that "you do now leave the Chair." I hope, therefore, that my hon. Friend will ask the House for the leave, which I have no doubt will be accorded, to withdraw his Motion, in order that the discussion may be allowed to proceed without there remaining in the public mind the misapprehension that we are divided in intention, while our views in the matter are really united.

Mr. ONSLOW rose to a point of Order. He wished to know the position in which the House was placed with regard to the Amendment?

MR. SPEAKER: The original Question before the House is that I leave the Chair, in order that the House in Committee should consider a financial Resolution, and upon that Motion the hon. Member for Hackney (Mr. Fawcett) moved an Amendment. That Amendment is now before the House. If the House think fit to allow the Amendment to be withdrawn, the original Question will be put from the Chair, and the debate will proceed.

Mr. Gladstone

Mr. FAWCETT thought, after the positive assurance of the Under Secretary of State for India, that a serious and earnest attempt should be made to reduce the expenditure in every Department connected with India, and that Natives were to be largely employed in the Public Service, he should be placing the House in a false position by asking for an expression of opinion upon the question of a reduction of expenditure which had been promised. He therefore begged permission to withdraw his Amendment, though he reserved the right of asking the House next year, if necessary, to express an opinion upon the extent to which the promises of the Under Secretary of State for India had been carried out.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Question again proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Debate be now adjourned."—(Sir George Campbell.)

Motion agreed to.

Debate adjourned till To-morrow.

SUMMARY JURISDICTION BILL.

(Mr Secretary Cross, Mr. Attorney General, Mr. Solicitor General, Sir Matthew Ridley.)

[BILL 138.] CONSIDERATION.

Order for Consideration, as amended, read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now taken into Consideration."—(Mr. Secretary Cross.)

Mr. MORGAN LLOYD drew attention to the alteration in the position of Clerks of the Peace which would be brought about by the operation of this Bill; and as the question was one which involved a principle of justice, he was quite sure the House would give it fair consideration. It had always been usual, whenever any change had been made which affected property, that compensation should be given for the loss sustained by reason of such change; and that principle had always been applied in cases where any change had been made which affected the holders of offices, either by depriving them of those offices, or by reducing the emoluments derived therefrom. It had been the invariable custom of the House to grant the holders of such offices compensation for the loss sustained. The office of Clerk of the Peace was an ancient office, and was held for life. Formerly, the Clerks of the Peace were paid, either wholly or in part, by fees which they received for cases tried at Quarter Sessions; but in consequence of the change which took place in 1851, at least two-thirds in number of the Clerks of the Peace had had to commute their fees, and were now paid by salaries. But he believed a certain number of them, under 20 he thought, were still paid by fees. The proposition which he had to submit to the House was that, as the effect of this Bill would be seriously to reduce the income of these officers, some compensation should be made to them. Without troubling the House with the details of cases in point, he thought that the precedent established in the case of the Summary Jurisdiction Bill of 1855 ought to be applied on the present occasion. That Act contained the provision that Clerks of the Peace should receive compensation for the loss they had sustained by the reduction of their fees consequent upon the passing of that Act, and that principle had, he believed, been acted upon ever since that time. Compensation had also been granted in cases where offices in different Courts of Law had been abolished; and, again, where, as in the present case, the fees and emoluments were decreased, although the offices might not have been actually done away with. But it might be asked whether it was true that the operation of this Bill, when it became law, would seriously diminish the amount of fees? That, he thought, would be perfectly obvious from the Bill itself. He held in his hand the Calendar for the last Sessions for the County of Kent; and it was clear that of the 44 prisoners tried, 31 would have come under the operation of the Act, had it been in force. That, of course, meant a loss of a certain number of shillings in each of the 31 cases, which would, but for the operation of the Act when in force, have gone to the Clerk of the Peace. Again, with regard to the County of Middlesex, he had been told that 800 out of 1,800 prisoners tried would at once be summarily disposed of under the provisions of this Bill; and the same with other counties. These figures, he thought, showed that the result of the Bill, in its present form, would be a very material diminution of the amount of the fees now paid to Clerks of the Peace. But he had heard it said that the provisions of the Criminal Code would, when passed into law, compensate Clerks of the Peace for the loss which they were about to sustain by the operation of the present measure. That, however, was not likely to be the effect of the Code in its present shape. Its result would be this—First of all, there were five classes of offences now triable at the Sessions which, under the provisions of the Code, would be triable at the Assizes only. Against those there were two offences—namely, burglary and highway robbery, in which jurisdiction would be given to the Sessions; but he asked any hon. Member who was in the habit of acting as Chairman at Quarter Sessions, whether the cases under the five heads referred to, which were to be taken from the Sessions to the Assizes, would not be much more numerous than the cases of burglary and highway robbery, which would be added to the jurisdiction of the Quarter Sessions? The argument, therefore, that the Clerks of the Peace would derive any equivalent from the Criminal Code for the losses which they would sustain by the operation of this Bill, fell to the ground. Again, it was said that the Bill itself furnished some remedy for the loss of fees by the provisions made for appeals. But the number of these, it was well known, would be very inconsiderable; because prisoners and their relations were usually very poor, and in cases where they were defended before the magistrates their means were so exhausted that they were unable to prosecute an appeal. How few appeals, except in bastardy cases, ever came to Quarter Sessions? He ventured to say that the appeals under the provisions of this Bill, so far from adding in any essential degree to the fees at Quarter Sessions, would add very little indeed. Therefore, it came to this—that the incomes of the gentlemen who held the offices of Clerks of the Peace, and who took those offices on the supposition that the fees were to be continued to them, would be very seriously diminished, for which reason he hoped that the House would consider that it was but just and right that the precedent which had been over and over again followed in similar cases should not be departed from in the present instance. He begged to move the Amendment of which he had given Notice.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "in the opinion of this House, compensation should be made to clerks of the peace, now paid by fees, for the diminution of their incomes which will be caused by the provisions of this Bill,"—(Mr. Morgan Lloyd.)

—instead thereof.

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

MR. ASSHETON CROSS said, he would not trouble the House with many words, for all that he had to say on this subject he stated the other night. He entirely agreed that everyone having a freehold office was entitled, when that office was abolished, to be compensated; but he entirely denied that Clerks of the Peace, or any other clerks, had a vested interest in crime. Their claim was ludicrous. The hon. and learned Gentleman might just as well say, because they had taken steps to improve the dwellings of the working classes, and also to promote education, by which means they hoped to diminish crime, that Clerks of the Peace on that account had a claim to compensation. What Clerks of the Peace had was a vested right to their office, and they had a vested right, as Clerks of the Peace in the Courts, to get all the fees in respect of the business that came before those Courts; and if no business came before their Courts, then they had no right at all to compensation. He would not take up the time of the House by further debating the matter.

MR. COLE said, that, although the claim of the Clerks of the Peace to compensation might seem very ludicrous to the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary, yet he must venture to differ from him. He quite agreed with him that Clerks of the Peace had no vested interest in crime; but they had a vested interest in their fees. What was now being done was to transfer the dealing with crime from one jurisdiction to another. The amount of crime would remain entirely the same; but it was treated in a different manner. Let them consider what now happened. A man was charged before a magistrate, and there was a magistrate's or a Justice's clerk, or both, who received certain fees when the matter was inquired into. Everyone who knew anything at all about the Criminal Law was aware that, in the event of the prisoner being committed by a magistrate or a Justice to Sessions, magistrate's clerks' fees on committal were inserted in the order made, and were allowed in the costs of the prosecution. If the case was sent to Sessions, the fees of the Clerk of the Peace were in addition to those of the clerk to the magistrates. In fact, there was one class of fees for prisoners dealt with at once by the Justices, and another for prisoners committed for trial at the Assizes or Sessions. If a prisoner were committed to Sessions for trial, the Clerk of the Peace, for the first time, had something to do with the case; for if the case were prosecuted at the Sessions, he was entitled to fees for such prosecution. No doubt, the Clerks of the Peace had no vested interest in crime—the crime remained the same; but the question under the Bill was as to the tribunal which was to deal with it. It was a question whether a prisoner should be dealt with by the magistrates, or sent to the Sessions for trial. If not sent to the Sessions for trial, prisoners were dealt with by the magistrates; and if dealt with by the magistrates, the magistrates' clerk got his fees; but the Clerks of the Peace got no fees at all. So that, by enabling the magistrates to deal summarily with certain offences, they had deprived the Clerks of the Peace of those fees to which they had been formerly entitled. He could not understand the right hon. Gentleman thinking it ludicrous that the Clerks of the Peace should wish for some compensation for the business of which they would be deprived. What was the position of the case? The Treasury would, under this Act, pocket a large amount of the fees hitherto payable to the Clerks of the Peace. It was perfectly clear to everyone knowing anything about the matter that there were two sets of fees, those payable to the magistrates' clerks and those payable to the Clerks of the Peace. If the magistrates were enabled to commit summarily in the cases provided for in the Bill, a prisoner would not be sent to the Sessions for trial. The result was that those fees which would have been payable to the Clerks of the Peace if a prisoner had been sent to trial were saved to the Treasury. The Clerks of the Peace did not ask for what was called compensation. It was not compensation they wanted; but they simply asked that the fees that they were at the present moment entitled to claim on certain committals should be paid to them. They had been appointed to freehold offices on the understanding that they were to receive those fees. There was no question about that. They did not ask that one sixpence should be paid out of the Treasury that was not paid at the present moment. Certain offences must be now tried at Quarter Sessions, and not be tried summarily by the Justices, and in respect of these offences they were entitled to fees. But it was now proposed to take away from the Quarter Sessions the trying of those particular offences, and to allow the Justices at Petty Sessions to deal with them. No one objected to that arrangement; but it was certainly depriving the Clerks of the Peace of the fees which they would have been paid if those offences were still triable at Quarter Sessions. He did not ask that two sets of fees should be paid; but there were certain gentlemen who were not paid by salary, and only by fees. No doubt, the Justices at Quarter Sessions had the power, if so minded, to say that Clerks of the Peace should be paid by salary; but the Clerks of the Peace could not force the Justices to give them a salary. If they could do so, they would have no complaint; and he should like to see all Clerks of the Peace paid by salary. There was a certain number—perhaps a considerable number—of them paid by salary; and it would be very desirable that all should be paid by salary, as when only payable by fees Clerks of the Peace and magistrates' clerks were offered an inducement to commit prisoners for trial for the purpose of making fees. He did not say that that was done; but, still, he thought all such officials should be paid by salary. He knew many gentlemen who had accepted the position of Clerks of the Peace for counties, and had given up their profession in reliance upon receiving the fees payable in that office. These gentlemen, in many cases, would lose £500 or £600 a-year by this Act; and he would ask if this was fair, right, or just? When they accepted those appointments, it was upon a distinct understanding that as the law was so it should continue. That they should have an interest in crimes as imputed to them by the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary was, of course, repugnant to everyone: but that was not the proper way of looking at the question. The crime remained the same, and the whole question was, if they removed these crimes from the jurisdiction of Clerks of the Peace, they removed from them their fees. It seemed to him extremely hard and improper to deprive these gentlemen of the fees which, when they accepted office, they were led to believe were inseparable from it. He would most strongly support the Motion of his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Beaumaris.

Mr. Morgan Lloyd

MR. DODSON said, that it had been admitted that the Clerks of the Peace had no vested interest in the crime of the country; but it had been argued that the crime remained, and that they had a vested interest in its not being transferred to a cheaper and prompter tribunal. He could not agree with that view. Under this Bill not only would there be more appeals, but where a person was charged with a crime for which he was liable to three months' imprisonment he could claim to be tried before a jury. Therefore, the Act, while it took away some business, would have the effect of sending some business to the Clerks of the Peace. He entirely agreed with the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary that if they abolished a freehold office they were bound to pay compensation, but not otherwise. They were not bound to provide crime for the Clerks of the Peace, and he did not think that Clerks of the Peace had any vested interest.

Question put, and agreed to.

Main Question, "That the Bill be now taken into Consideration," put, and agreed to.

Bill, as amended, considered.

MR. SPEAKER wished to point out to the hon. and learned Member for Penryn and Falmouth (Mr. Cole) that his Amendment involved a charge and could only be inserted in Committee of the Whole House.

MR. COLE accepted the ruling of the Chair, and would not press the consideration of his clause. After the strong feeling the House had evinced against the Motion of his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Beaumaris, he thought it was idle for him to move this clause, even if he were entitled to do so, as it embodied the substance of that Resolution. At the same time, he must express a hope that his right hon. Friend the Home Secretary would re-consider his decision. It did strike him as an exceedingly hard case on those gentlemen, and he thought something should be done to relieve them.

MR. RIDLEY said, that it appeared to him that if they gave the Justices a right not to proceed to conviction, although an offence should be proved to have been committed, it was desirable that it should be expressed that that discretion should only be exercised on a consideration of the particular case. The words in the 16th clause, as it at present stood, gave the Justices liberty not to convict when they thought fit. Therefore, without considering the particular circumstances of the case, they might think themselves at liberty to exercise this discretion without reference to the case itself. He therefore begged to move, in Clause 16, page 8, line 30, after the word "inexpedient," to insert "under the particular circumstances of the case."

Amendment proposed, in page 8, line 30, after the word "inexpedient," to insert the words "under the particular circumstances of the case." — (Mr. Ridley.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

SIR HENRY JAMES did not see how he could move his Amendment to leave out Sub-section 1 of this clause, if the Amendment now moved was inserted. He wished to support the Amendment of the hon. Member for South Northumberland, and he should like to say a few words upon the principle involved in it. This sub-section had the effect of placing every magistrate who administered the law above that House and above the law. It would give a magistrate power to say—"I think that although the Legislature have said a certain thing is a crime, yet that it ought not to be so." Although this seemed a very small matter, yet he thought the principle involved in it very serious. In the Criminal Code (Indictable Offences) Bill a provision similar to this was inserted, by which they gave to every Judge who tried a case a power to say that although the Legislature had said that a certain act constituted a crime, yet if that Judge thought that the Legislature was wrong, he could say that the crime should not result in a conviction, and that the prisoner, however guilty, might go free. A Judge would be enabled, because he thought the Legislature wrong in making a particular act a crime, to say that he would exercise this power and refuse to convict for it. This case might very readily happen. A Judge might say that poaching ought not to be a crime, and that he would not convict for it; and he might tell the jury that he would refuse to convict a man, not because he was innocent of the offence with which he was charged, but because, in his opinion, poaching was not a crime. The Legislature determined what acts were crimes, and ought to be punished; but this subsection, and the power proposed to be put in the Criminal Code (Indictable Offences) Bill, put the Judge above that House, and put him into a position to say—"I will not allow the jury to convict, not because the man is not guilty—not because it is not a gross case within the purview of legislation—but because I think the crime ought not to exist." He did not think that any such power as that should be given to any magistrate or Judge. He did not object to a magistrate, or a Judge, having the power to say that a case was so slight that a nominal penalty was sufficient punishment; he was only objecting to a magistrate of summary jurisdiction, or a Judge of greater power, being permitted to say—"I will not allow a jury to convict on this crime, because I think that it ought not to be a crime at all." If they allowed that power to be given in small matters, as was done by the Bill, it seemed to him that they would not be able to object to the insertion of a similar provision in the Criminal Code. He would refer, for one moment, to the cases in which magistrates would be called upon to exercise their discretion. Persons who might be charged before them might be in their employment, or might be known to them, and an appeal would be made to the clemency of the magistrates. At present, the magistrate was able to say—"I am very sorry, but I am bound to obey the law—I am bound to carry the law into effect and commit the prisoner for trial;" but under this section of the Bill it would be in the discretion of the magistrate to dismiss any prisoner, however guilty. He would not be able to say, as before—"I am bound to administer the law," for a discretion was expressly given him here to dismiss a criminal, however guilty, if he thought fit. In dealing with this question, they must consider weak magistrates as well as strong ones. He did not wish to enter into the question of political bias; but there were various questions coming before magistrates upon which they might entertain opinions. He would appeal to those hon. Members who, like himself, were magistrates, and would ask them whether they would like to be placed in this position—that they could not fall back upon the strength of that which they had always been able to do—namely, that they simply administered the law as the Legislature had made it? He could not conceive any position more objectionable than that magistrates should not be protected by the law itself, but left to their own individual discretion in determining whether a conviction should take place. He hoped the House would draw the distinction between the object of this clause—namely, clemency by means of making a conviction only nominal, and the placing a discretion in the hands of the magistrate to say that he would not convict for a crime, however guilty the prisoner might be proved of the offence with which he was charged. He would accept the Amendment of his hon. Friend the Member for South Northumberland; but it seemed to him that the Amendment would not be sufficient to meet the objection he had raised. So far as he could see, they were introducing a principle into the law which was most dangerous and most injurious to the administration of justice, and which he believed would be personally felt to be a great burden, instead of a benefit, to the magistracy of this country. He trusted that he had not pressed his views too strongly upon the House. He did not like to divide against hon. Gentlemen opposite; but he hoped the House would, if it passed this section, accept the responsibility of affirming a principle which he had pointed out would have such untoward results.

Mr. Cole

MR. ASSHETON CROSS said, that, so far as the principle of the Amendment of the hon. Member for South Northumberland went, it was not affected by the opposition of the hon. and learned Member for Taunton. He thought the Amendment proposed by his hon. Friend would be a very great improvement on the Bill, whatever might be done when they came to deal with Sub-section 1. The hon. and learned Member for Taunton had urged that the introduction of the power given in Sub-section 1 would be very dangerous. But it was only proposed by this section to legalize what it was now the constant practice to do in Petty Sessions. A man was charged with an offence, and that offence might be proved; the magistrates, being of opinion that no punishment ought to be inflicted, had been in the habit of saying—"You have been guilty of this offence; but as you are a man of excellent character, and we do not think you deserve punishment, on the whole we will dismiss the case against you on payment of costs." That had been the practice up to the present moment; but when he (Mr. Assheton Cross) first took the chair at Petty Sessions he immediately put a stop to that practice, as he did not think that it was legal, and he had not allowed it to take place since. But the hardship inflicted by the want of such a power was very great; and he thought that a power such as that given by the sub-section was required. At present, if a man were fined even the smallest amount it involved the penalty of paying the costs. The magistrates were not to have the smallest discretion in saying whether a particular act was or was not to be a crime; but they were to be allowed to say that, under the particular circumstances of the case, they did not think it necessary to inflict any punishment at all. He agreed that magistrates ought not to have a power to dismiss a case because they did not think the law making it a crime was right; but it was necessary to give them a discretion to say that, under the particular circumstances, no punishment ought to be inflicted. The only question between his view and that of his hon. and learned Friend seemed to be whether a person should be actually convicted or not. It was now constantly the practice of magistrates to dismiss cases upon payment of costs. That was not legal; but, still, it was done, and instead of leaving it in that way it was proposed to give a power in the matter. He thought the Amendment of the hon. Member for South Northumberland would show more distinctly that magistrates were to exercise their discretion according to the particular circumstances of the case before them, and that it should, therefore, be adopted.

Sir Henry James

MR. HERSCHELL agreed with a great deal that his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Taunton had said; but he was not now going to discuss the question raised by him. He wished only to draw attention to the Amendment before the House. He should like the matter limited more than the hon. Member proposed. In certain circumstances it was intended to impose a certain limitation. He did not think that magistrates should have any discretion except where, under the particular circumstances of the case, the offence was of a trifling character. Unless the power was specific, the clause might include more than that. He should prefer to have words stating that the offence was so trifling that it was not expedient, under the particular circumstances, to convict for the offence. He should, therefore, suggest that the words of the clause should be altered; and instead of the Amendment proposed by the hon. Member for South Northumberland should be inserted the words—

"The offence was, under the particular circumstances of the case, of so trifling a character that it is inexpedient."

MR. RIDLEY accepted the words proposed, and begged to withdraw his Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Amendment (Mr. Herschell) agreed to.

MR. PAGET wished to move an Amendment, at the end of this sub-section, in these words, "or any other nominal punishment." His object in inserting the Amendment was to make the sentences harmonize.

Amendment agreed to.

SIR HENRY JAMES remarked, that the Amendment of his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Durham (Mr. Herschell) mitigated, to some extent, the evil which he was anxious to obviate; but he still thought there was some objection to this clause, and for this reason. It had been said that the question at issue was whether the magistrates should be able to say that they would not convict at all, or whether they would give only a nominal punishment. Every Judge was bound to have a discretion as to the infliction of punishment; but his objection was to magistrates being put above the law, and enabled to say that they would not convict of crime. The right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary had stated that wherever even a nominal punishment was inflicted costs must follow the event, and that the object of the sub-section was to remedy that. He would point out that the Bill remedied that defect in the law; and that, even after a conviction, it was in the power of the magistrates to let a person go without the payment of costs. He must protest against the magistrates being for one moment put above the law; and he more particularly objected to this, as furnishing a precedent for a similar but more extended power being inserted in the Criminal Code.

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON wished to point out that the Amendment which stood in his name on the Paper dealt with a class of crime not contemplated when the question was raised before. The Bill contained a scheme of penalties, by which the non-payment of any sum above £20 was punishable by imprisonment for three months. In many Revenue cases penalties amounted to £1,800 or £2,000; and in a case which was at present proceeding Her Majesty's Government claimed £1,800 penalty. Under these circumstances, he thought the House would think that three months' imprisonment for an offence against the Revenue, in which the penalty amounted to £1,800, was hardly adequate. He wished to prevent the occurrence of offences against the Revenue; and he was afraid if three months were left as the alternative to breaking these laws, that it would not sufficiently deter crime. Under these circumstances, he had to ask the House to add to the powers of the magistrates in these cases, and to extend the punishment in Revenue cases to a longer period of imprisonment—namely, six months. He moved, in Clause 54, page 32, line 3, to leave out from the word "act" to the word "shall" in line 8.

MR. HOPWOOD observed, that it would meet the justice of the case, if magistrates were allowed to inflict greater punishment in the case of these offences than they could in others. He thought, however, that the Amendment proposed went too far, for it included offences against the Post Office.

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON observed, that he would amend that, and proposed to leave out from the word "apply" to "and," inclusive, in line 7.

Amendment agreed to.

MR. DODSON said, that he had to move an Amendment upon the 1st Schedule of the Bill. The object of the Bill was to permit trumpery cases to be dealt with in a summary manner. He proposed to add to the 1st Schedule, amongst the offences which might be dealt with, the obtaining money by false pretences where the value of the money did not, in the opinion of the Court before which the charge was brought, exceed 5s. He had taken the sum of 5s. in order to confine the power to small cases. He might point out that the object was to confine the matter to obtaining money, as it was a much simpler case than that of obtaining goods by false pretences. In the case of obtaining goods by false pretences difficult questions might arise; but the case of obtaining money was much simpler and in harmony with the principle of the Bill.

Amendment proposed,

In page 34, column 1, line 20, after the word "sections," to insert the words "7. Obtaining money by false pretences where the value of the whole of the money alleged to have been so obtained does not, in the opinion of the court before which the charge is brought, exceed five shillings."—(Mr. Dodson.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. ASSHETON CROSS observed, that though the Amendment was worthy of consideration, yet he could not agree with it. His reason for objecting to the Amendment was that he feared it might be used for the purpose of collecting debts. He had great objection to allowing the Criminal Law to be made a medium for debt-collecting; and he wished, by every means in his power, to prevent it. He therefore thought it would be right to leave the Bill as it stood.

SIR HENRY JAMES observed, that whether made a medium for collecting debts or not, a charge of committing this offence might be sent by the magistrates for trial. He thought it was better to have such a case tried before the magistrates, and a summary conviction take place, than that the matter should be sent to the Quarter Sessions. It was really only a question as to whether a particular offence should be dealt with summarily, or sent to the Quarter Sessions to be disposed of.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS remarked, that the cost of carrying the matter to Quarter Sessions would put a stop to the practice of making use of the Criminal Law in this particular matter for debt-collecting.

Question put.

The House divided:—Ayes 27; Noes 37: Majority 10.—(Div. List, No. 107.)

MR. MORGAN LLOYD said, that he had an Amendment, in page 35, line 10, to insert these words—

“Provided that the value does not, in the opinion of the Court before which the charge is brought, exceed forty shillings.”

He did not know the intention of the Government with respect to this matter; but, in point of fact, jurisdiction was given by the Bill to try aiders and abettors without limit as to amount. The compulsory jurisdiction of magistrates under it was limited to the value of 40s., but aiders and abettors of thefts of, say, £1,000, or a valuable horse, might be tried summarily. He did not know whether it was intended to allow this peculiarity to exist, for it was an anomaly; and he could see no reason why, if a principal could not be tried, an accessory before the fact, or after the fact, should be allowed to be tried. The object of his Amendment was to give the same jurisdiction, with regard to accessories before and after the fact, as was exercised with regard to principals.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS: I am satisfied, and accept the Amendment.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. Assheton Cross

MR. COLE moved an Amendment with a view to limiting the power to try for attempts to steal. As the matter at present stood, there was no limit whatever to the power of the magistrates to try for attempts to steal. It seemed to him that, as respected the tribunal, an attempt to commit an offence ought to be placed on the same footing as the entire offence.

Amendment proposed,

In page 35, line 16, after the word “servant,” to insert the words “where the property which is the subject of the alleged offence does not, in the opinion of the court before whom the charge is brought, exceed forty shillings.”—(Mr. Cole.)

MR. ASSHETON CROSS observed, that a man was charged with attempting to steal money, but the amount of the money might be unknown, the Court could not possibly determine the value of the property which he attempted to steal, and that it would be, therefore, absolutely impossible to carry out this provision. If a man attempted to pick a pocket, it would be impossible to charge him with attempting to steal any specific sum, because the amount of money in the pocket would probably not be known.

MR. PAGET thought that this Amendment was very objectionable, and he should strongly oppose it.

MR. COLE said, he would withdraw his Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON moved, in Schedule 2, page 36, line 5, to insert—

(11 and 12 Vic. c. 43.)

“An Act to facilitate the performance of the duties of justices of the peace out of session, within England and Wales, with respect to summary convictions and orders.”

The following words in section thirty-five: “Nor to any information or complaint or other proceeding under or by virtue of any of the statutes relating to Her Majesty’s Revenue of Excise or Customs, Stamps, Taxes, or Post Office.”

He said, that this Amendment was simply to do away with the exemption of the Customs and Inland Revenue in proceedings under the Larceny Act.

Amendment agreed to.

Bill to be read the third time To-morrow.

GREAT SEAL [SALARY].
COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee thereupon read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."—(Sir Henry Selwin-Ibbetson.)

MR. MONK said, that it was not usual for Mr. Speaker to leave the Chair in order that the House might go into Committee and provide for expenses arising out of a Bill until it had passed its second reading. Moreover, it was later than half-past 12, and the Bill in question was opposed by his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Oxford (Sir William Harcourt.)

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON said, that this was merely a formal stage of the Bill, the object of which was to sanction, by Resolution of the House, the amount of salary to be paid in case the Bill should be passed.

Question put.

The House divided:—Ayes 22; Noes 13: Majority 9.—(Div. List, No. 108.)

Main Question, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair," put, and agreed to.

Matter considered in Committee.
(In the Committee.)

Resolved, That it is expedient to authorize the payment, out of moneys to be provided by Parliament, of additional Salary to any Officer which may become payable under the provisions of any Act of the present Session to amend the Law respecting the manner of passing Grants under the Great Seal, and respecting Officers connected therewith.

Resolution to be reported To-morrow.

COSTS TAXATION (HOUSE OF COMMONS) BILL—[Bill 190.]
(Mr. Raikes, Mr. Mowbray.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. RAIKES explained that it was intended to legalize in the case of Provisional Orders the same regulations as to the taxation of costs which had long been established in the case of Private Bills. He therefore moved that the Bill should be read a second time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Raikes.)

Motion agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed for To-morrow.

House adjourned at a quarter before Two o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Friday, 23rd May, 1879.

MINUTES.]—PUBLIC BILLS—First Reading—Consolidated Fund (No. 3) *; Dispensaries (Ireland) * (88); Hares (Ireland) * (89); Parliamentary Burghs (Scotland) * (90); Local Government (Ireland) Provisional Orders (Waterford, &c.) * (91); Public Health (Scotland) Provisional Order (Bothwell) * (92).
Second Reading—Children's Dangerous Performances (64); Statute Law Revision (Ireland) (80); Valuation of Lands (Scotland) Amendment * (83).
Report—Habitual Drunkards * (86-93).
Third Reading—Pier and Harbour Orders Confirmation * (73); Public Health (Scotland) Act, 1867, Amendment * (78), and passed.
Royal Assent—Registration of Births, Deaths, and Marriages (Army) [42 Vict. c. 8]; Friendly Societies Act (1875) Amendment [42 Vict. c. 9]; Assessed Rates Act Amendment [42 Vict. c. 10]; Bankers' Books (Evidence) [42 Vict. c. 11]; Petty Customs (Scotland) Abolition Act Amendment [42 Vict. c. 13]; Poor Law Amendment Act (1876) Amendment [42 Vict. c. 12]; Oyster and Mussel Fisheries Order (Blackwater, Essex) [42 Vict. c. i]; Drainage and Improvement of Lands (Ireland) Provisional Order Confirmation [42 Vict. c. ii]; General Police and Improvement (Scotland) Provisional Order (Paisley) [42 Vict. c. iii]; General Police and Improvement (Scotland) Provisional Order (Inverness) [42 Vict. c. iv]; Land Drainage Provisional Order (Bispham, &c.) [42 Vict. c. xli]; Public Health (Scotland) Provisional Order (Castlo Douglas) [42 Vict. c. xlii]; Local Government Provisional Orders (Ashton-under-Lyne, &c.) [42 Vict. c. xliii].

CHILDREN'S DANGEROUS PERFORMANCES BILL—(No. 64.)

(The Earl De la Warr.)

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

EARL DE LA WARR, in moving that the Bill be now read a second time, said, their Lordships had, in a former Session, read a similar measure a second time; but owing to the peculiar manner in which it was framed, and the objection that it included too much, it was withdrawn. The present Bill was to prevent the employment of children of tender years in gymnastic, athletic, or other performances of a kind which would endanger life or limb. The 2nd clause, which was the principal one, provided that no child under 14 years of age should take part in any public exhibition or performance which, in the opinion of a Court of Summary Jurisdiction, would be considered dangerous to life or limb. The Bill also imposed penalties on the person who employed the child, or the parent or guardian who allowed the child to be so employed. It was said that if persons did not commence the practice of such performances when they were children they would not be able to accomplish them in after-life. He submitted that that would be no great loss to the community. There was, however, no desire to put down by means of the Bill such gymnastic exercises on the part of youths and adult persons as were necessary to the maintenance of bodily health and the development of the human frame. In the case of the dangerous exhibitions which it was proposed to suppress, the children who took part in them were not voluntary agents. They were compelled to take part in them and risk their lives for the gain of others. It was true that dangerous performances had diminished in number for a certain time after the introduction of the former measure on this subject; but some instances which had recently occurred showed that the practice still continued to a great extent. The noble Earl then described in detail several examples of dangerous performances, chiefly in music halls. In one case a child, about six years of age, suspended at a dizzy height, went through a ceiling-walking performance, which consisted of passing backwards and forwards, head downwards, by placing his feet successively in loops. In another instance, two sisters, not more than eight or nine years of age, swung round and round a number of times on a trapeze. The noble Earl read announcements, issued by managers, of "additional attractions," in the form of "flying wonders," "queens of the air," and so on. He also referred to an accident which had recently occurred at a music hall in Birmingham to a boy 12 years of age. One of his feats consisted in being propelled into the air from an apparatus placed on the stage. The machine went off rather unexpectedly, and the little fellow was hurled into the air, and one of his legs was broken and severely lacerated. These children, in their professional education, were subjected to a system of torture from the earliest period. He begged to move the second reading of the Bill.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^d."
—(The Earl De la Warr.)

EARL BEAUCHAMP said, that everyone, including Her Majesty's Government, sympathized with the object of the noble Earl (Earl de la Warr); but it was a question whether the measure for which he asked a second reading was best calculated to attain the end which he had in view. He (Earl Beauchamp) thought in its present shape it was not, for none of the performances which the noble Earl had mentioned would come within its scope. They all took place at music-halls, and the Bill was confined to exhibitions in a circus. The Bill as drawn would prohibit most gymnastic exhibitions, because, if they were shown to be dangerous, and a grown person employed a child in them, they would be prohibited, although the child might be employed in a portion of the entertainment which was not at all dangerous. Of course, this was not intended; but it would be one of the effects of the Bill. The Bill could be amended in Committee, and the Government would not oppose the second reading; but he very much doubted whether any great compulsion was really exercised on the children who took part in the performances in question.

LORD ABERDARE observed, that as the Legislature had prohibited the employment of young children in some of the most useful manufactures of the country, because that employment was injurious to them, a fortiori, there was a case made out for preventing the employment of children at dangerous performances.

THE EARL OF SHAFTESBURY said, it was not during the performances that the greatest mischief was done and the greatest cruelty perpetrated towards the children. It was in the training of the children from the ages of four and five years up to 14 that the severest torture was inflicted on them.

Earl De La Warr.

Motion agreed to; Bill read 2^a accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Thursday next.

THE METROPOLITAN WATER SUPPLY AND FIRE BRIGADE—REPORT OF THE SELECT COMMITTEE.

MOTION FOR PAPERS.

EARL GRANVILLE, in calling attention to the Report of the Select Committee of the House of Commons in 1877 on the Metropolitan Fire Brigade, and to move for Papers, said, he owed an apology to their Lordships for bringing before them a subject on which he was profoundly ignorant three months ago. The accident of a fire in his own house had drawn his attention to the system prevalent in the Metropolis for the protection of life and property against fire. But, in any criticisms which he might make on the system, he wished to be understood as making no complaint whatever of the authorities or individuals who took a part in extinguishing that fire. On the contrary, he could only express his gratitude for the zeal, energy, and courtesy which were shown. He should like to add one word of thankfulness for the sympathy which was shown him and his family, not only by friends, but even by mere acquaintances. He could not pretend that that sympathy was quite universal, because the director of an Insurance Company overheard one person say to another in Pall Mall—"After all, Lord Granville's fire is not a bad thing; it creates work." This idea, that the creation of a necessity for labour was tantamount to a creation of wealth, would have indicated that the speakers were rather anti-Free Traders than Liberals. But he had reason to believe that they belonged to his Party, for when they got opposite the Carlton they agreed that for every reason it would be an excellent thing if that place were burnt down to the ground. The risk of fire was so interesting to all their Lordships that they would forgive him for calling their attention to the Report of the Committee of 1876-7. It was the more important as the recommendations were similar to those of all other Committees and Royal Commissions which had sat on this matter, or on subjects connected with it—among others, a Commission presided over by his noble Friend the Lord President of the Council (the Duke of Richmond and Gordon). The recommendations were almost identical with those of the Society of Arts, which were of great value, as the work was chiefly carried on by experts and specialists, who had leave from the Government to examine official witnesses. The Report of the Committee gave an interesting account, which he would not repeat, of the system for dealing with fires which existed previous to 1865. It was almost incredible that, up to that date, the only legal provision for protecting life and property from fire was an obligation upon the Metropolitan parishes to keep fire engines, but with no corresponding obligation upon anyone to work them. There was a body of firemen, who had no public character, but were maintained by some of the Insurance Companies, for the extinction of fires only in the central parts of the town, and there was a charitable society which owned a certain number of fire-escapes. In 1865, an improvement was effected by the creation of the Fire Brigade as a municipal institution under the superintendence of the Metropolitan Board of Works. But the Committee reported that although the expenditure of the Board had been, on the whole, judicious, they were always hampered by want of means, and that the Brigade, though the men were efficient and well officered, was quite inadequate in numbers. In London, with a population of 3,500,000, the Brigade consisted of 406 men; in Paris, with a population under 2,000,000, the firemen numbered 1,548; in New York and Brooklyn, with a combined population of about 1,350,000, there were 2,300 firemen. The system there was expensive, but perfect. Mr. Lyon Playfair, who had lately been in the United States, had written to him the following description:—

"The American system for fires is very elaborate.

"1. Many private houses have direct communication with the nearest police office by telegraph wire. You have on this four signals—(a) alarm of fire, (b) send a cab, (c) send a commissioner, (d) send the police—a robbery or crime.

"2. Every small district has a fire alarm attached to a convenient house, on the outside. The alarm is locked, but the house to which it is attached keeps the key, and each policeman on the beat has a key. Your house is on fire and you rush to this box, open it, pull a wire, which tells the central office that there is a fire close to this district box.

"3. The Central Office now does the following. It telegraphs to the district fire-engine office and to the neighbouring Alliance offices that there is a fire, say in district 500. I have been in these offices when an alarm arrives, and have seen the operation. An alarm bell rings and the telegraph at the same moment loosens the horses in their stalls. The horses, being trained to obey the alarm, instantly turn round and rush to their places in the fire engine. By the time the men have put on their accoutrements the horses are in place and only require to be hooked to the engine.

"4. Of course the efficiency of all fire arrangements depends upon there being a system of constant supply in the mains and in the houses. This is precisely the great want in London, and until it is given to us London will be far behind other great towns in protection from fire."

In London there was no unity of management. Of those who took part officially in dealing with a fire there were the police, who were almost always the first on the spot. In our great provincial towns they at once applied a hose to a hydrant of which they had the key, and thus constantly themselves put out the fire in the room in which it originated. In London they had no power to extinguish the fire. Their business was only to arouse the inmates of the place on fire, to summon help, and to keep order. The Fire Brigade—a body entirely separate, under the orders of the Metropolitan Board—when they arrived were frequently helpless until the turncock came. He was the private servant of one of eight Water Companies, who were governed by their own special Acts, with independent areas, separate systems of pipes, and peculiar regulations. They were under no obligation to supply sufficient water for the extinction of fires. They were only bound to give gratuitously what happened to be there. There was no connection between their water services, no means of sustaining pressure or of concentrating the whole power of the water service of the Metropolis upon one spot. The Salvage Corps was another separate body under the orders of the Insurance Companies. It might be said this arrangement sounded anomalous, but it worked well. It was most creditable to the energy and zeal of those concerned that it worked at all. It would be well worth the while of any of their Lordships to visit the central office of the Fire Brigade. It was impossible to imagine a finer race of men, or a more intelligent system of discipline, and application of means to ends. But the system itself was bad, and did not work well when compared with those places where unity prevailed. In the evidence taken by the Committees of 1846 and 1847, by the Committee of Inquiry of the Society of Arts, and by the Committee of the Corporation of London that visited Manchester, it was shown that there were in proportion three times more loss of life and property in London than in those towns where unity prevailed. In one, the rule was for the house to be burnt; in the other, only the room. Their Lordships would remember what a serious percentage that was, when it was considered how many more lives were lost, and how much more property was destroyed by fire than by any human violence or robbery. This saving of life and property in the provincial towns was partly owing to concentration of management, partly to the constant supply of water, and the fact that hydrants were placed in all the mains, and in the houses themselves. The conclusions of the Select Committee were 12. But as six of them were either matters of detail or related to theatres, and had already been to some degree obeyed, he would only trouble their Lordships with the following six:—

"That the statutory arrangements for the extinction of fires in the metropolis, whereby the Fire Brigade is administered by the Metropolitan Board of Works, two separate police forces exist side by side, and the water supply is sectionally furnished by eight independent companies, are not such as to furnish adequate protection to life and property, and contrast unfavourably with provincial systems, where the Fire Brigade, water supply, and police are under a single authority; and that consolidation of management, so far as is practicable, is urgently required.

"That the Fire Brigade should be transferred from the Metropolitan Board to the Commissioner of Police for the Metropolis, so however as to constitute a distinct branch to be placed under the immediate command of a separate assistant commissioner, and to be authorized to act within the city of London, as well as in the metropolis.

"That the police stations and the fixed points should be used as Fire Brigade stations, or as places where small engines or other appliances should be deposited, and that all police constables, both of the metropolis and city, should be auxiliary to the Fire Brigade, but that, as now, each force should be empowered to act only within its own jurisdiction except on a special requisition.

"That hydrants should, without delay, be affixed to mains and service pipes wherever there is a constant supply, and should follow the extension of such supply.

"That the water systems now belonging to the various companies should be consolidated in the hands of a public authority, which, in dealing with the questions of constant supply, pressure, and pipage, should be bound to have regard not only to the convenience of consumers, but also to the requirements for the extinction of fire.

"That effect should be given by the Legislature to these recommendations."

With regard to the amalgamation of the Fire Brigade with the police, the Committee came to the same opinion after hearing conflicting evidence as previous Committees had done. The a priori reasons were conclusive. By the unity of authority over the police force and the water supply, you saved time. Time was the one important thing in extinguishing a fire. It was Mr. Braidwood's maxim that it was upon the first five minutes that the matter depended. In the theatrical evidence, it was stated that the best fire-engine in a theatre was the carpenter's cap—a saying which aptly illustrated how infinitesimal the effort required at first was compared with the power necessary when a fire has got ahead. The fireman could only come when he was summoned. The policeman was, comparatively speaking, everywhere. One of the matters the most difficult to deal with were the intentional fires. The immediate presence of the policeman on the spot where the fire began would allow of proofs of design being obvious, which would be otherwise obliterated by the progress of the flames. Mr. Chadwick, who had given such invaluable attention to this subject, had written powerfully in support of the theory that it was wise to increase, as much as possible, those attributes of the policeman which were altogether popular, and made him a persona grata to the people. He knew of no country where the police, from the services which they had rendered, were looked upon with so much favour as in this country. The strength they derived from the moral co-operation of the population could not be over-estimated. It was wise to encourage this feeling in every way. As to an amalgamated system of water supply which would enable a non-intermittent flow of water to the whole area of the Metropolis, its advantages for the protection of life and property against fire, and in favour of public health, were self-evident; and when it had been proved to the satisfaction of the Committee of 1876-7—and, indeed, of all the other Committees and Commissions—that this could be done with diminished expenditure, with less waste of water, and with a cutting-off of the most unwholesome sources of supply, it seemed incredible that there should be delay in carrying out such urgent work. He could not deny that the economy of money and of water, and the possibility of a constant supply of water, had been questioned. He might, if he chose, give their Lordships all the proofs and calculations from the volumes before him that this economy and this constant supply could be obtained; but he asked their Lordships to take it, not from an individual like himself, but from the Reports of the various inquiring bodies, that such was the case. The last conclusion of the Committee of 1876-7 was that effect should be given by the Legislature to the recommendations of the Committee, a conclusion proposed by Sir Henry Selwin-Ibbetson, not in his individual capacity, but as Representative of the Home Office. It was unanimously adopted by the Committee. When, therefore, he gave Notice of his Motion of that day, he had every reason to hope for a favourable reply from Her Majesty's Government; but since that time an important deputation from the London Vestries had waited upon the Secretary of State (Mr. Cross) to represent the great and increasing grievance to the ratepayers of the Metropolis under the present system, and to urge the consolidation of the eight Companies, with a view to an economy of money and an adequate supply of good water. Mr. Cross was reported to have announced that, with regard to dealing with such legal powers as the Companies possessed, Parliament never interfered, excepting to carry out any arrangement that might have been made, and, apparently, left the responsibility on the Vestries of making such an arrangement. That gave him (Earl Granville) some anxiety as to the answer of the noble Earl (Earl Beauchamp) who represented the Department. It was impossible that the noble Earl should, on behalf of the Home Office, impugn on their merits the value of the recommendations of the Committee, which, in the circumstances he (Earl Granville) had stated, must be considered as the opinion of the Office on the abstract merits of the question. But if the noble Earl urged delay, he (Earl Granville) could only say there was every possible objection to it. If, as was the opinion of the Committee, the London system entailed three times greater sacrifice of life and property than those systems where unity prevailed, the necessity for immediate action was overwhelming. Besides, every year's delay added enormously to the pecuniary difficulty of an arrangement with the vested interests of the Companies. Every year would add something like £1,750,000 to the sum which had to be paid. It was out of the question that the Vestries, who had nothing to do with the police, who had no special knowledge on the matter, or skilled officers to advise them, and who were generally engaged in business affairs, should have the task of settling the terms and mode of purchasing the means of supplying water to the Metropolis. The noble Duke the Lord President of the Council (the Duke of Richmond and Gordon) and his Commission reported that—

"Such technical details could only be carried out by competent professional skill, and that this must be carefully determined under the guidance of the experience gained in the process of the change."

The Metropolitan Board failed to treat with the Water Companies, who declined to negotiate with them, and had twice been discouraged by the Government from doing so. The privileges and powers of the Companies had been confirmed under the sanction of the Government. They were exercised under the supervision of Government Departments and Government officers, of a Government Auditor, and a Government Surveyor, formerly under the Board of Trade, now under the Local Government Board. It was the practice of the Government to give its assistance in this matter. To take one instance, there was the Commission for the consolidation of roads of upwards of 100 parishes, under a Royal Commission or Road Trust, which worked remarkably well. He doubted whether there would be any insuperable difficulties in coming to a speedy arrangement with the Water Companies. Compulsory powers to deal with vested interest on behalf of life, property, and the public health of the Metropolis were clearly as justifiable as those for improving the railway communications of the country. In both cases there must be no confiscation. There must, on the contrary, be liberal compensation. The difficulty of coming to an agreement ought to be much diminished—first, by the fact that the shareholders did not now profit at all in proportion to the increasing rates to which the consumers of water were subject; and, second, that Parliament had in numerous instances settled the principles on which such compensation should be given—namely, 25 years' purchase of the highest net dividend, with an allowance for compulsory purchase; and also, on arbitration, an allowance for prospective advantages. If his noble Relative, in his answer, threw more or less cold water upon him, such as was supplied now by some of the London Companies; if he declined, on the part of the Home Office, to take any initiative on such a pressing and urgent question—he must appeal to Cæsar—to the noble Earl at the head of Her Majesty's Government (the Earl of Beaconsfield); but he was afraid that Cæsar had just left the House. Not many years ago, the noble Earl publicly begged the civil engineers to direct their attention to the improvement of the public health, and he suggested as a subject most worthy of their consideration the supply of water to London. He was told the noble Earl also encouraged Colonel Beresford to propose a Bill for the purpose even before the Select Committee had sat, and he knew that it was a proud boast of the noble Earl at the commencement of his Administration that the public health would be the principal care of his Government. He did not think there could be a better way of redeeming such a pledge than by carrying out the recommendations of the Committee, which dealt with a matter of great urgency as regarded life, property, and public health. In conclusion, the noble Earl moved for the production of Papers relating to the subject.

Earl Granville

Moved, "That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty for Correspondence between the Society of Arts and the Secretary of State for the Home Department respecting the Water Supply of the Metropolis."—(The Earl Granville.)

EARL BEAUCHAMP said, there was no doubt, as the noble Earl (Earl Granville) had said, that the Prime Minister had always taken a great interest in questions relating to the public health, and he was duly impressed with the importance of the question now before their Lordships. It was impossible, however, to promise immediate redress of the grievances which the noble Earl had set forth in his speech. It was true the Committee to which the noble Earl had called attention was presided over by Sir Henry Selwin-Ibbetson; but when propositions which appeared most desirable in the abstract came to be put into operation, other considerations had to be taken into account. The management of the administration of fires was a question full of difficulty. Since the Fire Brigade was constituted and placed under the control of the Metropolitan Board of Works, the statistics showed the progress it had made. In 1866 there were 1,338 fires, and in 1875 there were 1,529; but in 1866, out of the 1,338 fires, 326 were of a serious character, and 1,012 were slight. That was the state of matters before the Metropolitan Board of Works took charge. In 1875, out of 1,529, 163 were fires of a serious character, and 1,366 were slight. It would, therefore, be seen that in the 10 years the proportion of serious fires had fallen from 25 per cent to 11 per cent, showing that a more efficient system had been brought into operation, by which fires were sooner detected and their mischief more thoroughly mitigated; and there was no reason to suppose that the progress made in those years had come to a conclusion. When it was asked that the Fire Brigade should be placed under the police, it must be remembered that there were two police forces in the Metropolis—that under the City of London, and that under the Secretary of State. The City of London had always been jealous of interference with its police, and the time had not been arrived at for subordinating their police to the Secretary of State. Unless, therefore, it could be shown that the present arrangement was incompatible with the public welfare, the City of London police should not be lightly interfered with. It had also been recommended that a second body should be created, and subordinated to the Commissioner of Police. It must be evident that if it was possible for the police to afford greater facilities than they did at the present time, they must have a separate organization and separate training for those who were really to cope with difficulties arising at fires. But he did not see what advantage was to be gained from this recommendation. The amalgamation of the Water Companies was a very large question. It had been certainly estimated that the sum of £20,000,000 would be required to buy up the rights of the Companies. That made the money question a very serious one. He might remind the noble Earl that besides the great question of capital, the Committee had recommended that there should be a constant supply throughout the day, and that, it had been estimated, would cost not less than £250,000. No doubt it was possible to frame a measure which would satisfy the Companies; but whether a measure which would satisfy the Companies would satisfy the Metropolis was a different question. The progress of Business in the House of Commons during the last two or three years had not been such as to make it very desirable to introduce measures without a reasonable prospect of carrying them, and he was sure that such a measure as this would undergo a severe and searching examination. But that was not a matter which should deter the Government from dealing with the question. No doubt, when the time arrived for dealing with the subject, the Report of the Committee, to which reference had been made, would form the basis of legislation; but the question was one of such a grave and important character, that it would be rash for the Government to take it up unless they saw their way to carry it to a successful and a speedy conclusion. No one could be more sensible than himself (Earl Beauchamp) of the terrible consequences that would follow a conflagration in the densely-populated districts of the Metropolis where so much wealth was stored, and he freely admitted that the noble Earl, with whose loss he fully sympathized, had done good service in bringing the subject before the House.

LORD ABERDARE said, that the noble Earl on his side of the House (Earl Granville) could not be congratulated on the effect of his speech, as it had failed to obtain from the Government any distinct pledge. No one expected that the Government would undertake immediate legislation; but anything more hopeless than the views expressed by the noble Earl opposite (Earl Beauchamp) it was impossible to conceive; and he (Lord Aberdare) very much regretted the noble Earl had not held out some hope of a speedy termination to the state of affairs which had been complained of. The noble Earl could not pretend to say for a moment that by delay they would gain further information. Royal Commissions and Committees of both Houses had more than once insisted that, in order to insure the rapid extinction of fires and a constant supply of pure water to the Metropolis, the Water Companies should be amalgamated. The Royal Commission of 1869 laid it down in the clearest way that the control of the water supply of London should be intrusted to a responsible public body. The expediency of uniting the Water Companies under one controlling head was amply demonstrated in the Report of that Commission, various reasons being given for the adoption of the course which was advocated. That course, the Commission stated, could alone effectually insure to the Metropolis a constant supply of water for domestic purposes as well as for the extinction of fires. Again, by its adoption the poor would be provided with proper water. An attempt, he might remind their Lordships, had been made by the late Government to secure this advantage for the poorer classes, and considerable pressure had been brought to bear upon the Companies by the Bill of 1871, which had, he was glad to say, resulted in some improvement. The advantage of a constant water supply was, however, by no means universally enjoyed by the poor. Some of the Companies had exerted themselves; but there remained one which had done nothing at all, and two which had done very little. The Commission to which he had referred also enumerated among the advantages of the system which they proposed for adoption that it would result in uniformity of management, and in improvement in the quality of the water supplied. It would, he thought, be allowed that the places in which a fire would be most likely to spread were just those where it would be most difficult to procure an adequate supply of water under the existing system. They had it on high authority that they could not make satisfactory arrangements for the extinction of fire if they had not a constant water supply at their command. He regretted, however, to say that the Government had taken no step towards giving effect to these commendations contained in the Report. The Metropolis and its suburbs contained a population exceeding that of Scotland, and yet they were behind one of the chief cities of Scotland as regarded the means of extinguishing fire.

LORD DENMAN said, that it was unfair in noble Lords to complain of the Government for not promising legislation on this subject at a fixed time, when those who complained were continually striving to expel them from office. The Government did not promise, but had often carried measures which their opponents had failed to make practical. The noble Earl (Earl Granville) had alluded to the importance of an early extinction of fires. He (Lord Denman) wished that in every house there were a small portable gas or steam apparatus, which at an early stage of a fire might subdue it. He believed that the Government would effectually deal with the important question before their Lordships; but they could not be expected to do so in the present state of Public Business during the present Session.

THE EARL OF SHAFTESBURY said, that the question now under consideration had been before the public for the last 30 years. It was quite time that it was settled. The present water supply of the Metropolis was perfectly shameful. There were some districts of London in which the houses were of such a construction, that if a fire broke out it would be like the Great Fire of London in the extent of its devastation. He spoke feelingly on this subject, having, more than 30 years ago, been Chairman of the Board of Health which proposed a scheme for the remedying of the evil. That it was an efficient remedy was proved by the fact that the Water Companies rose as one man against it. One of the results was that the Board was dissolved with a large amount of contempt, and ceased to exist. The evil, however, went on. Government after Government had had the question before them, but nothing had been done. During the course of his investigations in the East of London, at the period to which he referred, he found men drinking the most detestable beer, and he asked them why they did so? and they replied to the effect that the beer was bad, but the water was worse. Bodies created by Act of Parliament should be taught that there was a body superior to them; and he could not too earnestly press upon Her Majesty's Government the necessity of dealing, and that promptly, with a matter which seriously affected the morals, the health, and the happiness of many thousands of their fellow-subjects.

Lord Aberdare

EARL FORTESCUE said, that he, also, had tasted some of the water supplied at the East End of London, and had found it to be very bad. He wished to enforce upon Her Majesty's Government the urgent importance of taking the question into their consideration. In the year 1852 the property of the Water Companies was valued at something like £8,000,000 sterling; now, however, the valuation was £26,000,000. Some of those Companies were extending their works, to supply an increased population, and did so very willingly. "Coming events cast their shadows before," and the Water Companies knew that, at no distant day, that which was being done by great city after great city, and even by small town after small town—namely, the supply by the local authority to them of water and gas—would be done in this great Metropolis. Delay would only make the terms more onerous. The economies, however, of consolidation and the suppression of secretaries, solicitors, and other functionaries of the Companies would be sufficient to pay the interest on the cost of securing an efficient and constant supply of water at high pressure. In Manchester, when an alarm of fire was given, the mains being charged with water at high pressure, the police had nothing to do but to attach hose to a stand-pipe and turn a stream of water on the fire. He ventured to hope that the Government would seriously entertain this question, being assured that there was a large margin for economy and efficiency. We might have water less cold in winter and less warm in summer through being carried further underground, out of the reach of the frost and of the sun; and, with these agreeable and convenient changes, we might have greater security to life and property than at present.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND AND GORDON said, that one would think, from a remark of the noble Earl who had just addressed their Lordships (Earl Fortescue), that it was the easiest thing in the world to supply the Metropolis with water; but the noble Earl had not suggested how it was to be done. The Commission over which he had presided was appointed to inquire into the feasibility of two schemes proposed by Mr. Bateman and Mr. Hassard, one for bringing water from Wales, and the other from Cumberland. The Commission sat for a considerable time, took a great deal of evidence, and spared no pains in coming to the conclusions which they embodied in their Report. Having had an opportunity of reflecting on those conclusions, he saw no reason for differing from them. The matter was one of great difficulty, and required careful consideration before any practical conclusion could be arrived at. It had been said that, for the sake of the morals, health, and cleanliness of the people, the Government should at once bring in a measure to carry out the object desired; but the question was, how were they to meet the difficulties with which the question was beset? That was the point on which information was wanted. It had been suggested that the Water Companies should be purchased; but the question that had to be settled was, how were those Companies to be purchased? With a view to these undertakings being bought up, it would be necessary to create a body having the confidence of the ratepayers, because the rates would have to be charged for the cost of such a purchase. The difficulty of the question would, doubtless, be admitted by the noble Lord opposite (Lord Aberdare), who, though he was Home Secretary after the Report of the Commission was made, shrank from taking any large step for the creation of a body to provide water for the whole of the Metropolis.

LORD ABERDARE explained that he introduced a Bill, but it was found to be impossible to carry it in the Session.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND AND GORDON said, it was true that the noble Lord did bring in a Bill which proposed to place the matter in the hands of the Metropolitan Board; but he found the mode in which he proposed to deal with the question was not practicable, and the subject so difficult, that he did not attempt to deal with it in any future Session on a scale large enough to meet the requirements of the case. With regard to the police, consisting of City police and Metropolitan police, were these bodies to be united for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of the water supply? Again, how could they form the City of London and other parts of the Metropolis into one body, in order to buy up all the Water Companies? These were some of the difficult questions which had to be considered. One of the reasons which induced him to dissent from the proposals of the gentlemen whose schemes were laid before the Commission to which he had referred, was that he did not think it advisable to supply London from one source only. This matter had engaged the constant attention of the Home Secretary (Mr. Assheton Cross), who, regarding it as one of immense importance, would be the first to do something, if he saw his way, to introduce a satisfactory measure, giving an efficient supply of water. The steps which his right hon. Friend had taken in dealing with the Artizans' Dwellings, and other questions of that kind, at all events showed that he was keenly alive to the wants of the poorer classes. It was because his right hon. Friend saw the enormous difficulties which surrounded the question that he did not feel able to bring in a satisfactory measure; but, at the same time, it was a question which was now under his consideration.

THE EARL OF CAMPERDOWN said, the inhabitants of the Metropolis would derive but small consolation from what had been said on behalf of the Government, and more water had been poured down the back of the noble Earl (Earl Granville) than he could get at his house when he wanted it. He (the Earl of Camperdown) admitted that the question was not an easy one to deal with; but Governments had solved greater difficulties than the purchase of the undertakings of a few Water Companies. It was quite as difficult to acquire the Telegraph Companies; but that was successfully achieved. Everyone would admit that this was not a Party question, and that the common object was to get as good, efficient, and cheap water supply as possible for the Metropolis. Of course, it would be necessary to have a central authority which would command the confidence of the ratepayers, and surely the Home

Secretary was quite competent to create such an authority. Whatever Board of Management might be elected, it would certainly not possess the confidence of the ratepayers in a less degree than did the present Water Companies. The property of the Companies could, of course, only be acquired by means of a compulsory Act. Any voluntary arrangement that might be proposed by the district Boards of the Metropolis would have no effect but to enhance the value of the Companies' shares. There were many reasons why the water supply of the Metropolis should be in the hands of a single body; but it would probably suffice to mention two. These were, first, that the present supply of water was inadequate, and that it would be necessary to supplement it at no distant time—a duty which they would surely never intrust to the present Companies; and, second, that the Companies seemed to have the power of doubling or trebling their rates without conferring any corresponding benefit upon the ratepayers. Four or five years ago, when the present Metropolitan Valuation Act was coming into force, he foresaw that the Companies might raise their charges in consequence of it; but the noble Duke opposite (the Duke of Richmond and Gordon) said it was not the intention of the Government to confer upon them any additional rating powers. Nevertheless, legally or illegally, the Companies did raise their charges on that occasion all over the Metropolis, without the slightest benefit resulting to the consumers; and he had received hundreds of letters asking him to do his best to prevent the recurrence of such an anomaly, which Parliament could never have intended to allow. As the present Motion could lead to nothing, he reserved to himself the right of proposing a Resolution on this subject on some future day.

Motion agreed to.

PARLIAMENT—STANDING ORDERS

NOS. 95 AND 96.—OBSERVATIONS.

LORD WAVENEY, who had upon the Paper a Notice of Motion—

"To call attention to the Standing Orders of the House of Lords, and to move Amendments in Nos. 95 and 96," rose for the purpose of addressing the House, when—

The Duke of Richmond and Gordon

THE EARL OF CAMPERDOWN rose to a point of Order. Their Lordships would remember that the other night a discussion took place with reference to the powers, and the exercise of the powers, of the noble Earl the Chairman of Committees (the Earl of Redesdale), and before the Motion of the noble Lord (Lord Waveney) was proceeded with, he (the Earl of Camperdown) desired to know whether it was the intention of the Mover to make some change in the position of Chairman of Committees? If so, would it not be more convenient, and more in accordance with the practice of their Lordships' House, for the proposed Amendments to be laid on the Table? He thought that the noble Lord (Lord Waveney) was out of Order in bringing forward a Notice so worded as the one which he had placed upon the Paper.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, it would be more convenient, and certainly more in accordance with the present practice observed in that House, for the noble Lord (Lord Waveney) to have given Notice of what the Amendments were which he intended to propose. As it was, the words placed upon the Paper by the noble Lord afforded no indication of the nature of those Amendments; and therefore the House, in accordance with its practice, would have to abstain from discussing a subject of which no Notice had been given.

LORD WAVENEY said, that, under these circumstances, he would merely call attention to the subject to which his Motion referred. He would like to know, however, whether it was the practice of their Lordships' House to impose silence on a Member when rising to call attention to inconveniences which arose from non-observance of Standing Orders?

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND AND GORDON said, that a discussion which could have no practical effect would be unsatisfactory. If the noble Lord intended to propose a remedy for any present inconveniences, it would be well for him to bring forward a Notice of Motion indicating the nature of the proposed remedies. If that were done, there would be one instead of two discussions on the subject. The noble Lord would certainly not be in Order in going into the second part of his Motion without first informing the House, so as to give noble Lords time to consider the question what his Amendments were to be.

LORD WAVENEY said, he felt bound at least to call attention to the subject. The Standing Orders of the House of Lords had produced a result which could not be viewed with satisfaction, producing, as it did, a very great deal of distrust in the public mind in the management of the Public Business of the House by the Chairman of Committees (the Earl of Redesdale). He (Lord Waveney) was not one of those who adopted opinions put forward by irresponsible writers in the newspapers, though he was glad to get information from all sources, and he had made the subject-matter of his Motion a matter of discussion by men competent to form opinions on it. He cheerfully acknowledged the great services which the noble Earl had rendered; but there was abundance of evidence to prove that the Standing Orders, by authorizing certain action on the part of the noble Earl, had done a good deal towards creating inconvenience and discontent. He thought that Standing Orders should be clear and distinct, and in agreement with themselves; but he found that they were not clear and distinct, and that the Standing Orders of the two branches of the Legislature were not in harmony. In this Chamber it was the practice of the Chairman of Committees to act in certain cases as the noble Earl had acted, and convert an unopposed into an opposed Bill, without first referring the matter to a Select Committee, as was the practice in the other branch of the Legislature. The Chairman of Committees in their Lordships' House, therefore, in certain cases, by the exercise of his power of reception, became the sole judge and arbiter of a Bill which he ordered to be transferred from the unopposed to the opposed class. It was not the noble Earl who was in fault for this state of things; it was the Standing Order in the first place, and their Lordships in the second, who had allowed the practice to go on uninterruptedly. The Standing Orders of the two branches of the Legislature were not harmonious, as he had shown; for in the lower House, under similar circumstances, although the Chairman of Committees might transfer a Bill, his rejection of it would not be conclusive until it had been referred to a Select Committee. Since the decision of their Lordships was pronounced a short time ago upon a Railway Bill, which decision was supported with some doubt by Her Majesty's Prime Minister, and supported on the Opposition side, no doubt, by the noble Earl whom they were all proud to acknowledge as Leader (Earl Granville)—since that decision he had been in Ireland, and in that particular part where the difficulty, in consequence of their Lordships' action, had been felt. What had he learned there? He had heard very strong objections raised to that mode of dealing with the Business which was principally affected on that occasion, and very much intensified the desire, which was widely felt, for what was called Home Rule. Even in Ulster, where order, peace, and regularity were prized above all things, he had heard it said, by men of mark and position, that if any one thing more than another could create such a feeling, it was the course which had been taken by their Lordships on that occasion. He considered it his duty to make these remarks; but for the present he should leave the Standing Orders to themselves, with the intention, however, next Session, of proposing some Amendment in them.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, as this matter concerned the office of his noble Friend the Chairman of Committees (the Earl of Redesdale), it might be more convenient that he should make a few observations. He had taken the liberty of pointing out to the noble Lord (Lord Waveney) that he had not, as a matter of form, given any Notice of any alteration which he proposed to make in the Standing Orders, and that it would be more convenient to follow up any observations he might have to make by some specific proposition, pointing out the alterations he proposed to effect in the Standing Orders. He must, however, observe that the noble Lord was not only irregular in not giving Notice of what his Amendments were to be, but he was irregular in calling attention to the Standing Orders without some specific Notice to the House. No doubt their Lordships were in the habit of extending their indulgence to noble Lords in calling attention to a subject without some specific Motion; but that was by indulgence, and contrary to the Standing Orders which the noble Lord had invoked. Having said so much, he wished to add a very few words as to the view which the noble Lord had taken on this subject. He said he would be prepared at a future period to propose an Amendment in the Standing Orders; but he (the Lord Chancellor) hoped, before doing so, he would take care to make himself better acquainted with the course and character of the procedure of the House. He (the Lord Chancellor) could not be suspected of speaking of the decision in a particular case, for it would be recollected that he had disagreed with his noble Friend with regard to the decision on that particular Bill. But, speaking of the practice of the House, it was not correct to say that they referred unopposed Bills to the arbitrium of his noble Friend at the Table. The noble Lord was under an entire misapprehension on that point. There was no such practice. What was done occurred every day. An unopposed Bill was "committed to the consideration of the Chairman of Committees and such Lords as think fit to attend." That was the practice of the House. The noble Lord himself was at perfect liberty to attend any Committee on any unopposed Bill; and if he could procure the attendance of any other Peer he might outvote the Chairman of Committees. The House, no doubt, left the decision on unopposed Bills very much to his noble Friend, because they felt it could not be in better hands; but if any noble Lord took a different view, he might get a friend to attend the Committee and overthrow his decision. The noble Lord said the Standing Orders in their Lordships' House were entirely different in regard to unopposed Bills from those of the other House of Parliament. That was not so. The Standing Orders said—

"The Chairman of Committees may, if he think fit, report to the House his opinion that any unopposed Bill on which he shall sit as Chairman shall be proceeded with as an opposed Bill."

No doubt he had that option, and the noble Lord complained that it was optional; did he wish that the Chairman should so report if he did not think fit? It was in the option of the Chairman of Committees to report that it should be proceeded with as an opposed Bill, and then, of course, it would be referred to a Committee of five. In the other House the Standing Order was precisely similar, substituting only the Chairman of Ways and Means for the Chairman of Committees; and if the noble Lord proposed any Amendment in the Standing Orders of their Lordships' House in that respect, he would only introduce confusion where harmony at present prevailed. He was glad of the opportunity of correcting the misapprehension of the noble Lord that there was some Standing Order in that House which, contrary to the whole practice of Parliament, gave an absolute control and decision on any unopposed Bill to his noble Friend at the Table. The Rule of the House in regard to unopposed Bills was this—the Chairman of Committees was Chairman of the Committee, but the Committee might consist of as many Lords as chose to attend.

Lord Waveney

LORD WAVENEY made some remark which was inaudible.

THE EARL OF REDESDALE: The noble Lord does not appear to know what an unopposed Bill is.

STATUTE LAW REVISION (IRELAND) BILL—(No. 80.)

(The Lord Chancellor.)

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR, in moving that the Bill be now read the second time, said, that if passed it would bring the revision of the Irish Statutes down to the time of the Union.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^a."
—(The Lord Chancellor.)

Motion agreed to; Bill read 2^a (according to Order), and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Monday next.

House adjourned at Eight o'clock, to Monday next, half past Ten o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Friday, 23rd May, 1879.

MINUTES.]—SELECT COMMITTEE—Report—Parliamentary Reporting [No. 203].

PRIVATE BILLS (by Order)—Third Reading—*South London Tramways; Thames River (Prevention of Floods), and passed.

PUBLIC BILLS—Resolution in Committee—East India (Loan).

Resolution [May 22] reported—*Great Seal [Salary].

Ordered—First Reading—*Barristers (Ireland) [194]; *Registration of Parliamentary Voters (Ireland) [195].

Second Reading—*Local Government (Ireland) Provisional Orders Confirmation (Cashel, &c.) [141]; *Local Government (Ireland) Provisional Order Confirmation (Downpatrick) [140]; Common Law Procedure and Judicature Acts Amendment [181].

Committee—Report—Costs Taxation (House of Commons) [190].

Third Reading—*Summary Jurisdiction [169]; *Local Government (Poor Law) Provisional Orders [155]; *Local Government Provisional Orders (Axminster Union, &c.) [154]; *Local Government (Highways) Provisional Orders (Buckingham, &c.) [161]; *Trustee Acts Consolidation and Amendment [106], and passed.

PRIVATE BUSINESS.

THAMES RIVER (PREVENTION OF FLOODS) BILL.

THIRD READING.

Order for Third Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
"That the Bill be now read a third time."—(Sir James M'Garel-Hogg.)

COLONEL BERESFORD said, he wished to make a few remarks before the Bill passed, in order to point out the unjust mode in which many persons would be affected by the measure. He believed there was not an instance in the records of the Statutes passed by the House of the riparian owners being saddled with the expense of works necessary to prevent floods. Even the Bill just introduced by the Government—the Rivers Conservancy Bill—went upon the old lines; but the Metropolitan Board of Works, in the present Bill, desired to take that part of the Thames which passed through the Metropolis out of the hands of the Conservancy Board. For his own part, he failed to see why the Committee upon this Bill should have reported in favour of the riparian owners, being differently dealt with under this Bill from riparian owners in other localities. They must have known then that in the Metropolis the riparian owners were already mulcted in very large general rates. As a riparian owner himself, he contributed largely towards the funds of the Metropolitan Board of Works, and he thought it unfair that he should be saddled with additional expense by the present Bill. He wished to remind the House that in 1877 a Committee sat on a Bill similar to the present, and by a decided majority—he believed by 4 to 2—they threw out the measure. Last year the hon. and gallant Member the Chairman of the Metropolitan Board of Works (Sir James M'Garel-Hogg) made several efforts to bring in a Bill. He failed; and now what was it that he did?

MR. SPEAKER wished to point out to the hon. and gallant Member that if he had any opposition to offer to the Bill the Motion for the third reading must be deferred.

COLONEL BERESFORD said, it would be useless for him to oppose the third reading, and he was not going to do so; but he wished simply to explain to the House the reasons which had induced him to resist its progress. He was of opinion that it involved unjust legislation, and he looked upon it as having been introduced by an irresponsible Board.

Motion agreed to.

(Prince of Wales's Consent, as Duke of Cornwall, signified.)

Bill read the third time, and passed.

QUESTIONS.

PUBLIC HEALTH (IRELAND) ACT— LOANS FOR PAVING WORKS IN DUBLIN.—QUESTION.

MR. M. BROOKS asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland, Whether he is aware that in reference to an application for a loan, under the Public Health Act, for paving works, the Local Government Board for Ireland have informed the Corporation of Dublin that, in the opinion of their law adviser, the Public Health (Ireland) Act does not empower the Board to recommend such loans, and that the Solicitor General has advised the Corporation to the like effect; whether such loans are not commonly granted to urban authorities in England under the Public Health Act (England); and, whether he will include in the Public Health (Ireland) Act Amendment Bill, now before Parliament, clauses to remove the disability under which sanitary authorities in Ireland suffer, and afford to them advantages equal to those prevailing in England?

MR. J. LOWTHER: Sir, with reference to the latter part of the Question, I see no occasion for referring this short measure—the Public Health (Ireland) Act Amendment Bill—to a Select Committee. It deals only with a very small branch of the question, and is to repair certain omissions in the general Act. I will, however, make further application to the Treasury, with whom the question properly rests, with a view to ascertain whether there is any objection to extending the particular provisions referred to in the English Act to Ireland.

ARMY—THE WARRANT OF AUGUST 13, 1877—SUPERSESSION OF GENERAL OFFICERS.—QUESTION.

COLONEL NORTH asked the Under Secretary of State for India, Whether it is not under consideration to rectify the Warrant of 13th of August 1877, by which certain British General Officers were superseded by Staff Corps Officers; and, if he can state when this Warrant will be amended and the relative position of those officers adjusted?

MR. E. STANHOPE: Sir, the question of rectifying the Warrant referred to by the hon. and gallant Gentleman is still under the consideration of the Secretary of State for India in Council. No time shall be lost in the matter; but it is impossible at present to say when a decision may be arrived at.

THE PATRIOTIC FUND—POWERS OF COMMISSIONERS.—QUESTION.

MR. J. R. YORKE asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether the Patriotic Fund Commissioners have applied, since 1867, for any enlargement of their powers, in order to enable them to assist, out of any funds that may be placed at their disposal, the widows as well as the orphans of soldiers or sailors who may die in the service of their Country; and, if not, whether the Government propose to take any action in that direction?

COLONEL STANLEY: Sir, there have been some communications between the Commissioners of the Patriotic Fund and the Government with regard to this matter, but they are at present of an informal nature, and are still under consideration, and I am not yet able, therefore, to say what action the Government will take.

Colonel Beresford

MINE INSPECTORS' REPORTS.

QUESTION.

MR. MACDONALD asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, When the Reports of the Inspectors of Mines are likely to be printed and placed in the hands of Members?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS, in reply, said, they ought to be on the Table either that night or on Monday.

ROYAL COMMISSION ON ACCIDENTS IN MINES—EXCLUSION OF THE PRESS AND CONSTITUTION OF THE COMMISSION.—QUESTIONS.

MR. MACDONALD asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, If it be correct that the Royal Commission appointed to inquire into the cause of accidents in mines and their prevention, is holding its sittings with closed doors, or at least the representatives of the press have been excluded?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS: Sir, I have received a letter from the Secretary of the Royal Commission appointed to inquire into the cause of accidents in mines and their prevention, stating that, in accordance with what they understood to be the practice, the Commissioners had not allowed representatives of the Press to be present at their sittings. They have, however, gladly acceded to the request of the Miners' National Union and the Miners' Association of Great Britain that representatives of those respective bodies should attend the meeting.

MR. MACDONALD asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, If it be correct, as stated in the "Standard" a few days ago, that representations had been made on behalf of the miners that they desired other persons appointed from important mining districts, who would more fully express and understand the wants of the mining population, considering that the demand for an inquiry had been chiefly urged by the workmen, and that a wish has been expressed that a number equal to that of the employers might be appointed on the Commission; and, whether it is the intention of the Government to give effect to the representations that have been made to them on the subject?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS: Sir, it is true that an application has been made, and I am glad of the opportunity of explaining that the application was made under a mistake. This is not an inquiry granted on account of anything which the workmen have asked for in connection with the operation of the Mines Regulation Act. It is an inquiry instituted entirely through communications which have taken place between the Royal Society and myself upon questions of science; and as to whether what has been found out scientifically might not be applied practically for the purpose of lessening loss of life in mines. It is a purely scientific investigation for a purely scientific object, and has nothing whatever to do with the working of the Mines Regulation Act. At first, I was anxious that the Royal Society should take up the inquiry entirely by themselves, and it was at their request alone that I added certain names, because they wanted men of more practical habits to join them in the inquiry; therefore, four of each were taken to form the Commission. The noble Lord the Member for Wigan (Lord Lindsay) was added afterwards, not as having relations with coal miners, but as one of the Vice Presidents of the Royal Society. If the miners will remember that these gentlemen are strictly confined by the Order of Reference to the application of scientific knowledge to the saving of human life, I am sure they will be satisfied that they have made their application under a mistake.

MR. MACDONALD asked, Whether it was not a fact, within the right hon. Gentleman's knowledge, that Inspectors had been examined on the working of the Mines Regulation Act as regarded the labour of children and other matters?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS: Sir, I have information that that is the opinion of workmen connected with the mines. The examination of Inspectors was, of course, a necessary thing, and the Commission could never come to a proper conclusion without it; but the Secretary and the Chairman have assured me that any questions which may have been put relating to what has taken place in mines were purely incidental to the main object of the inquiry—namely, the application of scientific knowledge to the saving of human life.

SOUTH AFRICA—THE ZULU WAR—
LORD CHELMSFORD'S DESPATCHES.

QUESTION.

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON asked the Secretary of State for War, When he proposes to lay upon the Table of the House, Copies of Lord Chelmsford's Despatches of the 8th, 12th, 14th, and 23rd of February, the 2nd, 20th, and 25th of March, and of the 5th (from Colonel Bellairs), 10th, and 14th April 1879; and, whether, in future, by laying upon the Table of the House on the day they are published, pro forma, Copies of the "London Gazette" containing Despatches from the seat of war, he could arrange that Members might receive such supplements on the following morning as a Parliamentary paper delivered from the Vote Office?

COLONEL STANLEY: Sir, the despatches referred to have all received the widest possible circulation through the morning papers on the morning following their publication in The Gazette, but they can be included in Correspondence about to be given. With regard to laying upon the Table of the House, pro forma, copies of The Gazette on the day on which they are published, the objections would appear to be—1, that we should incur extra cost, amounting to £10 to £20 each issue; 2, that we should add little or nothing to the publication of the news; 3, that either the same Papers would have to be printed twice over under different Parliamentary numbers, or else gaps would have to be left in Blue Books which would, otherwise, contain a complete and connected narrative. I have, therefore, come to the conclusion that, unless there is a more general feeling than I am at present aware in favour of such a proposal, it would be unnecessary to alter the existing practice.

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON said, it was only by the despatches being laid on the Table that Parliament could have any official knowledge of them.

IRISH PRISONS BOARD—INFIRMARY SURGEONS.—QUESTION.

MR. ERRINGTON asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland, Whether he is as yet in a position to state what course he intends to pursue with regard to the Circular lately issued by the Irish Prisons Board, dismissing the infirmary surgeons from their positions as prison surgeons?

MR. J. LOWTHER: Sir, as I said the other night, the Circular referred to was not intended to indicate that it is the intention of the Government to remove the surgeons with a view to appointing fresh persons in their places. It was issued merely with the object of making fresh appointments, and the intention certainly was to appoint to the new offices those who held the former ones. As, however, some difficulties of a legal character were found to exist, the matter has been referred to the Law Officers.

"GENERAL STATISTICAL ABSTRACT"— FOREIGN TARIFFS ON BRITISH PRO-DUCE.—QUESTIONS.

MR. W. E. FORSTER asked the President of the Board of Trade, When the Return showing the Foreign Tariffs on British Goods in 1860 as compared with the present year, which was presented some time ago, will be printed and delivered to Members?

VISCOUNT SANDON: Sir, the right hon. Gentleman is under a slight misapprehension, for the Return was only presented on Tuesday last, it having turned out to be a very laborious business. I have given directions with respect to its being printed as quickly as possible, and I hope it will be in the hands of hon. Members at the beginning of next week.

MR. JOHN BRIGHT: Might I ask the noble Lord, whether it will be possible to produce, at the same time, a similar Return with reference to the Colonies?

VISCOUNT SANDON: I shall be happy to make inquiries, so as, if possible, to secure the wish of the right hon. Gentleman being complied with. It might, however, delay the presentation of the other Paper.

MR. W. E. FORSTER: Although the Return was only formally presented a short time ago, it has been practically ready for weeks, and it would be a pity that we should have to wait longer—

VISCOUNT SANDON: Then I will endeavour to give a subsidiary Return.

SOUTH AFRICA—THE ZULU WAR—RE-INFORCEMENTS FROM INDIA.

QUESTION.

MR. RYLANDS asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether it is true that an application has been made to the Indian Government for re-inforcements to be sent to South Africa, and that the application has been declined in consequence of the Government of India having expressed a desire to retain the extra forces which were detained in India on the outbreak of the Afghan War?

COLONEL STANLEY: I am not aware, Sir, of anything which can give the slightest foundation for the report.

PARLIAMENT—BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.—QUESTIONS.

MR. MONK asked, Whether it was proposed to ask for a Vote on Account for the Civil Service Estimates before Whitsuntide?

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON, in reply, said, he was very sorry that he would be obliged to ask for another Vote on Account, but he could assure hon. Members that he disliked having to do so as much as they did. Votes would be taken for one month, with the exception of two or three instances, in which Votes for two months would be asked for.

MR. NEWDEGATE wished to know what Business it was intended to take on Monday?

MR. DILLWYN also asked at what time on Tuesday it was proposed to make the Motion for the adjournment of the House for the Recess?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Sir, we propose on Monday to take in Supply Classes 3 and 6 of the Revenue Votes; and also the Vote on Account to which my hon. Friend has just referred. As for the holidays, we propose to move the adjournment of the House at a Morning Sitting on Tuesday.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

SUPPLY—COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

THE BRITISH INDIAN ASSOCIATION.
RESOLUTION.

MR. O'DONNELL, in rising to call attention to the reply of the Governor General of India to a deputation of the British Indian Association, which petitioned against the financial measures of the Government, and to the treatment of the Vernacular Press; also to the Vernacular Press of India, as instanced in the case of the Native journal, the "Shome Prokash," for adverse comments upon the Government policy in Afghanistan; and to move—

"That this House regrets that Lord Lytton and his advisers have shown such unwise disrespect for the sentiments of a vast population, which is at the same time deprived of all constitutional representation, and subject to a harsh and grinding taxation of the most oppressive kind," said, that as the concluding clause of his Amendment implied a censure upon the Government, and as they had engaged to reduce their Expenditure in India, he would withdraw that portion of it. India, as hon. Members were aware, had not the advantage of Constitutional representation, and the Viceroy ought, therefore, to be doubly careful so to answer deputations as not to discourage them from laying their complaints at the foot of the Throne. Now, the Association he had mentioned included the most respectable members of the mercantile community of Bengal, many of the largest landowners, and the most prominent Native members of the Indian Bar. Its distinguished loyalty had been commended by successive Governors General. Yet, he was sorry to say, the reply of Lord Lytton to the Memorial of that respectable Association conveyed censure in the most biting terms, and on more than one point seemed to impugn the veracity of the deputation. The Memorial was a protest against the financial measures of the Government with regard to Afghanistan and the diminution of the cotton duties; and the Viceroy, in reply, made many injurious reflections on the personal character and status of the members of the deputation, even reminding those of them who were rich that they owed their wealth to the action of the Government. The Viceroy was acting entirely on his own initiative, and by his own power without any active support from his Council. He told the deputation their statements were in notorious opposition to the facts. When they pointed to the heavy distress and recent severe Famines, as an argument in support of their protest, the Viceroy appeared most injudiciously to imagine this reference was intended as an attack upon the Indian Government. The language in which he rebuked the deputation was most unbecoming in a Viceroy. Sneer after sneer, and offence after offence, were showered upon the heads of the deputation. Another portion of his Resolution referred to the interference with the Native Press of India. He referred to what he called the hostility with which the present Administration of India regarded the expression of opinion amongst the Natives of India. On the 18th of March there appeared in the official media of India a notice that the printer and publisher of a leading Native paper had been ordered to enter into a joint and special bond in the sum of 1,000 rupees for having published on the 24th of February a letter containing remarks and suggestions which were likely to excite disaffection to the Government and antipathy to the English race. On referring to the letter he found that it was no more than a criticism—from the point of view of a hostile critic, doubtless—on the Government neglect of Indian feeling, and what, in the view of the writer, were the drawbacks of the Government policy in Afghanistan. Hardly were the printer and publisher of the paper published in the Vernacular ordered to enter into these penal bonds than the Deccan Star, another Native journal, but printed in English, published a translation of this identical letter without incurring any penalty. The pettiness, the absurdity, the mischievousness, the foolish, hysterical, petty tyranny of a Government could hardly further go. If the Indian Government persisted in this course of conduct, they would establish an oppressive and grinding tyranny equal to anything that existed in Russia. The distinctions drawn between Native newspapers printed in the Vernacular and papers printed in English were not only offensive in themselves, but tended to impress the Indian people with the notion that, as subjects of the Queen, they were denied the rights which were enjoyed by Englishmen, Scotchmen, and Irishmen residing in the same country. The hon. Gentleman concluded by moving the Resolution of which he had given Notice.

Mr. O'Donnell

SIR DAVID WEDDERBURN, in seconding the Motion, observed, that it was difficult to exaggerate the painful impression which had been produced in India by the answer of the Governor General to the deputation of the British Indian Association. The Motion had his entire sympathy; and if the hon. Member pressed it to a division, he should have his support.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "this House regrets that Lord Lytton and his advisers have shown such unwise disrespect for the sentiments of a vast population, which is at the same time deprived of all constitutional representation, and subject to a harsh and grinding taxation of the most oppressive kind."—(Mr. O'Donnell.)

—instead thereof.

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

MR. E. STANHOPE said, he thought the House would regret that the hon. Member for Dungarvan (Mr. O'Donnell) had felt it his duty to interpose in the middle of a very important debate on the finances of India the discussion of a question which, although it might be important, might, at any rate, have been deferred to a later day. The hon. Gentleman, at a single day's Notice, and when hon. Members had not any official Papers before them to enable them to come to a proper conclusion on the subject, had moved a Vote of Censure on the Governor General of India. It was, therefore, his duty to the Governor General that he should say a few words in explanation. He might, however, state that he had no official information on the two points to which the hon. Member had referred, and only knew what he had been able to discover regarding them from the newspapers. With respect to the answer given by Lord Lytton to the deputation from the British Indian Association, which presented a Memorial to him, any hon. Member who chose to refer to the newspapers could read that Memorial and form an opinion upon it himself; and he thought that anyone who read impartially the account given of the proceedings on that occasion would admit that the Memorial was not only full of grave misrepresentations, but also of imputations against the motives of the Government of India. The Viceroy, addressing the deputation in those circumstances, said—

"You have attributed to the Government of India views which it has publicly repudiated; you have imputed to the Parliament of England and the Ministers of the Crown satisfied acquiescence in a state of things which they have distinctly condemned; and you have ignored the duty, at all times incumbent on Her Majesty's Indian Administration, to act in honest accordance with the principles laid down for the guidance of its action by the authority from which its own is derived. As the Representative of the Sovereign of India, I regret that such language should have been held to me by the representatives of some of Her Majesty's most favoured Indian subjects; and as the responsible guardian of the general interests of the people of India, I notice with disappointment and surprise that you, who represent to some extent the wealthiest class in India, while deprecating forms of taxation such as the Bengal Land Cesses, which fall mainly on your own class, have not shrunk from advocating and urging on my adoption other forms of taxation which fall almost exclusively on the great body of the poor."

That was a perfectly accurate and just statement of what had been put before Lord Lytton. With regard to the Vernacular Press, he did not understand the hon. Member for Dungarvan to deny that what the Government of India had done was entirely legal. The hon. Member seemed rather to condemn the policy of the Vernacular Press Act. That was a question on which there was considerable discussion in the House last year. The Act was now in force, and under it proceedings were taken against the newspaper to which the hon. Member had alluded. The hon. Member had omitted, in giving his quotations from the article which appeared in that newspaper, the most offensive passage, and the one which brought it under the operation of the Statute. He would not lend notoriety to the passage in question by reading it to the House; but anybody who fairly took the article as a whole would acknowledge that the Indian Government were perfectly justified in the action they had taken in the matter. The hon. Member suggested that the Act had been used to suppress fair criticism upon the Government, but that notion could not for an instant be supported. Speaking in reference to the Act at a meeting of the Indian Legislative Council on the 16th of October last, Sir Alexander Arbuthnot said—

"The Act has so far justified, and, indeed, has more than justified, the hope which I ventured to express when it was passed, that the mere existence of this law would in a great measure suffice to suppress the mischief against which it is aimed, and that the actual enforcement of its provisions would be a thing of very rare occurrence. As a matter of fact, seditious and disloyal writing—writing calculated to inflame the minds of the masses and to bring the Government into contempt—has been entirely stopped. At the same time, there has been no interference with the legitimate expression of opinion. The liberty of the Press has not been in any way restricted."

The only case in which the Act had been put in force was that to which the hon. Member referred. He had made these remarks solely in justice to the Viceroy, who had been attacked at a moment's notice, and he hoped that the House would now pass to the important Business which stood before it.

MR. O'DONNELL wished to remind the House that the subject-matter of his Motion was a month ago placed on the Paper antecedent the Motion for going into Committee of Supply, and to explain that he had more recently changed its position, as a matter of convenience, from Committee of Supply generally to Committee of Supply on a subject to which the Resolution was germane.

Question put.

The House divided:—Ayes 215; Noes 36: Majority 179.—(Div. List, No. 109.)

Main Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

THE NETTERVILLE TRUST PROPERTY —THE LOUTH INSTITUTION.

OBSERVATIONS.

MR. KIRK, in rising to call attention to the way in which the Netterville Trust property had been managed for the last 18 years by the Trustees, especially with regard to the Louth Institution, said, his object was to secure an inquiry into the subject. The late Lord Netterville, by his will, left some fee-simple property and a large funded property for a particular purpose, and the executors proved the will in 1832, one of the things inserted in it being that there should be a school established; and a subsequent codicil showed that Lord Netterville was most anxious that this school should be established. The property which was bequeathed to the Louth Institution consisted of 52 acres of fee-simple land, and some £10,000 or £12,000 of funded property. The Trustees thought that, in order to get the school thoroughly established, they could not do better than incorporate it with the National system, as far as week-days were concerned, and a Sunday-school was also to be established. The school was carried out to the satisfaction of the people in the surrounding district from 1836, when it became one of the National Board, to the year 1866, when Mr. Gradwell became an acting Trustee for the property. He lived on the spot, and it was thought he would be better able to carry out the bequests of the trust than other persons could. Well, they found Mr. Gradwell, a very short time after he was named as an active Trustee, in connection with the other Trustees, bringing forward a scheme before the Master of the Rolls in Ireland to sell a portion of the trust property, which, according to the will and codicil of Lord Netterville, was to remain for ever unsold, in order to benefit the widows and orphans. The scheme having been put before the Court, an order was granted in 1864 to carry out everything in the scheme, and a portion of land was to be sold, in direct opposition to the will of Lord Netterville. The order also gave power to the Trustees to grant leases to the tenants for 31 years; but the Trustees did not inform the occupiers of the land that these leases could be granted, and they were thoroughly in ignorance of this provision in the order; but Mr. Gradwell availed himself of the opportunity of selling to himself this trust land. He (Mr. Kirk) had a thorough knowledge of this land, because he had walked over it and seen what it was. The scheme put before the Court was a fair one to look at, saying that 30 years' purchase was to be paid for the land, and no doubt that was a long period; but when they considered that the land was inside Mr. Gradwell's own demesne, he might well have been willing to give 100 years' purchase in order to get possession of it. He bought 12 acres, for which he paid £1 an acre, which, at 30 years' purchase, amounted to £360. The land was covered with large trees, and it could be proved that Mr. Gradwell had already cut down more trees than would pay the purchase money, and there were as many trees still standing as would pay the purchase money over again. He, therefore, thought the object of the trust had been grossly violated, and three times the money would have been obtained if the land had been sold to anybody else. Then, in this section, there were two or three other provisions. One was, that the school-house was to be turned into a chapel, Mr. Gradwell thinking that it was necessary for the inmates of the institution to have a chapel. But there was this fact to be borne in mind. Some time before Mr. Gradwell had had a quarrel with the parish priest, and he refused to go to his church; and as it was very inconvenient for him to go many miles to another church, he was very anxious that he should have a chapel close to his own house. The Bishop at first refused to allow the private chapel; but he subsequently said he would make a compromise, remarking that for a number of years Mr. Gradwell had paid no dues to the priest, but he would allow the chapel provided he consented to pay dues. Mr. Gradwell assented, and the chapel was fitted very comfortably indeed. There was a large fire in it on Sunday, and Mr. Gradwell took the first seat beside the fire for himself and his family. This showed how anxious he was about the inmates of the institution, who were poor widows, and they had to remain in the background. Another portion of the scheme was that a school-house was to be fitted up, and the school removed thereto. After some time, the attention of the public was drawn to the fact of the school not being established, and the Commissioner of Charitable Bequests was written to, and he replied that the order had been given for the establishment of the school. Consequently, Mr. Gradwell had misled the Court of Chancery by stating that the school was established in 1864. When he (Mr. Kirk) examined it, there was no roof nor ceiling, and so it remained until a few years ago, when it was taken down for the erection of a new place. In 1864, Mr. Gradwell purchased for £360 the deer park, which, if the inquiry were granted, would be shown to have been worth six times the amount. Then he was anxious to have another portion of this property—at least, so it was asserted in the newspapers, and by an hon. Member who brought forward the case not very long ago. This being the case, he picked a quarrel with an industrious, hardworking, and independent man; and one of the great things which he brought forward as objectionable with regard to this tenant was, that he had expended too much money on the property. There was also another matter. There was a piece of antiquity which had been disturbed by the Royal Irish Academy. He (Mr. Kirk) regretted that the Bill of the hon. Baronet the Member for Maidstone (Sir John Lubbock) for the protection of ancient monuments was not pushed forward with more vigour, so as to protect such antiquities; and no one would condemn the tenant more than he would for disturbing a single stone of an ancient monument. Well, that antiquity in question—a moat—was disturbed and excavated, and the Trustees permitted it to be done, and did not replace the stones and put pressure on the Royal Irish Academy to put the stones in the same position again. They allowed them to be taken away, for a number of years, from the field where they lay loose around. Mr. Gradwell picked a quarrel with the tenant, on the ground of having taken stones away, and said he would eject him. There had been happy relations in that district between landlords and tenants, and the people were sorry to see that those happy relations could be disturbed by such a miserable quarrel, and they called on a few hon. Members of the House to go down and try to settle it. The hon. Member for Meath (Mr. Parnell) and himself (Mr. Kirk) went down, and were met, in a tenant's house, by the acting Trustee, who seemed to a great extent to come to their views. The tenant was anxious for a lease, and said he would even pay an increase of rent, and the acting Trustee solemnly told them that it was the determination of the Trustees that no lease should be granted; but he had at the time in his pocket a letter from one of the Trustees in favour of the tenants having a lease. They tried to settle the case, and thought they had done so, conditions being drawn up; but the persons who did not comply with those conditions were Mr. Gradwell and the Trustees, who imposed new conditions, and the man was evicted. The tenants had been persecuted for five years, and harassed and mulcted in law costs, and the end of it was that he left his holding on a cold winter's day, with frost and snow on the ground. The tenant put in his claim before the County Court Judge for the county of Meath for compensation, under the Land Act of 1870, for disturbance, and also for the value of the buildings which he had erected. There was not one single stone on another in regard to buildings when he came into possession. The tenant stated that he had expended upon the buildings £1,860. As a set-off to this amount, Mr. Gradwell put forward an item of £150 for deterioration of the property. Mr. Gradwell wanted to compromise the matter on the land being given up to him, and he offered to let the tenant certain property for £15 a-year. He wanted to deduct for the deterioration of the property by the buildings, and, on the other side, to let certain property at £15 a-year for the expenditure of the tenant. By the will of the late Lord Netterville, it was clearly laid down that there was to be a Sunday school in the old castle, and the Gothic room was to be laid out specially for the children of the neighbourhood. A school was to be kept up, and a master employed at a certain sum to educate the orphan children, and also the children of the neighbourhood. Mr. Gradwell got rid of the schoolmaster, and of everything in connection with the school, and now he had a matron who was, he said, qualified to teach the orphans and other children. He (Mr. Kirk) had no fault to find with her, as the matron of the establishment; but certainly she was not competent to instruct the children. This also was a violation of the will of Lord Netterville. There was no school at all, and had not been one since 1864. He thought, also, there must be some truth in what he understood was stated by reliable persons in the neighbourhood, as to the neglect of some of the inmates, and therefore he was anxious for the inquiry, which might have the effect of clearing Mr. Gradwell of these charges. When he (Mr. Kirk) visited the institution, in 1876, he found it in a deplorable state. In the dormitory the children were lying literally on rags. A garden had been kept up for the benefit of the inmates, but he found the garden turned into a place for a man to keep a horse in, and a very small piece of ground set apart for the inmates to walk up and down. This, again, was, he thought, a violation of the trust. The people of the district had risen up against the acting Trustee, because they believed he had done a great many injustices, and an inquiry was absolutely necessary. He considered that he had made out a clear case for inquiry into the matter in regard to a good, honest, and hard-working tenant; and if such an inquiry were granted, he believed such a case would be made out as would guarantee the proper working of the institution in the future. The case had been before the country for a long period, and had caused greater excitement and disturbance in Louth and Meath than anything that had occurred for a long time. If the Attorney General for Ireland thought the present was not a proper time for the granting of the inquiry, he would bring forward the matter again.

Mr. Kirk

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL for IRELAND (Mr. GIBSON) thought the course taken by the hon. Member for Louth (Mr. Kirk) was scarcely one that would commend itself to the House on the ground of expediency. The Notice had appeared on the Paper for the first time the day before, and he thought that where such a matter was brought forward Notice should be given in a clear and specific manner, so that the gentleman whose conduct was impugned might have an opportunity of applying to his friends, or any officials he thought proper, and acquaint them with the subject; but it was obvious that the first and only Notice of such a matter, dealing as it did with the administration of a private institution, and impugning the conduct of a certain Trustee, should have been given previously to the day before that on which it was brought on; and he had himself, in a private conversation, intimated to the hon. Member the inconvenience which would result from bringing such a subject before the House without specific Notice being given to the parties principally interested. Another inconvenience of such a course was that the matter was practically under adjudication in Ireland at the present time. He was aware that the hon. Member for Louth was accurate in saying that the exact point which he had brought forward was not sub judice; but, practically, it was so, for the matter connected with the charity were indirectly involved in the case, which was tried before the County Court Judge on the 7th or 8th of the present month, and, after a hearing, was adjourned till the 4th of July. Was there, he asked, any reason why resort should be made to that House as a final Court to hear all the abuses which might be connected with the case? Had any case been made out by the hon. Member? He himself (the Attorney General for Ireland) knew nothing of the case except what he had read in the newspapers; and it appeared that the case referred entirely to the Netterville Trust property, which was private charity, and the ordinary Courts of the country were fully open, and had been open since the constitution of the charity, to anyone who thought there was a grievance; and there was nothing at all to prevent any person taking the case to the Court to have it decided, and if there was anything against any of the gentlemen connected with the affair—if any of them had violated the trust—redress could be had before the ordinary tribunals of the country. But that was not the sole resource open to them. There was a body in Ireland called the Board of Charitable Donations and Bequests, which attended very closely and jealously to all complaints made against charitable estates, and, if necessary, directed the attention of the Attorney General to the subject. It was obvious that what the hon. Member had referred to were matters of detail, possibly important details. He had referred over and over again to the circumstances that the will of the late Lord Netterville had been violated, and had referred to certain provisions; but, surely, these were matters which should be taken to the Law Courts, and not brought to the House of Commons. He held that it was to the last extent inconvenient, unless in a case of supreme necessity, that such cases should be brought before the House of Commons before they had been submitted to the ordinary tribunals of the country. He noticed that a document was read by the hon. Member, the appearance of which was very much like a brief; and he would have thought that that might have suggested to the hon. Member that it would have been far more proper to have addressed his arguments to the ordinary Courts of the country than to the House of Commons. The hon. Member had expressed the hope that the Attorney General would look into the matter; but his Motion was really to bring the whole of the matters connected with the charity and its administration during the last 18 years before the House. As far as he knew, no inquiry had yet been instituted in connection with the general case, nor had any application been made to the Commissioners of Charitable Donations and Bequests, while he was sure it had not been brought before the notice of the Attorney General in his official capacity in any shape; and, therefore, he did not think it was reasonable to bring the matter before the House. Under these circumstances, he thought the hon. Member would have acted more reasonably had he accepted the suggestions made to him before he rose to address the House.

Mr. Kirk

MR. SULLIVAN said, primâ facie, it seemed inconvenient to bring such a question before the House, and not to take it before the Courts of the country, or to bring it on without giving notice to the parties whose conduct was impugned. But the fact was that it had not been brought forward until the people of the district had, as they thought, exhausted every form of redress known to the law in Ireland. They subscribed money to bring the matter into the Court of Chancery, where it was decided that they had no locus standi. They were put out of court, and had to pay the whole of the expenses of the application. That would show the Attorney General that the House of Commons had not been hastily appealed to in the matter. With regard to the notice to the parties concerned, there was no matter more notorious in that part of Ireland than that the junior Member for Louth had pledged himself on the subject, and it was well known to Mr. Gradwell and all concerned that he came over to carry out that pledge. He knew that Mr. Gradwell and his friends felt that that would lead up to a real and earnest inquiry into the abuses which existed, and were not at all taken by surprise. If it was said that the matter was a purely local and petty one, he contended that no matter was purely trivial which caused such excitement as that had caused in Louth and Meath. The case had been for three or four months the cause of great exasperation and considerable mischief; and he could pledge his word to the House that, from letters which had reached him, the case had caused the most intense alarm and exasperation. Here was a case of a public charity, the conduct of which was gravely impugned. The people in the neighbourhood had exhausted all the forms of law, and, in doing so, had been mulcted in costs in endeavouring to bring it to the light. Surely, in such a case, it was right for the people's Representative to make good the claim of the people, not for punishment, but simply for inquiry. When the eviction took place, the scene that was witnessed was unparalleled for 150 years. From all quarters the farmers sent in their carts to assist in drawing off the wood which was the property of the tenant, and testified their sympathy in other ways; while Colonel Maguire, magistrate of the county, took the, apparently, dying man into his own room, and tended him. The case disturbed the social relations, in two large counties, between landlord and tenant, and between the magistracy and the people, and that in connection with a public charity. He deprecated that there should be a Dotheboys Hall in Louth, while there was a sum of £3,000 accumulating, which should be spent for the benefit of the children concerned. The tenant to whom reference was made was a most respected and upright man; and, in the interests of the people of Ireland generally, he contended that the inquiry asked for should be granted.

MR. SERJEANT SHERLOCK said, the Notice contained a charge against the Trustees of having mismanaged the trust estates for the last 18 years. He was personally acquainted with two out of the three Trustees, and he believed those two gentlemen to be incapable of any act of misconduct or neglect in reference to the property confided to them. He did not say the House was not competent to inquire into such a matter; but it was certainly a novel course to take. The hon. and learned Member for Louth (Mr. Sullivan) said the parties had appealed to the Court of Chancery, and everyone knew that the Court of Chancery had power to investigate the affairs of that and every other charity. In fact, that Court was essentially the tribunal to deal with such matters, and if good grounds for an investigation were made out an investigation would be granted. Then, again, they had in Ireland the Board of Charitable Bequests, which had power to investigate the cases of charities misapplied, withheld, or concealed; and if this Mr. Gradwell, being a Trustee, became the purchaser of the trust property at a gross undervalue that had only to be stated to the Court of Chancery for an investigation to be granted. As to eviction by Mr. Gradwell of a tenant on the estate, he believed that was still sub judice; the County Court Judge had not announced his decision; and if it was found that it was a case which the law did not reach, then let them bring it forward in Parliament. But do not let them trammel it with a charge of misapplication of trust, which could be duly dealt with by the ordinary tribunals of the country.

Mr. CALLAN said, he could not share the view of the hon. and learned Member for King's County (Mr. Serjeant Sherlock), that the House should not enter into the merits of the case, but should leave them to the ordinary tribunals of the country. He had heard the arguments used in 1870, that the House should not intervene between the tenants and the ordinary tribunals; and he trusted that the hon. and learned Member for King's County would enunciate these principles to his constituents at the next Election. The hon. and learned Member had shown a deplorable ignorance of the merits of the case, because he had stated that the people of the district appealed to the Court of Chancery with reference to what he (Mr. Callan) would call a sale by the Trustee to himself of trust property. There was no such appeal; no appeal was made on that point. They applied to the Court of Chancery on a point which concerned themselves—namely, the school of the widows' house. Early in the present century—40 years ago, and more—the late Lord Netterville made a bequest of a charitable character, in which he gave his own residence as a widows' house. Trustees were appointed to carry out that bequest, until an English adventurer—he used the word advisedly, but not in the sense of being an impecunious adventurer—an English monied adventurer—came to Ireland in the Famine years, and when property was selling at four, five, or ten years' purchase, he purchased property there. Mr. Gradwell became the Trustee of this property. He was bound to make to the Court of Chancery a true statement of the purchase he had made. Even professional men were viewed with great suspicion when they purchased in the Landed Estates Court. But Mr. Gradwell was the sole acting Trustee, and he concealed the fact from the tenants that they could purchase their holdings, or take leases of 31 or 41 years. In 1864 he proposed to the Court, without the knowledge of the tenants or the surrounding gentry, to become the purchaser of 12 acres of a deer park. There were upwards of 1,000 trees in it. Mr. Gradwell bought this land for £360. If it had been put up at Drogheda at the time it would have fetched £1,800. Was not this House the proper place to bring forward such a flagrant case? Those 12 acres were an historical spot. They overhung the scene of the battle of the Boyne. He had nothing to say as to the eviction of Mr. Elcock, except that he believed there were some faults on both sides. The bit of a farm from which he was evicted was opposite the entrance gate of the magnificent mansion of which Mr. Gradwell became the owner in the depressed times, and Elcock had the effrontery to build a haystack opposite the entrance gate to Mr. Gradwell's castle. This came between the wind and his nobility. He ordered it to be removed. Mr. Elcock sent back a rude message, and the reply was a notice to quit. But these were small matters which were to be dealt with at the Meath Sessions in July. After such charges had been made, he thought it was incumbent on the Attorney General and Chief Secretary to put the Charitable Bequests Commission in motion, and have an inquiry. What would be thought of it in Ireland, if there was no inquiry after such charges had been made as he (Mr. Callan) made now, undertaking to prove every iota of what he had stated as to Mr. Gradwell and his dealings with the trust property.

Mr. J. LOWTHER said, he thought that great exception could be taken to the manner in which this question had been brought forward. He did not refer to the fact that it had, so to say, nicked in in the middle of a debate on another subject, for he had always contended for the undoubted right of private Members to avail themselves of their legitimate privileges, and especially now that from various causes the opportunities they possessed of raising discussions had become somewhat diminished, he felt more than ever that Members were acting strictly in accordance with what was their right in retaining their places upon the Notice Paper; but he did not think that a Notice, given in yesterday in the vague terms in which this appeared, could be regarded as sufficient. He (Mr. J. Lowther) never, until the Notice appeared, heard of any of the places referred to, and had never, until now, had the good fortune to hear of the gentleman who had been spoken of in such scathing terms. At one part of the debate he was likened to Mr. Squeers, further on he was called an adventurer, and latterly he appeared as a fraudulent Trustee, and he did not know what he might not become by the time the debate terminated. He was asked to commit the Government to grant an inquiry; but, so far as he had been able to gather, he had heard nothing to justify him in assuming that this gentleman had done anything wrong. He might have committed everything that had been alleged against him, but he had had no such circumstances brought to his knowledge, and there had been no time to obtain information which would justify him in forming a judgment on the matter; and it was contrary to the usage of this House to bring forward serious charges of a personal nature—charges of direct fraud and malpractice—without those who were appealed to, to express an opinion or announce their intention of adopting an unusual course of action, having the slightest opportunity of making themselves acquainted with the subject. He hoped, therefore, that the House would not continue the discussion, which could not possibly lead to any useful result, but might be the means of doing considerable harm, because the persons whose conduct was impugned had had no means of communicating their defence.

Mr. Serjeant Sherlock

MR. PARNELL said, that the Chief Secretary and the Attorney General had done their best to stifle the discussion; and in the very remarkable speech that had just been heard from the Chief Secretary—not, indeed, remarkable for him, but remarkable for a Gentleman in his position—he stated that he had never heard anything of a question that had resounded throughout the length and breadth of the country of which he was supposed to be the Governmental Representative in this House. When the Chief Secretary coolly told them that he had never heard of these places, and never heard of the name of Mr. Gradwell, he was driven to the conclusion that the right hon. Gentleman must think that the responsible affairs of his government were entirely beneath his notice. If there was one question that had attracted greater public attention in Ireland than another during the last three or four years in the newspapers and in the Courts of the country, publicly and open, and everybody to hear and see, it was this case of Mr. Elcock and the Trustees of the Netterville charities. He was thoroughly surprised that the Chief Secretary, who might be supposed to take some little interest in Irish questions, declared that he had never heard of these places or of the parties in this question. The Chief Secretary also said he had heard nothing which sustained the charges brought against Mr. Gradwell. It was usually supposed that neither a trustee nor an agent could be the purchaser of property of which he was the trustee or agent. Mr. Gradwell, who was both agent and trustee, had the audacity to sell to himself a portion of this property, and there was considerable doubt about its confirmation, and the Courts of Dublin refused for some time to sanction the purchase. It was only on the promise of Mr. Gradwell that he would set up certain schools and afford certain advantages to the charity that the sale was effected. He (Mr. Parnell) was disposed to think that even now if the matter could be brought before the Courts the sale would be set aside. But the people who were interested were very poor; they were humble tenant farmers, and their efforts to set things right had come to grief for want of means. Besides, the laws governing trust property in Ireland were so imperfect that it was difficult for people to get justice done. He (Mr. Parnell) thought sufficient Notice had been given, and he thought the hon. Member for Louth (Mr. Kirk) would have been violating his duty if he refrained from taking advantage of the opportunity of bringing the case before the House, because at this period of the Session the opportunities of private Members were very few. Mr. Gradwell had had plenty of notice. He had had two or three months' public notice, and could long since have instructed some Member to defend—if, indeed, he could get a Member of the House to defend his conduct—which he (Mr. Parnell) very much doubted. It appeared to him that nothing would have pleased the Chief Secretary or the Attorney General more than the statement that there were not sufficient grounds or sufficient motives for the action which was taken. They were told that they had no right to bring this subject forward, because it was a trumpery case, and one which the House could not listen to; but those whom he represented did not consider it a trumpery case. The people of the country had publicly sympathized with Mr. Elcock in the most emphatic manner. His neighbours were encouraging and receiving him, and two officers of Her Majesty's Army had given him the shelter in which he stood so much in need of. If any person was banished for being wrong it should not be Mr. Elcock; and if he suffered for removing any of these stones, so should Mr. Gradwell. The question was one of 30 years' standing, and now it was attempted to be set up as an excuse for removing Mr. Elcock from his holding. The Archæological Society of Dublin allowed him to remove stones for building purposes, and it was impossible that he could restore the moat to its former condition under his agreement. If that was to be done, according to the reading of Mr. Gradwell, an agreement was entered into to refer the matter to arbitrament of the law, but that was not carried out. Mr. Elcock therefore proceeded in his old manner, and, but for the charity of his neighbours, he would have lost property to the extent of many thousands of pounds. The law had since removed him from his holding, and the only question was the amount of compensation he was to get for his permanent improvements, and nothing had been said against his claim in that direction. The whole thing resolved itself into this—that the Trustee, instead of recognizing his position as a Trustee, had mismanaged affairs, and there seemed no possibility for the people of the locality to get redress. Their only redress was to come to the House and ask of the Government officials to take an interest in their case. He hoped the Chief Secretary would be better informed upon the subject after the Whitsun Recess than he was to-night, and that in the interim he would devote his attention to this very important Irish question. He assured him that in doing so his time would not be thrown away. It was a case of life and death with Mr. Elcock. That gentleman was in a dying state in consequence of these troubles, and if the result of this Motion were to direct the attention of the Law Officers of the Crown to this iniquitous and scandalous case, the Chief Secretary might put some machinery in motion by which justice might be done to Mr. Elcock, and which would remove the property from the scandal and reproach under which it now existed.

Mr. Parnell

SIR JOHN LUBBOCK was sorry that the hon. Member for Meath had attacked the Royal Irish Academy, an institution of which every Irishman ought to feel proud. The hon. Member alleged that the Academy had commenced this work of destruction, whereas their chief object was to preserve and maintain all the ancient monuments illustrative of the history of the country.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Committee deferred till Monday next.

INDIA — EAST INDIA REVENUE ACCOUNTS—FINANCIAL STATEMENT.

COMMITTEE.

ADJOURNED DEBATE. [SECOND NIGHT.]

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Question, [22nd May], "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair" (for Committee upon East India Revenue Accounts).

Question again proposed.

Debate resumed.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL said, it was very evident, so far as the time of the House was concerned, that the Government proposed, and the Irish Members disposed, for both that night and last night they had occupied the time in discussing their own questions, instead of Indian finance. He hoped the Government would give ample opportunity for the subject to be fully discussed. He might say, at the outset, that he did not intend to move the Amendment which stood in his name, and which was to this effect—

"That this House regards with apprehension the state of the Finances of India, and is of opinion that they are not sufficiently controlled. Her Majesty's Government having disregarded the letter and provisions of the Acts for the better government of India on that subject."

The hon. and learned Member for Oxford (Sir William Harcourt) had given

Notice of a Motion for a future day which involved very much the same principle, and as a great Constitutional question was at stake, it was better in the hon. and learned Member's hands than in his. He did not propose to enter on the question of the loans, because he understood that the Resolution with regard to the loans would only be passed pro forma, and that the Chancellor of the Exchequer had promised a day upon which the subject would be fully discussed. He must heartily congratulate the Under Secretary of State for India (Mr. E. Stanhope) on the clear and able way in which he had made his Financial Statement. He concurred very much in what he had said, and welcomed the improvement in the general policy of the Government. His only objection to the speech of his hon. Friend was that it seemed to be somewhat too sanguine and rose-coloured, and that it exaggerated in some measure the good points in the finances of India, while it minimized the bad ones. Though the speech had charmed his hon. Friend the Member for Hackney (Mr. Fawcett), so that, beginning by cursing he remained to bless, he, for his part, did not think there was much in the speech which was a surprise to those of them who had studied the subject. The Under Secretary had taken great credit for the reductions of Expenditure which were to be effected; but of what did they consist? With regard to the Civil Services, they cost some £12,000,000 or £13,000,000 a-year, and the general result of the economy that was to be exercised was not to reduce the expenditure all at once, but it was to take place a little at a time, so that some time or other a saving of £250,000 was expected. Though he was thankful for small mercies, he did not think that would be likely to create a revolution in the state of the finances. With regard to the Military Department, which involved an expenditure of some £17,000,000 or £18,000,000, the hon. Gentleman told them how difficult it was to reduce the expenditure, and stated there was to be a Committee of Inquiry. But an inquiry might suggest changes which would cost money, and might mean increase of expenditure as well as reduction, so that they must consider the reduction of Army expenditure as a thing which might or might not be in the future. The one item in which there was a substantial reduction was in public works. That was a very easy remedy; but it meant cutting down those works which went to the improvement of the country. He did not think this change by any means all improvement, for it would result in the stoppage of many very useful and necessary works. Practically, deducting the military works and works which must go on, they were going to cut down by one-half the expenditure upon ordinary public works. Already it was a reproach to the Government that they had carried their reductions in that Department too far. He was told that it was distressing in Madras to see the extent to which works had been stopped. Even the roads and tanks were not being repaired. There was also, they were told, to be a saving in regard to the extraordinary public works, although the matter was at present before a Committee upstairs. He very much regretted that the hon. Gentleman had anticipated the decision of the Committee, and, for his part, he did not at all approve of the proposal to limit the extraordinary public works to £2,500,000. If they were to carry out remunerative public works, and such works were really before them, he thought they had far better spend £10,000,000 at once, than go on letting out money in slow and wasting dribbles; and, on the other hand, if they had not such works, there was no reason to spend £2,500,000 or any other particular sum. He thought the Government were right to take measures to reduce expenditure where they could; but the fact was that they had entered into such dangerous and expensive political complications on the Frontier of India as to create a deficit, and they were obliged, if he might so express it, to starve the most necessary works and the most necessary part of the administration. He must protest against the airy way in which the Under Secretary had spoken of the "late war" as a matter which had been settled for £2,000,000, and which was something in the nature of a bagatelle. He must protest against the idea that, because the Government had got hold of an Afghan who was willing to make terms with them, they had brought the political difficulty to an end. So far from that being the case, he believed that the present negotiations would be found to be only the beginning of further troubles and of further expenses. They were treating not so much with the de facto Ameer of Afghanistan as with a man who hoped by their aid to become so, and they might find that they had a second Shah Soojah on their hands. There could be no doubt that a crisis had been arrived at in Indian finance, and it was necessary to do something in order to get matters out of their present lamentable condition. Not only did figures show that the finance of India was in an unsatisfactory state, but recent news from that country regarding disturbances in the Bombay Presidency was of an extremely serious character. He was not an alarmist, but the accounts which had come to hand of overt discontent and of open defiance were very grave; indeed, he might say, speaking with an experience of almost 40 years, they were assuming proportions which he had never known before. There could be no question that those disturbances were connected with the financial position of India, and with the position of some administrative matters in our great Eastern Dependency. He believed that the disturbances to which he referred were caused, in some degree, by taxation which was felt to be an injustice, and also, in some degree, by the stoppage of public works, which took away labour from people who would otherwise be employed. India having arrived at a situation of chronic deficits, he would ask the House coolly and deliberately to look at the situation. First, was there excessive taxation in that country? In his opinion, there had been some exaggeration in what had been said about heavy taxation in India. The real amount was about £40,000,000 when they cleared away the padding of the accounts, and that was derived from six great sources, some of which he maintained were not taxes at all. The first was the land revenue, which was really in the nature of reserved rent, and as landlords we had perhaps dealt hardly with the ryots of Bombay and some other districts. Then there was the opium revenue which was paid by the Chinese. Next came the Excise, a comparatively small amount obtained from noxious articles of consumption, and nobody would wish to see that reduced. Then there were the stamps, and the Customs revenue, which was altogether inadequate to the size and resources of India. The only real considerable tax felt by the people was that on salt, which, unfortunately, occupied the position of the property tax in this country, in being raised to meet extra burdens. He regretted to find that the Under Secretary had fallen into the groove in which all the officials of the India Office ran—that of regarding the salt tax as the “horse of all work.” The salt tax was in the nature of a poll tax; but there were limits beyond which it could not be raised. He thought the Government had committed a grave error in imposing the additional £300,000 which was to be produced by the last increase of the salt duty; but he confidently hoped that now that money had been abandoned, the Government would see that they had reached the ultimate limit of that tax. The other sources of taxation would not yield much increase of Revenue, and the only alternative seemed to be local rates, locally administered, for local works. He sympathized very little with the British Association in Bengal; but they certainly had the strongest reason to complain of an unwarrantable breach of faith on the part of the Government of India in absorbing the additional rate which had been imposed on the land revenue in Bengal for a Famine Fund in the general administration and defence of the country. The Government had also thought it necessary to attempt additional direct taxation. They first tried an income tax; but that had been surrendered, and the infinitely worse scheme had been resorted to of a licence tax. The income tax had been abandoned in response to the cry of the rich and noisy, and its remission had only benefited rich people, whereas the licence tax contained all the worst features of the income tax, and, from a political point of view, was infinitely more dangerous. For every rich man who was relieved by the remission of the income tax a hundred poor persons were affected by the licence tax. Last year he ventured to predict that the imposition of this tax would lead to political disturbance, and his words had come true to a lamentable degree. But the Government had not only imposed a most unpopular tax, they had surrendered the cotton duties, of which no one in India had complained. Those duties, and the tax on sugar, had been surrendered in deference to Lancashire opinion in this country, or to the crochets of the present Finance Minister of India. It might be right or wrong to remit the cotton duties; but when hon. Members considered the Motions placed on the Paper, and the speeches made on one side of the House and the other, as if the remission had taken place in the interest of the people of India, it was difficult for them, like the Roman augurs, to look at one another without smiling. He believed a well-founded irritation had been created and was felt largely in India upon this subject at the present moment. With regard to the whole subject of taxation, he thought India was not excessively taxed; but the rich were scarcely taxed at all. With regard to retrenchment, he very much agreed with Lord Northbrook in the extract read by the Under Secretary last night. No doubt, the work of retrenchment would require a firm hand; but the necessity for it was so urgent that he hoped the House would strengthen the hands of the Government now that they said they were prepared to deal with it. One advice he would give to Her Majesty's Government was that if they wished to set an example of economy to India they should begin at home. No doubt, over by far the greater part of the Home expenditure Her Majesty's Government had no control. The amount really spent at home was only some £275,000, not a large sum to work upon; but, nevertheless, something could be done. There were some items not fixed by Act of Parliament, on which excessive extravagance on the part of the Government was shown. For instance, no fewer than eight holders of some of the highest posts at the India Office had been pensioned off, not under superannuation rules, but under what was called re-arrangement of Offices, the fact being that it was thought desirable to promote certain persons; others were dissatisfied, and so were allowed to retire on pensions varying from £733 6s. 8d. to £340. There was no reduction in the expenditure of the Office; on the contrary, there was an increase in the staff. He quite agreed with the Under Secretary that we could not safely reduce our Army in India, though, with short service, some radical re-arrangements might be necessary. He wished to express his entire concurrence in the measure the Government had announced for the reduction of the numbers of the Civil servants. By more largely employing Natives we should do more justice to them, and by employing fewer Europeans the flow of promotion would be improved in the upper ranks of the Service. He did not think, however, that the Natives would be very well satisfied if they were not paid as well as Europeans. When he was at the head of the Government of Bengal, he endeavoured to substitute cheap Native for dear European labour, thinking that he would secure the eternal gratitude of the Natives; but he was never so greatly or continually abused for anything he had done. They said that if they did the same work they ought to be paid at the same rate. With regard to the remission of the cotton duties, the Under Secretary of State for India had stated, in reply to a Question, that that remission was made with the knowledge and sanction of Her Majesty's Government; but he subsequently said the sanction was conveyed in a confidential telegram of a private nature which could not be produced. He maintained that it was absolutely against the law that the sanction of Her Majesty's Government to an important financial measure should be conveyed in a private telegram. But this was not a single instance. On the question of that remission of the salt duties, the Under Secretary promised to produce the Correspondence; but he had never done so, for the simple reason that there was no Correspondence to produce, no Correspondence except, perhaps, some private telegrams. The result of the system was that there was no real check on the Viceroy. The Viceroy was assisted by a very able man—Sir John Strachey; but Sir John Strachey had his crochets and his imprudences. When acting with such a solid and sensible Viceroy as Lord Mayo, Sir John Strachey was a most valuable public servant; but when Sir John Strachey, audacious and impulsive as he was, was yoked to such a Viceroy as Lord Lytton, who was more audacious, impulsive, and imprudent than himself, the danger was one of considerable magnitude. Had the Rulers of the Mogul Empire been assisted by wise and prudent counsellors, the Great Mogul Empire might still be in existence at this day; and if a man so hot-headed and indiscreet as Lord Lytton was allowed to govern India, and left uncontrolled to his own conceits and devices, it might happen that some 100 years hence some other Power might rule in India instead of the British Government.

Sir George Campbell

Mr. ONSLOW said, he thoroughly agreed with what had been said as to the necessity for reducing the Indian Expenditure. He heartily approved of the Resolution proposed by the hon. Member for Hackey (Mr. Fawcett), but withdrawn; and he thought the course adopted by the Leaders of the Opposition with respect to that Resolution was open to observation, after the meeting at the house of the noble Lord the Member for the Radnor Boroughs (the Marquess of Hartington), where it was understood that they agreed to support it as a Vote of Censure on the Government. The debate on the question before them showed that India was not to be made the shuttlecock of Party in that House, and that both sides were desirous of considering the best interests of India. He thought the Under Secretary of State for India had shown that the interests of India were to be considered in a much better way than they had been in former years. The hon. Member for Kirkcaldy (Sir George Campbell) objected to the policy of the Government with reference to Afghanistan; but he (Mr. Onslow) would venture to say that the opinion of the House, and of the great majority of this country, was that all the sums spent in the Afghan War had done great credit to Her Majesty's Government. India had been made a great deal safer than before. He believed there was no other policy open to Her Majesty's Government, and that this Afghan War was one of the greatest successes which the arms of this country had obtained in India or elsewhere. The hon. Member for Kirkcaldy also objected to the remission of cotton duties; but it was strange that the hon. Member was not in his place when that subject was discussed in the House. The hon. Member for Kirkcaldy said he took a serious view of the disturbances in the Deccan. We all deplored them; but at different times we had riots in different parts of India, and must always expect such riots. He did not, however, attach so much importance to those riots as the hon. Member; but if they were really dangerous, there was no man better able to cope with them than the present Governor of Bombay. The present Governor General had shown himself determined to carry out the honour and interests of India in a manner worthy of the name of the English name he bore. The Financial Minister in India, we must know, had an enormous difficulty. One of the largest items of Revenue was that from opium. One day it might be up and another day it might be down; and, therefore, the Financial Minister could not say how much he was to get from the opium revenue. A Famine might spring up at any time in any part of India, and that alone might upset the calculations of any Financial Minister, as it had upset the calculations for the year preceding this. At one time it might be a Famine, and at another a cyclone, that upset the calculations of the Financial Minister. Moreover, his calculations might be upset by an unexpected war, which might break out at any moment. The Financial Minister could not give even an approximate estimate of the loss which might occur in the course of the year by exchange. He (Mr. Onslow) hoped that we had seen the most disturbing elements pass away, and that the depreciation of silver would no longer be a bugbear in Indian finance. He thought he should be justified in saying that every Financial Minister since the Mutiny, with the exception of Sir Richard Temple, had been a Liberal. Unless the Financial Minister was backed up by the arm of the Viceroy, he had no more power in the Council than any ordinary Member. We should give greater power to the Financial Minister than he had at present. It was impossible for him to carry out his policy if he found every Member of the Council against him. But even though the reductions which had been promised by his hon. Friend the Under Secretary of State were carried into effect, he had great doubts whether they could be accomplished within two or three years. When the question came to be dealt with of employing Natives in the place of Europeans, it would be found that it involved great difficulties. The matter was not one merely of salary, but also of pension, and he did not think the Government would get the men they wanted if they were to give Europeans only the same pay for performing the same duties as Natives. As to Military expenditure, it had always been the object of the Viceroys of India to keep it down; but its reduction depended a great deal on the action of the Home Government, by whom the Viceroy had not often been consulted. In 1864 great reductions had been made; but such had been the increase of wages that the Military expenditure, instead of being diminished, had gone on increasing, and what had occurred in 1864 might occur in 1879. As to the proposed Committee, his opinion was that inquiry by a mere departmental Committee would do no practical good, and the Government ought, he thought, at once to take the bull by the horns and announce that they were prepared to appoint a Royal Commission to inquire into the whole Expenditure of India. He next came to the question of public works, on which he thought a good deal of money was wasted in India, owing to the fact that the House of Commons had run away with the idea that she was a very rich country. Sir Charles Trevelyan even had said that there would be no difficulty in carrying out such works so far as money was concerned, and Lord Halifax had endorsed that view. An unwholesome stimulus was thus given to the prosecution of public works in India; but Sir Charles Trevelyan had subsequently deemed it to be his duty to inculcate the necessity of observing some moderation in carrying out those works. He hoped, therefore, that in future no works would be entered upon unless there was an assurance that they would be reproductive. It should not be forgotten, he might add, that large sums had been spent on repairs, for hon. Members generally could scarcely be aware how soon works became deteriorated in the climate of India. He sincerely trusted that the objects of the Government would be realized in a few years, and that they would persevere in their endeavour to improve both the condition and the resources of India. It ought not to be very difficult by careful economy to make the Expenditure equal to the Revenue.

Sir George Campbell

MR. GRANT DUFF said, he was glad that the very able and elaborate statement of the hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary of State for India (Mr. E. Stanhope) had done two things; it had made it clear that the Government were going to turn their minds to a serious reduction of Expenditure in India, and, at the same time, it had done away with a great deal of the exaggerated uneasiness with respect to Indian affairs which had been fostered of late by reckless and sensational writing. There was every reason for uneasiness, but no reason for panic. Indeed, he had never known a moment when those who understood it did not view with uneasiness the condition of Indian finance. It was all a question of degree. The old Court of Directors lived in a state of chronic agony in regard to the Indian finances, and, consequently, were so timid about undertaking public works that they very often drew upon themselves the thunders of one of the greatest living orators. Hardly had the Queen's Government taken over the direct management of India than it found that the question of making the two ends meet was one of the gravest with which it had to deal; and it sent to Calcutta, as soon as the fires of the Mutiny had burnt out, the very ablest financier on whom it could lay its hands. Mr. Wilson did great things, but the years from his death to 1869 were no bed of roses for Indian financiers. Then came a period of which he (Mr. Grant Duff) was in a position to speak, that during which the Administration of India was directed by the Duke of Argyll, when the financial question occupied the attention of the authorities, both in England and India, morning, noon, and night, and to so much purpose that whereas the Expenditure of the year 1868-9 was over £52,000,000, that of the year 1871-2 was under £47,000,000. Part of that reduction was owing to the transfer of £700,000 a-year from the shoulders of the Imperial Government to the shoulders of the Provinces; but a good deal more than £4,000,000 was really bonâ fide reduction. He did not see why the same reduction was not possible now. The Expenditure to be reduced was much larger, and if the Government set about it with a will, he did not see why they might not make as large a reduction as that. If they made that reduction, all cause for serious uneasiness with regard to Indian finance would be removed. There was all the difference in the world between the wise uneasiness which came from knowing the difficulty of governing on European principles with an Asiatic Revenue, and the panic-stricken exaggerations to which the public had been lately treated. It might, perhaps, be asked why we should govern on European principles, seeing that we were recommended by some persons to stop our public works and to govern India after the manner of a Native Indian Administration? The best Native administrators would tell us that their countrymen did not want our expensive Courts, our education, and all the rest of it. A small Revenue might be raised, but the people were not to be teased with taxation; and instead of spending our money on improving India, we might spend it in helping out the English Revenue, or on anything we pleased. If we were going to do no better than that, why were we in India at all? If we were not there to give the Natives of India what they could by no possibility have given themselves, except after thousands and thousands of years, we had better determine to leave them to their Native administrators, telegraphing to Lord Lytton to wind up the concern and come home. It was asked, why must we govern on European principles? Because we were Europeans, and because we could not help it. We were bound to govern India according to European principles, if we governed it at all; but to govern it upon European principles with an Asiatic Revenue was a difficult thing, and must from time to time land us in serious complications. If Lord Northbrook, in 1874, had determined to treat the Bengal Famine as a Native administrator would have treated it, he would doubtless at first have done what he could to save the people; but, very early in the day, he would have come to the conclusion that circumstances were too strong for him, and, with folded hands, would have said—"It is the will of God." Now, in 1874, there happened to be no very exciting subject before the public, except the Bengal Famine, and it would have been as much as Lord Northbrook's head was worth if he had ventured to act in that manner. A year or two later came another great Famine, during which Lord Lytton's Government did all they possibly could for the saving of life at fearful expense to the State, though their efforts were, alas! very far, indeed, from being entirely successful. Most luckily for them, however, other subjects of a highly exciting kind occupied the attention of the public, or there would have been a shriek of indignation against the supposed inefficiency of our Indian Government. These two Famines, managed on European principles, cost quite £15,000,000, which would have remained in the Treasury of the Native administrator. The men who carried on the Administration of India passed their lives in endeavouring to steer a middle course between those who would have them improve the country quicker than the poverty of the population would permit, and those who would have them hang back, doing little or nothing. He thought that, considering the gigantic difficulties of the subject, they contrived to steer extremely well between the two. Was it true that in doing so they leaned too much to the side of rapid improvement? He did not think so. From time to time there was, no doubt, a movement in that direction, but the pendulum soon swung back. It might be suggested, however, that the very fact that the present Government was ready to make very large reductions proved that our Government of India was habitually extravagant. He did not think that such was the case. In point of fact, it merely proved that from time to time circumstances arose in which efficiency had to be sacrificed to the absolute necessity of economy—that, at least, was the case with nearly all the Civil expenditure that had been cut down, a great part of which was usually under the head of Public Works Ordinary—that was, works of comfort and convenience. He had no reason to believe that the present Government had been more extravagant in its conduct of the internal affairs of India than other Governments. He thought that it was right to take the course it did in the vexed question of the cotton duties, and two years ago urged it to take a somewhat similar course, even at the risk of a small deficit, while he thoroughly approved all that it had done in relation to salt. The case which he thought could not only legitimately be made against Her Majesty's Government, but which it was their bounden duty to make, was this—That Indian Revenues improving but slowly and containing some very uncertain elements, and Indian Expenditure requiring to be kept down with the most watchful care, they had quite gratuitously adopted a course of external policy which would eventually lead India into the greatest possible financial embarrassment. In order to make good the foundation of that case, it was only necessary to look at the largest feeders of our Revenue—land, opium, salt, stamps, Customs. Well, then, in the nature of things the land revenue, if it did not increase quite as slowly as was sometimes said, would not rise very much for a considerable time. He saw that, in 1877-8, it appeared as positively a little smaller than in the actual or completed accounts of 1867-8. That must arise, he supposed, from the disturbance caused by the late Famine in Southern India. Still, he apprehended that the Government did not anticipate any great or sudden improvement in its receipts from land. Then there was opium. He had never shared the pessimist view about opium. He had never expected that our revenue from that source would be suddenly cut off. They knew, however, that it was menaced from two sides. There was a party in China which wished to manufacture on a greatly increased scale the Native drug, for the express purpose of killing down our import of opium. It was possible that that party might succeed in overcoming the scruples of those of their countrymen who were in favour of maintaining the old severe laws against the growth of the poppy, and might likewise succeed in making as good opium as we could send from Bengal or Malwa. If that where so, then we might be beaten out of our best—indeed, for practical purposes, our only market, and the Government of India might have to look to taxation to compensate it; or, in other words, India might lose the most magnificent estate which was possessed by any nation in the world—an estate which more than paid the annual interest of her Debt. Again, there was a party in this country which was persuaded that the import of opium into China was wicked, and ardently desired to do away with it at one fell swoop without ever dreaming of compensating India for the loss of India's magnificent estate. If that party ever succeeded, the same result would follow—India would have to raise an additional taxation of £6,000,000 or £7,000,000 a-year. He did not think that that Party would ever succeed in inflicting on India so terrible, so utterly ruinous an injustice; but he could quite conceive that the British Government might, in the interest of our and her general policy, prevail upon India to diminish her import of opium into China by, say, 1,000 chests every year, until it ceased altogether; and the ultimate result of that to India would be, doubtless, not so embarrassing, but, nevertheless, decidedly embarrassing. The stability of the opium revenue depended upon causes of which we knew so little that no financiers, however sanguine, could possibly be comfortable about it. "Threatened folk live long," he might say, but that was all his comfort. Then came the salt tax. He was not one of those who took a strong view against it, though it had no doubt some disadvantages, yet some of them had been done away with under the Administration of Lord Lytton. He supposed there was no one who had studied Indian finance who did not feel that although the direct mischief arising from the salt tax in restricting the supply of salt to the population had been sometimes exaggerated, it had, nevertheless, in some districts very bad direct effects; while about its indirect evils all over the country in restricting manufactures there was really no kind of question. We must admit, he feared, against the salt tax nearly everything that his right hon. Friend the Member for the University of Edinburgh (Mr. Lyon Playfair) would allege; but it was our third largest source of Revenue. Could we substitute anything for it? He confessed that a salt tax equalized from Cape Comorin to Peshawur seemed to him an inevitable, though most unsatisfactory and unscientific element of Indian Revenue for many years to come. It was, however, not likely that the revenue from it would much increase. One of the first things that had to be done, indeed, was the reduction of the duty in the Lower Provinces of Bengal. Then there were stamps, which brought in, in 1877-8, a little under £3,000,000 of net revenue. He supposed that that source of income would go on increasing with the increase of education and the advance of civilization, but not very quickly. Then there were Customs; but he trusted that export duties would soon disappear, that the Indian tariff would contain, before very long, as few articles as our own, and that Customs duties would eventually disappear. He thought, seeing there was little chance of any increase from them, that all Indian financiers should steadily keep in view the importance of getting rid of all Customs duties in India, both export and import. He hoped that the Government of India would save that country from the detestable spectre of Protection which had appeared in the Colonies. We should at least give our great Dependency the benefit of perfect freedom of exchange, which the unwisdom of our Colonies had denied to themselves, though, of course, that could not be done all at once. Even now, only about 3*d.* per head of the population was produced to Indian Revenues by the import duties. Was it worth contravening sound principles and inflicting endless inconvenience for so contemptible a result? He thought he had shown, without taking alarmist views, that our existing Indian income was likely to increase only very slowly, and it would probably be admitted that no great rise was at present to be looked for in Indian Revenue. The weight of authority seemed to be against all new taxes that had been discussed. It was unnecessary to show in detail how Indian Expenditure tended to increase. It required, at all times, the most anxious and sustained efforts on the part both of the Home authorities and of the authorities in India to prevent it becoming altogether intolerable. Every subordinate Civil official and Military officer who was good for anything thought first of efficiency. It was only those at the head of affairs who kept asking—"What will it cost?" If we had twice as much money as we had, we could spend it all to good purpose. These things being so, the present Government had had the folly to embark on a course of policy which had already cost India a great deal of money, and which would too probably lead, before very long, to far heavier expense than any of which those who commenced it even dreamed. He would be a bold man who would deny that, thanks to this impolitic and fatal interference with Afghanistan, we might in a very few years be obliged to annex the whole of that country, and to draw our next scientific Frontier beyond Herat. He would not try to revive the discussion on the Afghan War in its political aspect. He was looking at it for the moment merely in its financial aspect; and he affirmed that, even if there had not been political reasons which cried to Heaven against the course which the Government had taken since the retirement of Lord Northbrook, the financial calamities which would but too surely follow on their Frontier policy ought to have been quite enough to condemn it. Anyone who studied Indian history, and who knew the difficulties which the recent advance beyond the North-West Frontier would entail, would know that we should be led on and on by the force of circumstances, until very likely the most pacific Minister who ever ruled in this country would, as he had said, be obliged to annex the whole of Afghanistan, thanks to what the present Government had done. He was sure the right hon. Gentleman opposite knew well that this was so; but he comforted himself with that most unstatesmanlike reflection—"After me the deluge." Some people imagined that men's minds in India would now become calmer about the North-West Frontier. But they were much mistaken. Our North-West Frontier policy was to a great many Anglo-Indians the romance of India. It was the link which connected the land to which they had come with the busy Europe they had left. Dreams about the Russian spectre moving towards us across Central Asia were a relief from the intolerable dullness which often oppressed them. He would admit that the force of circumstances alone, now that it had been given its head, would prove too strong for all resolutions to advance no further. But that force was the weakest which was dragging us. We had, in Yakoob Khan, a new Shah Soojah on our shoulders, of whom we might well wish right hon. Gentlemen joy, if it was they only, and not all of us, who had to carry him. When we once stepped beyond our old Frontier, the curse came upon us—"Vestigia nulla retrosum." The burden which Clive and Warren Hastings laid on the shoulders of their country—the necessity of conquering India—was heavy enough. In an evil hour, by changing the policy which for so long had been accepted by both political Parties, they had taken, even if there were no political reasons against it, one of the most imprudent financial steps ever taken by any Government. Was not the burthen of conquering and keeping India enough for a little Island in the Atlantic, that right hon. Gentlemen opposite must needs add to it the probable task of having to conquer Central Asia also? There were dangers before, behind, and around them, of which, alas! their financial dangers were not the worst. Were matters so perfectly peaceful in India that they could be sure that the Mutiny was the last of their serious internal troubles there? He thought it extremely fortunate that they had so able and active a man as Sir Richard Temple governing the Bombay Presidency at this moment. Recent telegrams told of dacoity prevailing to a great extent in the neighbourhood of Poonah; but they might depend upon it there was a great deal more than mere dacoity there. He went into that district, in which he had naturally a peculiar interest, four years ago, and even to the eye of a passing traveller it was perfectly clear that there was serious disaffection. Those telegrams revealed a state of things precisely similar to that which preceded the great rising of the 17th century; and, although, considering the superiority of our strength over that of the Mogul, he would not venture to say that history would repeat itself, he did say that we were not at the end of our insurrections, and that the breaking out of trouble in that corner of India at this particular moment ought to be a warning to those who dreamt dreams of the beginning of an era of peace for India. What, above all things, was wanted in India was what was wanted everywhere—a steady, well thought out, and continuous policy, not a policy of violent fluctuation or exaggeration on the one side or the other; but that we no longer possessed. From the days of Lord Ellenborough our policy had been to remain within the bounds of India, and make the best of the country. It might be said of India what was said by someone of life itself, that it was neither a blessing nor a curse, but a serious piece of business which it concerned our honour to carry through; but to carry it through without such a policy as he had just indicated was impossible. If we were now to be led away by such will-o'-the-wisps as had led us through the Passes of Afghanistan lately, then the whole story of England's connection with that great country from first to last would be nothing better than one magnificent blunder—a blunder full of interesting, noble, and heroic episodes, but none the less a blunder.

Mr. Grant Duff

[Second Night]

Mr. Grant Duff

MR. SIDEBOTTOM said, it could not, he thought, be denied that the financial position of India must, at the present moment, be a source of grave anxiety, both to those responsible for the Administration of India and to everyone in this country who bestowed the least consideration on the subject. It was not his intention, on the present occasion, to enter upon the question of the import duties levied on cotton goods. The House had more than once affirmed that those duties were alike unjust to Indian consumers and English manufacturers, and ought to be repealed, and he thought it would be scarcely respectful to the House to occupy its time by dwelling on this well-worn subject. No doubt, there had been heavy expenditure in India; no doubt, it was absolutely necessary for that expenditure to be curtailed, and he was glad to see that Her Majesty's Government were taking stringent measures in this direction. No doubt, also, the dreadful Famines which had prevailed had greatly impoverished the country; but, above and beyond these and other causes, there was a very large and a very deep question which was well worthy the attention of the House. He meant the pressing difficulty so long felt with reference to the extremely unsatisfactory state of the exchanges. He would not weary the House by dwelling at any great length on this most intricate and difficult subject, or by enlarging on the causes which had led to the immense depreciation in silver, or of the increasing scarcity, and, consequently, enhanced value and appreciation of gold. Those causes were deep-seated, and, to a great extent, beyond our control; we had only, indeed, to call to mind the immense rise which took place in the value of all commodities in Spain within a very few years after the discovery of her gold mines in Peru to be convinced that we were face to face with a very great problem, and a problem which must have a most important influence, not only on our fortunes, but on the fortunes of well nigh every country in the world. As stated by the Prime Minister in "another place," a short time ago, the production of gold throughout the whole world averaged about £6,000,000 a-year up to the time of the discovery of the Californian and Australian mines; but these great discoveries increased the supply about six-fold, to £36,000,000, and the same effect was produced—though not to the same extent—as was produced in Spain more than three centuries ago; an enormous rise took place in the price of all commodities, everything appeared to increase in value, because gold, the fixed standard by which everything was measured, became more plentiful, and in reality decreased in value; in like manner, it did not seem open to doubt that of late years the decreasing supply of gold, simultaneously with an increased demand from Germany, from France, and latterly from America, had been one main cause of the existing intense depression, and of the fall in prices of nearly all commodities, including silver and including labour. This fall had by no means been confined to this country, but had extended everywhere, East and West, North and South, to all countries; but it had had an especially disturbing influence here, not only because of our extended trade with all the silver-using countries where it was the standard of currency, and where, consequently, the exchange had been directly affected, but also because silver was the currency and the standard in our own Empire of India. In one portion of our Empire—England—gold was the standard, in another portion—India—silver; and there could be no doubt whatever that the fluctuations in the value of silver and also of gold had caused very great derangement to the trade of the two countries, and no man yet might say what would be the consequence, or what disasters the future might have in store for us, if some attempt was not made to remedy the mischief, and arrest the continuous fall. Well, what was to be done? Many plans had been suggested, more or less plausible. One of these was a gold currency for India, same as England; but it was estimated that for that purpose £100,000,000 of gold would be required. Where was this immense amount to be procured? It was pretty evident that the supplies of gold were barely sufficient to carry on the trade of the world under the existing gold currencies; and this plan might, therefore, be dismissed as quite impracticable. Another suggestion was a largely extended issue of paper money; but the experience of other countries was not encouraging, and the great depreciation so often witnessed in paper ought surely to be a beacon and a warning against any such course as this. Amongst other suggestions there had been that of a bi-metallic currency, such as prevailed in France up to the time when she suspended the coinage of silver from fear of losing her supplies of gold, in consequence of the demonetization of silver in Germany. Much might be urged in favour of this plan, and it was by no means clear to his mind that it would not eventually have to be adopted by one or more nations to avoid general ruin. One thing was, at all events, clear—that when there was a bi-metallic currency in France these disastrous fluctuations in silver were prevented, because anyone, by taking silver to France, could have that silver coined and exchanged for gold in the proportion of 15½ to 1, and this kept the price of silver steady all over the world, and had practically the same effect as it was hoped would follow from the adoption of the bi-metallic currency now advocated. Many of our troubles, indeed, and the decline in our trade, seemed really to date from the period when France suspended the coinage of silver, and the advocates of bi-metalism maintained that in adopting it we should be trying no rash or hazardous or dangerous experiment, but, in reality, only be reverting to the previously existing state of things. But it was said—“Oh! to talk of a bi-metallic currency is absurd and ridiculous. Why, every banker in London is against it.” Well, nearly all great measures in this country passed through three stages. They were pooh-poohed, and said to be absurd and ridiculous in the first stage. Then, in the next stage, after we had felt a few more turns of the screw, after a few more disasters had occurred, after a few more thousands had been ruined, it began to be doubted whether, after all, they were deserving of so much ridicule and contempt. Then came the third stage, when they were suddenly adopted, and they who had been loudest in their denunciations, were often the most anxious to take credit for their adoption. Bankers might, or might not, oppose this plan; but he had yet to learn what special knowledge was possessed by bankers as such—especially by London bankers—on such a question, more than by merchants and others of wide and extended commercial experience, accustomed to business in all parts of the world, and obliged to take large and comprehensive views on such subjects. Now, what were the real arguments against a bi-metallic currency? He had conversed with many persons of every shade of opinion, and, so far as he understood, the main and the chief objections were that it would be a watering down, as it were, of the currency, which it was said would, in point of fact, be degenerated; and the fact of Germany resolving to adopt a gold currency same as our own, was cited to show that, by altering our currency, we should be taking a backward and retrograde step. This was all very well, but the experience of Germany did not offer much encouragement as an example. Few countries had suffered, and were yet suffering, more intense commercial depression, and the case was not analogous. Germany had no India; and if in a large portion of the German Empire silver had been the standard, and it had been impossible to change it, we might well believe that the great statesman who presided over her counsels would have shrank from establishing different standards in the same Empire. It was assumed, gratuitously assumed, that it was wished to restore silver by statute to the same value it formerly possessed when coined in France, in the proportion of 15½ to 1 of gold, and many arguments against any change were founded upon this assumption. But he, for one, never understood that this was intended. The question, indeed, was quite as much one of gold as silver. It was difficult to say precisely, in the present fluctuating value of silver, what ought to be fixed as its value in proportion to gold; but one great advantage expected from the adoption of a bi-metallic currency was the prevention of these disastrous fluctuations; and if it be said that no law could effect this, the plain and obvious answer was that they were prevented when there was a bi-metallic currency in France; and it seemed certain that the same result would again follow its adoption by one or more great nations. It was also said we should lose our supply of gold. Well, if we were the only country which adopted a bi-metallic currency, there might be some force in this argument; but, by acting in conjunction with America and France, all fear of any such a contingency would be avoided. It was also said that all descriptions of property would be increased in value, that there would be great inflation, and that debtors would be able to discharge their liabilities more easily than at present. Well, it was at least open to doubt whether a little inflation would not, on the whole, be preferable to the intense depression we had so long experienced, or whether an increase in the value of property would be altogether objectionable; and as to debts being more easily discharged, we must remember that those debts were contracted whilst a bi-metallic currency was actually in force; that it practically, in point of fact, prevailed up to 1873 or 1874, and that the present state of things was inflicting great hardship upon debtors. It would be easy to prove this from illustrations connected with trading and commercial interests; but take as an illustration the case of a person nominally the owner of landed estates which were heavily encumbered with charges for settlements, mortgages, and the like. Well, in the present unhappy state of agricultural depression, when it was difficult, if not impossible, to make both ends meet, when farms were vacant and rents reduced, such a person was not in a very enviable position; but mark the difference. They who received his money, they to whom his payments were made, so far from suffering any hardship, were really benefited by his misfortunes, because their mortgages having been granted, their settlements having been made under a totally different state of things, although the unfortunate debtor had now far less resources to fall back upon, far less money to pay with, they were receiving the same payments as before, the same number of sovereigns, and these sovereigns would now go a great deal further, and purchase more commodities; and they were, therefore, proportionately enriched at his expense. But those persons possessing fixed incomes were really the only persons who would even nominally suffer by the adoption of a bi-metallic currency; their incomes would not be affected, but remain the same as now, whilst the value of estates and, in fact, property of every description would be largely increased as sovereigns became of less value and possessed less purchasing power; but there was no real hardship in the case at all, for fixed incomes would have the same value as when they —or, at all events, the great bulk of them — were contracted for, the only difference being that they would no longer be swelled and increased at the expense of the unfortunate debtors ; in fact, though no doubt partly, and perhaps largely, attributable to other causes, it seemed to his mind certain that the great depression throughout the world, in nearly every interest and every trade, was to a large extent due to the contraction of the currency caused by the demonetization of silver, and the degradation of that metal from its former position as a standard of currency to a mere commodity, such as iron, or tin, or lead ; and, consequently, that the true remedy for our misfortunes, the true, plain, and direct way to revive our waning trade, to arrest the ruinous fall in property, and to restore general prosperity, was to restore silver to its former position as a partner with gold in the currency of the world ; and he greatly feared all other plans would end in failure, and be found alike vain and useless. America at the present moment seemed most anxious to unite with European nations in taking action on this question, and if other European nations would do nothing without our adhesion, he thought we ought no longer to stand aloof. At the same time, it could not be denied that the issues involved in adopting a bi-metallic currency were momentous, incalculable, impossible to forecast with any approach to accuracy, and the risks of any error or false step most serious ; and if Her Majesty's Government, therefore, should shrink from the responsibility of adopting it for this country, then a loan to India, as now proposed, seemed to him the next best course. No doubt, objections might be taken to any and every scheme which could be brought forward ; and he quite agreed that the true course to be followed, and really the best remedy, was to reduce expenditure in India, to spend less money, so that India might be enabled to absorb a larger amount of silver, and, as he had already said, he was glad that the Government were now making great exertions to enforce economy ; but even if the most economical arrangements conceivable were at once made, the benefits to be derived would not be felt for some time, and—

[Second Night.]

Mr. Sidebottom

[Second Night.]

"Whilst the grass grows the horse starves."

Something must be done immediately, and without delay ; and failing a resort

Mr. Sidebottom

to some modification of bi-metallism, to be once more adopted either generally or by one or more nations, a loan seemed to him the only immediate practical way of meeting the difficulty, and to some extent relieving the pressure. The right hon. Gentleman opposite the Member for the City of London (Mr. Goschen), in a most interesting and able speech on this subject some three years ago, which sank deep into his mind, seemed to think that the best plan in reference to silver was to do nothing, but leave things to find their proper level by the operation of ordinary laws and natural causes ; and, no doubt, this was generally the true and correct course. There were, however, exceptions to every rule, and all classes were now suffering so severely that if ever there was a time when a departure from ordinary rules was justified it was surely the present. It certainly could not be denied that these severe fluctuations in silver had tended in no small degree to produce the existing great depression in trade. On the one hand, the consumers of India, China, and all silver-using countries had not hitherto reaped the full advantage of the excessively low prices ruling, having, of course, in the long run to pay as much more for goods as would compensate for the loss on exchange, the value of these goods being regulated by the law of supply and demand ; and, on the other hand, English manufacturers and English merchants, besides direct losses on the exchange, had reaped none of the advantages of an extended trade brought about by low prices and the opening out of new markets. The loss to the Government was indeed sufficiently serious, the loss to thousands of persons of limited incomes remitted from India was grievous in the extreme, but the loss to the trading community, to Lancashire in particular, and directly or indirectly to every manufacturer and every merchant, was frightful to contemplate. It was strangling the whole trade, and no greater boon could be conferred by any Minister upon the commercial classes, and, indeed, indirectly upon all classes, than to devise some means by which exchange could be raised. His hon. Friend the Under Secretary of State, said, last evening, that the Government had made up their minds to face the loss on exchange manfully ; he did not, however, at all understand him to say that they would make no effort to mitigate that loss. He could assure him that the commercial classes had been looking forward with the greatest anxiety to some course being taken in this direction, and he earnestly hoped the Government would continue to give the matter their most serious attention.

MR. LOWE: Sir, the hon. Gentleman who has just addressed the House seems to have been more interested in the question of a bi-metallic currency than in the subject immediately before us to-night. As I wish to confine myself purely to this one question, I hope he will excuse me if I do not follow him through his long and able argument. I want to point out to the House as clearly as I can the present state of affairs in India in regard to this question of the currency, to put it to them whether it is possible to allow matters to remain as they are, and, finally, to consider what remedy can be applied to reduce the existing difficulties. I have first to submit a few propositions, which, I believe, can hardly be denied. The first is, that the rupee has a much higher value in India than in Europe. In other words, although the rupee is so very much depreciated when used as the means for the payment of debt in Europe, as long as it is confined to India it very nearly maintains its value, if it does not do so entirely. So that we have the singular phenomena that the same coin, circulating in two countries, has two entirely different values, one very much higher than the other. It is also true that there is no prospect of a considerable change in the direction of equalizing the two. I do not see any probability that the rupee will obtain the same value in England and in India. Of course, we know very well the causes that have produced the difference. The great fecundity of the silver mines; the resolution of almost every great Power in the world to employ gold instead of silver as its standard of value has, no doubt, greatly produced these effects. I cannot imagine that anyone can fairly see, in the state of affairs which now exists, any probability that there will be any considerable change. If there be, I should be glad to be informed of it; because, if there were any recuperative power in the matter itself, it would, no doubt, be infinitely better to leave it to that power than to make any attempt by strong or violent measures to set it right. For myself, it seems to me that the probability of silver recovering the position it held with regard to gold before recent changes and events is so very small that it would be vain indeed to calculate upon that as a remedy. The effect of all this as regards India is simply lamentable; because, though India is provided with a currency which seems tolerably well to answer its purposes for domestic use, yet, for the purpose of foreign payments, its currency is subject to most disastrous depreciation. That would be a great evil to any country, of course, that its currency should be depreciated. It is singular, because it does not often happen in history, that a currency serving very well for domestic purposes should be found to fall so very much below the mark when used for the purpose of paying debts due to foreign countries. If that is the case in other countries, how much more is it the case in India, which is bound by the most singular and indissoluble ties to England, the very existence of whose present state of Government, and whose condition, altogether and entirely depends upon the fact of its being able to remit to England every year very large sums of money indeed? The effect of this is that a man gets a reasonable return for the money he employs in India; but that on the money exported to England he suffers most heavily, and gets a very small and uncertain return indeed. We know, from the accounts laid before us, that India by this means alone actually loses, and is deprived of, something like £3,000,000 yearly. This is a state of things which, if it is to be regarded as permanent, and one not likely to be speedily or immediately relieved, is one utterly intolerable to be contemplated if there be within our reach any means or power of amendment. I think the case is made out as clearly as can be that we should, if possible, avoid so terrible a calamity as that with which India is visited, through no fault of her own, which springs from the institutions which she has, which does not arise from the nature of things, but comes from institutions which are artificial, made by the will of man, and can be altered by the will of man. We are not justified, if there be any means that can possibly be devised by which this loss can be obviated, in sitting down quietly and acquiescing in it. It may be that the thing may be in some degree alleviated. But it is not as if it were a slight loss. The ground to be made up is so great that I cannot help thinking it is an excess of presumption and sanguineness to expect any change as likely to take place which will put India in a situation tolerable to any country, a situation where she can fairly pay her debts without being subjected to this enormous sacrifice. It is infinitely worse for India than for any other country, because she is placed in a situation in which no country was ever placed before—that her very existence, under her present Constitution and form of Government, depends entirely upon that which is procured for her by the payment of these sums of money. Therefore, I do think that a case is made out, if a case ever was made out, for seeking some remedy. What, then, shall we propose? The hon. Gentleman who has just sat down proposed a double standard. I deny, Sir, that there ever is such a thing as a double standard. You may have an alternative standard, but never a double one. Gold or silver, you may have them together; but one or the other is sure to gain the advantage. You do not really get a double standard; you get either, with the additional evil of uncertainty. Something or other makes an alteration, and suddenly deranges all your calculations by shifting you from one to the other. Therefore, I cannot regard that as any approach to a settlement. What happens? That when there is a shift people pay their debts in that coin which is the cheapest. How, then, a double standard can be any relief where you have a nation whose currency answers their purpose tolerably well in their own country, and utterly fails to answer it abroad, I cannot at all understand. The question is whether we cannot hit upon some other means. What appears to be wanted for India is a standard identical with that of the country with which it is so intimately bound up. As India is paying something like £20,000,000 a-year to us, it seems most extremely desirable that the money should be paid in the way in which it will go furthest. Therefore, I confess that it seems to me that the great object we should have in view, if it be possible to attain it, is that we should get a standard of value identical with that of England. Almost any sacrifice, considering the enormity of the sum lost, should be undergone in order to obtain that. It will be said that there is nothing easier, and that we have only to declare that we will have a gold currency. Purchase your gold, make it the standard, and reduce the silver to a mere token coinage, as in England. But where are we to get the money to purchase the gold? What possibility is there in a poor country like India, where we are doubting, even at the present time, whether she does not stand on the verge of bankruptcy, how is it possible to undertake anything of that sort? [Mr. JOHN BRIGHT: Buy it with the silver.] The right hon. Gentleman says "Buy it with the silver;" but the very misery of it is that we are ruined by silver already. However desirable it might be from the way in which Indian finance has been regulated, we must see that this is perfectly impossible. Are we, then, to give up the question in despair and do nothing else? Is there any other remedy? The hon. Gentleman who spoke last suggested a paper currency; but he put that on one side, because he said such a currency would not be relied upon—that there were no means of limiting it within the bounds admissible. But is that true? Is there no means of limiting a paper currency? What is the nature of it? What gives a currency its value? It is not because it is made of any particular material. The value of a currency depends on something altogether different. It depends upon two things. First, that it should be made legal tender, which is easily enough done; and then that some means should be adopted by which it shall be limited, so as not to exceed the sum that would be used if gold, for instance, had been employed. If you can do these two things, you have got a currency possessing all the qualities, so far as I know, of a thoroughly good gold currency, with the advantage that you have not to find the gold for doing it. That was the plan developed so many years ago by Mr. Ricardo. So far as I know, it has never been carried into effect; but it has never been refuted, and I have never seen, in the course of my reading, any serious objection urged against it. There is not the least doubt that a currency of that kind, of notes of legal tender sufficiently limited, will perform all the duties of a gold currency, with the advantage that you save the wear and tear of the gold. I remember, at a period when I had the means of commanding much better information on the subject than I have now, making some sort of calculation as to what would be the effect here if, instead of a gold, we had a note currency, one pound notes for sovereigns, guarding that currency by Mr. Ricardo's proposition that if a person brought notes to the Bank he should always receive gold for them to their exact amount. Assisted by those who were much better qualified than I was to deal with this subject, I calculated that England would save something like £50,000,000 if she adopted the note currency. But English prejudices would not hear of that for a moment. As far as I know, the people may be quite right. The currency satisfies them extremely well, they are used to it, they can afford the luxury of it, just as they can afford the luxury of putting on any number of millions to our Debt; and, therefore, sound as I believe the principle to be, I do not for a moment wish to tamper with the present institution in England. But what possible objection can there be to trying such a thing in India, in the terrible state in which she is now, not as a mere matter of experiment, but in order really to save her from the bankruptcy with which she is imminently threatened? It would be perfectly easy, I think, to introduce notes into India, and to make the regulations that Mr. Ricardo suggested, that a person should receive gold for any notes he might bring in. We know, if there were any redundancy in the currency, that the process would go on until the redundancy ceased. But it would go no further, and then we should be possessed of a currency not so showy, not so expensive, but for all practical purposes quite as useful and as good as the currency in England or as the silver currency of India. I do not enter into the technical question how it is to be brought into working. The system can be reduced by experts to such a state that you would have a token currency of silver just as we have in England, and a legal tender up to a certain amount just as silver is here. There may be, and probably there are, very serious reasons and overwhelming objections to this scheme. Perhaps a person who, however unworthily, has held the Office of Chancellor of the Exchequer is not even prudent in broaching such a scheme. But I am so strongly impressed by the state in which India is, simply throwing away for her currency arrangements £3,000,000 yearly, that I think any suggestion of any kind, which has any plausibility, any semblance of practicability, that I felt it my duty to offer this suggestion. It may be shown that I have overlooked some principle or some condition which makes my idea valueless; but still I offer it, because I do not believe we can go on long in this way, draining these millions from India, where money comes like blood from the poverty of the people, and where we are put to our utmost shifts to make both ends meet, that we may not die by that most ignominious of deaths by which a great Empire can perish—bankruptcy. I have, at any rate, taken my life in my hand in offering this suggestion. I would not have done it if I had thought we could go on as we are; but I do not see why any country should pay this sum merely for the pleasure of keeping on a very bad currency.

Mr. Lowe

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON: In consequence of the withdrawal of the Amendment of the hon. Gentleman the Member for Hackney (Mr. Fawcett), my hon. Friend (Mr. E. Stanhope) is prevented from addressing the House again. As, however, there are some observations which it is necessary to notice, I venture to detain the House for a few moments before we go to a Division. The right hon. Gentleman who has just sat down has dealt with the great loss which the fall in the price of silver has placed, during the past few years, on the Revenue of India, and he calculates that that fall has imposed a loss of something like £3,400,000 annually on the Revenue of India. But my hon. Friend the Under Secretary of State explained that these figures only represented the loss by exchange, and did not mean that that sum is money in gold annually lost. He simply stated that that was the loss, applying to these figures exactly the same test as is applied to every other figure of the accounts—upon the number of rupees annually remitted to this country in order to make certain payments in gold in this country.

fore, the loss is not in gold; but it should be put in this way—that the Indian Government, in consequence of losses by exchange, have now to remit something like £3,400,000, or three crores 40 lacs, upon all the gold payments in this country, the difference between the nominal price of the rupee as taken in the accounts — namely, two shillings, and its actual market price in this country. But still, making all allowances for that difference, the loss is so serious that if anyone could suggest any practical means by which this loss could be reduced the Government would gladly adopt it. But in all propositions involving a change in the currency, we have to consider two separate questions. First, we have to consider whether or not any alteration in the standard will be suited to the wants and conditions of the people of India; and, secondly, we have to take care that any remedy or alteration proposed will mitigate, and not aggravate, the present condition of things. It seems to me, and I speak with all diffidence on this subject, that the great object we should have in view is to raise, if possible, the price of silver in London, and not in India. I believe that the purchasing power of the rupee in India has not greatly fallen, and that was, indeed, one of the first propositions of the right hon. Gentleman. It seems to me self-evident that so long as there is a great demand in India for silver, and a small demand for it in England, so long must the purchasing power of silver in India be greater than it is in England. Possibly, some proposition might be made by which the value of silver might be raised in England. Undoubtedly, the sale of the Secretary of State's bills in London has a most depressing effect upon the silver market. How depressing that is I can well illustrate by some figures which I laid before the House some two or three years ago. In the year 1876, there was a very sudden fall in the price of silver. I believe that experts differ as to the actual amount of silver in circulation throughout the world; but I believe the lowest estimate puts the amount at £600,000,000 sterling. It is a curious illustration that I am about to give of the connection between cause and effect. Between January and July of that year, the Secretary of State for India succeeded in selling £2,700,000 of ru-

Lord George Hamilton

pees. But the sale of those bills mainly, as I believe, reduced the price of silver as quoted in the London market by 11½ per cent! That very forcibly illustrates the extreme difficulty in which the Secretary of State for India was placed in getting rid, upon advantageous terms, of his drafts upon India. The proposition of the right hon. Gentleman is that we should issue notes in India to represent gold. The first criticism I make upon that is that no notes would have any value, unless they represent something; and although you may say they represent gold, unless the Government have the gold nobody will believe them. The second great objection I have to make is that if you once attempt to make silver a token currency, you involve yourselves in interminable difficulties with the occupiers of land. Then, what are you to do with the enormous amount of rupees in circulation in India, where, at present, there is no token currency, and the purchasing power of the rupee is exactly corresponding to the intrinsic value of the silver contained in it? Another objection is, that if you increase the currency of India by the printing press, by circulating notes, you must diminish the demand in India for silver; and as you diminish the demand for silver in India, so do you reduce the price of silver in London. Therefore, if we adopt the proposal of the right hon. Gentleman, it seems to me that it might have exactly the reverse effect of what we propose, and so far from increasing the price of silver in London, which is the main object of every remedy, it might do just the contrary. The silver market is undoubtedly in a state of excessive sensitiveness, and its extreme fluctuations have undoubtedly been aggravated by the Bills which the Secretary of State has been forced to sell. I think no one who has looked into the Home charges can believe that any great reduction can be effected. If you apply the most drastic scheme of economy, it could not, for many years, seriously effect the Home charges of the Indian Government, because nearly all of them are connected with services which have been rendered, with money which has been borrowed, with materials which have been forwarded for the benefit of India. Therefore, it is impossible materially to reduce the sums payable in gold in this country unless the Indian Government repudiates its liabilities, which, of course, is impossible. Such being the position of affairs, the Secretary of State must find ways and means to meet this Home liability. Of course, prima facie, nothing can be more objectionable than getting out of his difficulties by constantly borrowing in this country, because there can be little doubt that one of the main causes of the present condition of things was the system, adopted some years ago, of always borrowing in London for the benefit of the Indian Government. Unfortunately, owing to the peculiar system of accounts adopted, all the liability for the railways was excluded from the capital expenditure, and it was not until a very short time back that this House and the public became aware how great a debt the Indian Government had in England. If, then, it be objectionable, permanently to increase the debt by borrowing in England, I think it may very fairly be asked why the Government ask leave to raise a loan of £5,000,000 in this country? My hon. Friend the Member for Hackney (Mr. Fawcett) made a very unjust criticism upon the proposal, when he called it a proposal to speculate in silver. Now, Sir, so far from the Secretary of State for India having any wish to speculate in silver, I am quite sure I am only expressing the wish of everybody in the Office, when I say that their wish is to have nothing whatever to do with silver. Unfortunately, the Secretary of State, from the exigencies of his position, is the largest seller of silver in the world, and he is obliged to force his silver on the market, whether it is wanted or not. Now, the silver market is like an individual—it has got a digestion, and it can assimilate a certain amount of food. But, if you overload its digestion, like an individual, also, it has a fit of indigestion, and then it cannot assimilate the amount that it could before. I think there are indications that the exchange will improve. I saw a statement, the other day, in the newspapers, and it has not been since contradicted, that there is a complete failure of the Italian silk crop, and that the French crop has been materially affected. In the year 1876 there was a similar failure in the silk crop, and the result, though the House will hardly believe so incredible a statement, is that it made the exchanges rise 20 per cent. If there be this failure of the European silk crop, there will be an increased demand for Eastern silk, and that cannot fail to engender an increased demand for silver, and a rise in the exchanges. Suppose, then, by a judicious use of this loan of £5,000,000, though I hope the Secretary of State for India will only find it necessary to use a part of it, we are able to raise the price of the rupee. It by no means follows, although you may increase the permanent liability of the Indian Government in England, that therefore you are causing a larger number of rupees to be remitted from there. If, through the use of this loan, silver rises a penny in the rupee, that is a gain of 4 per cent, and upon a payment of £15,000,000, taking the rupee at 2s., it is a gain of £600,000; while if the Indian Government were to spend the whole of this loan, which is most improbable, it will only add permanently to the annual liability of India the sum of £200,000. What we have to consider to-night is not so much the net amount of pounds sterling which have to be paid, as the number of rupees which the Indian Government will have to get to England to meet these payments. Of course, the House may say, although I can hardly believe it under the circumstances, that it does not think it desirable that the Secretary of State for India should have any borrowing powers. If it does that, it will have the effect of forcing him to get home an enormous amount of silver from India. I read only the other day a letter in The Economist, written by an Indian merchant, which expresses so well what the position of the Secretary of State for India is with regard to these Bills, that I will just read two sentences—

“Why does the Secretary of State for India push his bills down people's throats? The result is that the poor draftsmen are the victims of speculators and the puppets of Exchange bankers.”

So far as I know, that is exactly correct. The number of purchasers of Indian bills is very small, and, therefore, they can drive by a combination the Secretary of State for India into a corner. It must be remembered that this matter of silver does not merely affect the Government of India. It affects also the whole of our Eastern trade. The depreciation in the value of silver need not necessarily injuriously affect those who trade to the countries where silver is the standard of value; but what is absolutely ruinous to the trade are these constant fluctuations up and down, because they render unstable the standard of value, which is the basis of calculation of the profits of the individual. I hope, if it was necessary to make out any case after the speech of my hon. Friend, that I have made out a case which will justify the House in giving its assent to this loan. The course of treatment which we are adopting very much resembles that course of medicine known as homœopathy, which, by giving the patient infinitesimal doses of the poison from which he is suffering, finally ejects it from the system altogether. Perhaps I may be permitted also to say a few words with regard to Indian finance. Undoubtedly the Resolution withdrawn last night which commenced with these words, "This House views with apprehension the condition of Indian finance," did give expression to a feeling of inquietude which it would be very foolish of me to ignore. One may very fairly ask—"What is the cause of that uneasiness?" It is not caused, as was said last night, by the hon. Member for Orkney (Mr. Laing), by any falling off in the Indian Revenues. Figures show that the Revenue, under seven years of extraordinary pressure, remain firm. Eliminating all disturbing influences, the taxes, which, seven years ago, brought in a certain sum, bring in now a larger sum. Neither can it be found in an increase of the ordinary Expenditure. I can show that there is very little increase in the Civil and Military Expenditure. Excluding the war in Afghanistan, there was no considerable increase in the Military Expenditure, and what increase there is was due almost exclusively to changes at home, in consequence of alterations in the terms on which men are enlisted. If, then, these apprehensions were not on account either of a great diminution of income or a great increase in Expenditure, what is the cause of it? I think the cause is that our Government, from the time it came into Office up to the present time, has been subjected to an almost unparalleled pressure. I can illustrate how enormous the strain has been by giving one set of figures. The Expenditure over and above the ordinary Expenditure of India, for which the Indian Government have had during the past seven years to find Ways and Means, taking the rupee at the ordinary rate of 2s., amounts to the enormous sum of upwards of £57,000,000. The items are £2,600,000 for the war in Afghanistan. That is an expenditure for which, no doubt, Her Majesty's Government are responsible, and they are quite ready to defend their action. The other items are £16,000,000 incurred on behalf of Famines, £28,700,000 incurred for Public Works, which, whether the system is right or wrong, is a system that was in existence when we came into Office, and £9,700,000 loss by exchange. I arrive at this last item by taking the average loss on exchange to India during the seven preceding years, and during the seven years we have been in Office, and the sum lost in the last seven years exceeds that lost in the first period by £2,700,000. Now, how has that £57,000,000 of exceptional Expenditure been met? It is very frequently said that the India Office takes a very optimistic view of Indian finance; but I think I may say in regard to myself and my hon. Friend that no figure or fact ever set by us before the House has been disputed. Nor do I think that even in my most sanguine mood I should ever have ventured to predict that India, during seven years of such extraordinary depreciation, would be able to meet so large a proportion of the charges out of her ordinary Revenue. Now, how has this amount been met? In three ways. By loans, by the reduction of cash balances, and by payments out of ordinary Revenue. The increase in loans during this seven years has been £33,400,000. There has been a decrease in the cash balances of £8,000,000, but, of that, £4,000,000 to municipalities; so that that makes a total, with the loans, of £37,400,000. Therefore, during these seven years of extraordinary depression, the Revenues of India have found very nearly £20,000,000 to meet the extraordinary charges. From these figures we may draw one very safe conclusion. If you could altogether eliminate from consideration these abnormal charges, no doubt the prospects of Indian finance would be most flourishing. If, on the other hand, every seven years these enormous charges are to be imposed upon the Indian Revenues, and we are to be required to find Ways and Means to the amount of £57,000,000 over and above the ordinary Expenditure, no words used in this House are sufficiently gloomy to depict the prospects of Indian finance. But I believe the right and correct view is that although these difficulties will from time to time occur, it is almost impossible for them to occur again simultaneously, as they have done. If we can only reduce our Expenditure, so as to increase that great margin between Expenditure and income which I have already mentioned, and if we are only fortunate enough in the future to have our one difficulty at a time to deal with, I believe, by thrifty and judicious administration of Indian finances, we can so increase the present margin between Revenue and Expenditure, that in a very short time those who now use such strong and gloomy language concerning the state of our finance will be the first to laugh at their own fears.

[Second Night]

Lord George Hamilton

Motion made, and Question proposed,
"That the Debate be now adjourned."
(Mr. J. K. Cross.)

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, the arrangement was that the debate should be taken on the Motion that Mr. Speaker do leave the Chair, and that if it lasted more than two nights, that the Resolutions should be passed, and the debate resumed at another stage of the proceedings. He hoped the House would permit that arrangement to stand, and the Vote for the loan to be taken now. The Government, of course, would feel bound, on the second reading of the Bill, for instance, if that were convenient, to put that stage of the Bill in such a position as would give full opportunities for further discussion.

MR. GLADSTONE, if he understood the Chancellor of the Exchequer rightly, believed what was of importance was to get through the first stage of the Loan Bill, and that the passing of the Budget Resolution was a matter of form of no practical importance. Unfortunately, they had not had two full nights' debate; and, under the circumstances, he thought the most convenient course would be that his debate should continue on a future night, but that the Government should be allowed at once to take the first stage of their Loan Bill. Otherwise, those who had already spoken would be able to speak again; while, as to the Under Secretary of State for India, he was sure the House would do in his case what it had not unfrequently done before, and permit him again to address it on matters arising in the debate.

MR. E. STANHOPE said, that, after the expression of the views entertained by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich, which seemed to be generally shared by the House, the Chancellor of the Exchequer would be prepared to adopt the course which he suggested. It would, therefore, be understood that the debate on going into Committee on the East India Accounts would be postponed to a future day, and that the Government should now be allowed to take the Resolution on the East India Loans Bill.

MR. FAWCETT, said, it would be very convenient for hon. Members if the Under Secretary of State for India, when he came to reply, would explain more explicitly what was to be the nature of the Commission of Inquiry into the state of the Indian Army which he proposed to appoint. Some persons thought it was to be a Commission in India, others said it would be a mere departmental inquiry, while others indulged the hope that it was to be a Commission not merely to inquire into departmental questions, but into all questions of military organization. Without such an inquiry, indeed, any attempt to reduce military expenditure would be perfectly ineffectual.

MR. GOSCHEN wished to urge upon the right hon. Gentleman the extreme importance of resuming the debate at the earliest possible date. The attention of the whole mercantile world, both in England and in India, was fixed upon the very serious issues raised in regard to the silver question. It was of the utmost importance that this question of the bearing of the depreciation of silver upon the Revenues of India should be discussed at the earliest possible moment, in order that no hopes might be raised which afterwards were frustrated by the impracticability of the schemes proposed. This question of silver must be argued out; and as he was the Chairman of the Committee which considered this question two years ago, and as he also represented the Government at the Conference which inquired into the silver question in Paris last year, he certainly should consider it his duty not to shrink from stating his views.

— and Night.\

Motion agreed to.

Debate further adjourned till Thursday, 12th June.

EAST INDIA [LOAN].

Considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That it is expedient to authorise the Secretary of State in Council of India to raise in the United Kingdom any sum or sums of money, not exceeding £10,000,000, for the service of the Government of India, on the security of the Revenues of India."

MR. E. STANHOPE, in moving the Resolutions, asked leave to say a few words on a point as to which some misunderstanding had arisen. He wished to make it clear upon what grounds the Government thought it necessary to refuse their assent to the proposition of the Indian Government with regard to the depreciation of silver. He mentioned that when these propositions were received, the Government thought they ought to be looked at not solely with reference to India, but with regard to the other interests to be considered. What he intended to convey to the House was, that they did consider not only what he might call Imperial interests, but the suitability of these propositions themselves to the special circumstances of the case—that was to say, they considered the propositions upon their merits. On both these grounds, after looking carefully into the matter, the Committee considered it their duty to recommend the rejection of the propositions of the Government of India. He had only now to ask leave to substitute five for ten in the proposed Resolution.

Amendment proposed, to leave out "£10,000,000," in order to insert "£5,000,000,"—(Mr. Edward Stanhope,)—instead thereof.

Question proposed, "That '£10,000,000' stand part of the proposed Resolution."

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL asked, whether the Correspondence would be given to the House which contained the despatch to the Government of India in regard to their proposals?

Mr. Goschen

MR. E. STANHOPE replied, that the Correspondence was not yet complete, but the despatch would shortly be sent. He was afraid for that reason it would not be possible at that moment to lay it before the House.

MR. GOSCHEN asked whether it would be possible for the Government to furnish the House with the latest information from the Consuls or other authorities abroad with regard to the production of silver in other countries? Investigations were made, bringing the information down to a certain date, and it would afford great satisfaction if Papers could be laid on the Table giving further information. Perhaps, also, during the Whitsuntide Recess the Government could obtain some fresh, distinct, official information from their Representatives in Berlin with regard to the stock of silver in Germany, and the sales of the German Government. He knew that a certain amount of secrecy had been observed in regard to this matter; but if an authentic statement could be placed before the House of the actual amount of silver sold up to the present time, it would be exceedingly advisable that that should be done. He would, indeed, go further, and ask the Government to give the House all the information in its possession on the subject of silver.

MR. E. STANHOPE replied, that the Government recently took steps to collect and systematize all the information on the subject in their possession. He did not know whether there were any further Papers on the subject which he would be able to lay on the Table; but he would look over those in his possession, and if he could give the House any further information he should be very glad to do so.

MR. ONSLOW suggested that the report of the Currency Commission of 1866, which elicited a great deal of very valuable information, should also be laid on the Table of the House.

Question put, and negatived.

Question, "That '£5,000,000' be inserted, instead thereof," put, and agreed to.

Main Question, as amended, put.

Resolved, That it is expedient to authorise the Secretary of State in Council of India to raise in the United Kingdom any sum or sums of money, not exceeding £5,000,000, for the service of the Government of India, on the security of the Revenues of India.

Resolution to be reported upon Monday next.

INTOXICATING LIQUORS (IRELAND) BILL.

THE ADJOURNED DEBATE.

MR. CALLAN said, that the hon. and learned Member (Mr. Sullivan), who had charge of the Bill had asserted that, unless he could move the second reading at an early day, he should move to discharge the Bill. He found that the hon. and learned Member had not put in an appearance, nor had he given any instructions on the subject. Under those circumstances, he (Mr. Callan) did not feel justified in moving that the Order be discharged; but he assured the House that if the Order was postponed until Monday, and the hon. and learned Member then did not move its discharge, he himself would do so.

MR. SPEAKER said, that in the event of no day being fixed for the adjourned debate it became a dropped Order.

COMMON LAW PROCEDURE AND JUDICATURE ACTS AMENDMENT BILL.

(Mr. Waddy, Mr. Wheelhouse, Mr. Ridley.)

[BILL 181.] SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. WADDY, in moving that the Bill be now read a second time, said, it had been submitted to the Attorney General, and had received his sanction. With the exception of some clauses at the end, which had reference to a matter of procedure, the Bill proposed simply to extend the powers of the official Referees, by giving them the opportunity of doing work which at present they were unable to do, and to prevent their getting into difficulties by conflicts of jurisdiction.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Waddy.)

MR. HERSCHELL did not know whether the Attorney General had given his careful attention to the Bill; but, for his part, he had considerable doubts as to the correctness of its principle. Instead of referring a matter to the Referee to decide, this Bill proposed to refer a case to him for decision once for all. He thought it was far preferable to adopt the procedure instituted by the Judicature Acts, and to send a matter to the Referee to report. He did not think it was at all an improvement to enable a Judge or the Court to refer a case to the Referee for him to decide as arbitrator. That should only be done by consent of the parties, as at present.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir JOHN HOLKER) thought the principle of the Bill was one which ought to be approved. It was at first the opinion that under the Judicature Acts a Referee could deal with the whole matter; but recent decisions had shown that that was not so, and that the Referee's power was very considerably defined and limited. For his part, where the parties to the action consented, and where the Court thought it right that the Referee should have full power to decide the whole matter, and how the costs should go, he could see no objection to such a rule. In his humble opinion, if such a provision were passed into law, it would render the Referees a great deal more useful than they were now, and would induce parties to go before them much more frequently than was at present the case. There were other provisions, with regard to giving bankers' notes in evidence, which he had not very carefully considered, and therefore he reserved to himself the right to consider these in Committee.

Motion agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed for Monday 9th June.

COSTS TAXATION (HOUSE OF COMMONS) BILL—[BILL 190.]

(Mr. Raikes, Mr. Mowbray.)

COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."—(Mr. Raikes.)

MR. W. H. JAMES moved the adjournment of the debate till after Whitsuntide. The Bill was only read a second time the night before; and though he believed its proposals were equitable, yet he thought that time should be given in order that the measure should be sent down to town clerks and others in the country whom it affected, for their consideration.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Debate be now adjourned."
—(Mr. James.)

Mr. RAIKES had not the least desire to ask the House to proceed with extraordinary haste; but he thought the hon. Gentleman was hardly acquainted with the objects of the Bill. It proposed no new costs and no new system of taxation, but simply proposed to legalize a system which had been in operation for 30 years, of taxing Provisional Orders and Bills of that description in the same way as if they were private Bills. The officer of the House in charge of these Bills had recently had occasion to consider the matter, and he came to the conclusion that there was some question as to its legality. As that officer was paid by salary and not by fees, it made no difference to him, and it was merely enacting the existing practice, because some doubts had arisen on the subject. It did not make any change in the existing practice, and did not impose any fresh costs.

Mr. COURTNEY said, if the Bill merely legalized an existing practice which had been pursued for so many years, it surely might be pursued a little longer. Why could not the hon. Gentleman allow the Bill to be postponed till after Witsuntide.

Question put.

The House divided:—Ayes 21; Noes 41: Majority 20.—(Div. List, No. 110.)

Main Question, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair," put, and agreed to.

Bill considered in Committee, and reported, without Amendment; to be read the third time upon Monday next.

BARRISTERS (IRELAND) BILL.

On Motion of Mr. CALLAN, Bill to amend the Law relating to the admission of Barristers to practise in Ireland, ordered to be brought in by Mr. CALLAN, Mr. PATRICK MARTIN, and Mr. KING-HARMAN.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 191.]

Mr. W. H. James

REGISTRATION OF PARLIAMENTARY VOTERS (IRELAND) BILL.

On Motion of Mr. CALLAN, Bill to amend the Law regulating the Registration of Parliamentary Voters in Ireland, ordered to be brought in by Mr. CALLAN, Mr. MAURICE BROOKS, and Major NOLAN.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 195.]

House adjourned at a quarter after One o'clock, till Monday next.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Monday, 26th May, 1879.

MINUTES.]—PUBLIC BILLS—First Reading—Local Government Provisional Orders (Aminster Union, &c.) * (94); Local Government (Highways) Provisional Orders (Buckingham, &c.) * (95); Local Government (Poor Law) Provisional Orders * (96); Summary Jurisdiction * (97); Trustee Acts Consolidation and Amendment * (98).

Second Reading—Committee negatived—Considered—Third Reading—Consolidated Fund (No. 3)*, and passed.

AFGHANISTAN—THE WAR—SIGNING OF A TREATY OF PEACE.

OBSERVATION.

VISCOUNT CRANBROOK: My Lords, I have an announcement to make to your Lordships. I have this day received a telegram from Major Cavagnari stating that he has this day signed a treaty with the Ameer of Cabul.

SOUTH AFRICA—NATAL AND THE TRANSVAAL—APPOINTMENT OF SIR GARNET WOLSELEY AS HIGH COMMISSIONER.—OBSERVATIONS.

THE EARL OF BEACONSFIELD: It may be convenient, and perhaps interesting, to your Lordships to know that Her Majesty has been pleased to appoint Lieutenant General Sir Garnet Wolseley to be Governor of Natal and the Transvaal, and to be High Commissioner and Commander-in-Chief in those Colonies, and in the lands adjacent to the North and East of those Colonies in South Africa. I believe that at this time Sir Bartle Frere has returned to Cape Town; and Sir Bartle Frere will exercise the power which he possesses in the Cape Colony, and in all the adjacent dependencies and regions attached. I ought, perhaps, to remind your Lordships—what it is necessary to remember in considering these matters—that the distance between the seat of Sir Bartle Frere's authority and the seat of war is upwards of 1,000 miles. Papers explanatory of these arrangements will be immediately placed on your Lordships' Table.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: I should like to know from the noble Earl, whether Sir Garnet Wolseley will have supreme command of the Military Forces?

THE EARL OF BEACONSFIELD: The rank which Sir Garnet Wolseley holds would give him immediately that supreme command; but I do not contemplate, in the statement I have made, that the country will be deprived of the services of Lord Chelmsford.

ARMY—THE BRIGADE DEPOT SYSTEM RESOLUTIONS.

THE EARL OF GALLOWAY, in rising to call attention to the Report of the Militia Committee presented to Parliament in 1877, and to move Resolutions, said, that towards the close of the Session of 1875 he ventured to bring before their Lordships three Resolutions condemnatory of the brigade depot system. Considerable discussion arose on that occasion, and he was induced to withdraw his Resolutions, upon the understanding that Her Majesty's Government would prosecute an inquiry into the matter. They had redeemed their promise by the appointment of the Militia Committee, presided over by Colonel Stanley, whose lengthy investigation had, he contended, shown that the system to which he referred had not worked well. He (the Earl of Galloway) should explain that this Committee was—to use the official explanation of it—termed “the Militia Committee,” for the sake of convenience, in order to distinguish it from the numerous other Committees previously appointed; and that the special instructions issued to this Committee were “to inquire into the working of the Brigade Depot System.” There seemed to be some considerable confusion in the public mind as regarded the two questions of short service and the brigade depot system. It was supposed by many persons that the two systems were identical, and some excuse had been made for the failure of the brigade depot system on account of the institution of short service. It was, however, a mistake to suppose that the two systems were identical. The Short Service Act was introduced by the noble Viscount opposite (Viscount Cardwell) in the year 1870, and it was not until two years later that the brigade depot system was instituted. What he (the Earl of Galloway) wanted to suggest was that it was very lamentable that, owing to the Short Service Act, the troops now engaged in South Africa and elsewhere should be so young and of such limited service in the Army. But the circumstance that the regiments at home had to be emasculated in order to make up the regiments for these expeditions was due, not to the short service system, but to the system of brigade depots, which might be called the cradle of attenuated battalions. The objections which he had urged against the military policy of the noble Viscount opposite in both Houses of Parliament were directed to those parts of it which would have the effect of reducing the personnel and war material of the Army and of abolishing Purchase, his main reason for the course he took with regard to the latter question being that he saw no reason for imposing an additional pecuniary obligation on the country without a corresponding advantage being gained; whilst, on the former point, the noble Viscount had been forced himself to commence re-augmentation before leaving the War Office. He had never criticized the determination of the noble Viscount with regard to the short service system; indeed, he thought the noble Viscount had been somewhat hardly treated by those who had done so, seeing that it had hardly had a fair trial. If all those who had enlisted under it had remained in the ranks for six years—some of them had been allowed to go after three—there would not have been so much cause for complaint as existed at the present moment. He was not, however, a disciple of the system of short service; indeed, he had always disapproved of it, it being his opinion that the country should look to the Militia for Reserves. At the present moment there were 100,000 to 120,000 Militiamen in the country, one-fourth of whom were available as Militia Reserves. We could not afford to have attenuated battalions in our Regular Force to any large extent; and, therefore, he would suggest that the Militia should be increased to the tune of 200,000 men, and that two-fifths of that number should serve as Militia Reserves, and be available at any moment to strengthen the battalions of the Line. He was emboldened to state that view on account of having that morning read a speech to the same effect of the late Lord Sandhurst. He thought the country was indebted to the noble Viscount for having attempted to combine the different Military Forces of the Kingdom. The failure of that attempt was, he contended, a matter for regret. The country was indebted to the noble Viscount for having given Queen's commissions to the officers of the Auxiliary Forces, and for having taken steps to improve their knowledge of their duties. He contended that the nature of the avowed policy of the noble Viscount during the first three years of his military administration was such as to entitle him to expect that the noble Viscount would support the first of the Resolutions which he (the Earl of Galloway) had placed upon the Paper. He proposed, with the aid of extracts from the speeches of the noble Viscount, to show how different was the plan for military re-organization which was suggested in 1872 from that proposed in the three previous years; and how the plan which eventually was carried out differed from that which the noble Viscount previously announced as about to be carried out. He proposed afterwards, as the Government had advertised their utter incompetency to deal with the question, to make a few suggestions, by the adoption of which the present unfortunate state of affairs might in a measure be rectified. He would ask their Lordships to travel back 10 years—to the "first Session of the General Reformation Parliament." The noble Viscount then said that there were in the regiments of Guards not only a general commanding the whole brigade, but also a lieutenant-colonel, who was the head of a brigade within a brigade, to which he (the noble Viscount) greatly objected, and that he proposed that a lieutenant-colonel of the Guards should in future in reality command his own battalion. Now, that very system of having an officer at the head of a brigade within a brigade was exactly what the noble Viscount instituted in 1872 all over the country. The noble Viscount also stated in 1869 that he agreed that the cost of depôts was much too great, and undertook to reduce it. Their Lordships would, however, see, by-and-bye, that the cost of the depôts, now become brigade depôts, had by no means been reduced; but, on the contrary, considerably increased. In 1870, the noble Viscount took great credit to himself for having reduced the number of officers; but, at the present moment, in the event of real war, was it certain that we should find ourselves at all overburdened with officers in the junior ranks? That was a point on which he (the Earl of Galloway) had very serious doubts. The noble Viscount also propounded a scheme for "consolidating together the whole of our military system, Regulars and Reserves." With all due respect for his noble Friend, he could not think that our military system had really been welded together in a satisfactory way. Early in the year 1871 the noble Viscount made a statement to the effect that it was the desire of the country that all their Military Forces should, as far as possible, be formed into one harmonious body. With that view, he said, they had provided in the Estimates for a colonel and staff for each of the sub-districts; that the colonel, who was to be a kind of brigadier, would have under him between 15,000 and 20,000 of the Auxiliary Forces. Such was the scheme of the noble Viscount; but he regretted to say that experience showed that the brigade depot system was costly and inefficient, and that it removed a great number of officers from the command of their proper officer, and placed them under that of the commander of the depot battalion. If the comprehensive idea of the noble Viscount had been carried out, if each of the sub-districts contained from 15,000 to 20,000 of our Auxiliary Forces, there would be no occasion for more than 16 or 18 sub-districts; but, as it was, they numbered about 70. The officer in command of each of the sub-districts was to be a brigadier—meaning that he was not to have anything to do with regimental duties. Such was the scheme of 1871. In the following year, the noble Viscount referred to his declared policy of the previous Session, and his desire to combine together in one harmonious whole all the Forces provided for by the Votes of Parliament. The number of regiments on foreign service had, he pointed out, been reduced—a fact which enabled them to have the number of regiments at home and abroad nearly equal; and reference was made to the short service system, established in 1870, with a view to secure a competent Reserve. The noble Viscount referred, at some length, to the advantage of localizing the Forces. It identified the men with the locality; it induced men in the Militia to join the Army; it attracted recruits to the Army, and prevented the competition which had existed in recruiting between the Army and the Militia. He (the Earl of Galloway) could not help thinking that some of these objects had not been attained. The noble Viscount added that one great object of any military system in time of peace was to prepare for a state of war; and the test, he said, of a peace organization, was its ability to place as large a Force in the field as was consistent with a peace expenditure. The noble Viscount then unfolded his plan, which was very different from that he had sketched out in the previous year. It was intended, he said, that of two Line battalions united in one brigade, one should be at home, and the other abroad; that two Militia regiments should be associated with them in the same brigade, with a colonel of the Regular Army acting as brigadier; and he added that it was intended to create 66 sub-districts throughout the country—a different proposal from that which was made the year before. The noble Viscount had a great and laudable object in view, and that was the combination of the whole of our military system. He thought he might describe the noble Viscount's two propositions in this way—that, during the first three years of his administration, he had in his mind a scheme both comprehensive and comprehensible; that, in the year 1872, he still had in his mind a scheme which was comprehensible, but the reverse of comprehensive; and that the scheme, as it was actually carried out, was both incomprehensible and incomprehensible; and, without any intention of implying disrespect, he did not think that in the end the noble Viscount comprehended the conditions of the system which he had been so anxious to introduce. He therefore thought that the time had come when their Lordships and the country should fully understand something about it. It was well known that the system was adopted chiefly on the recommendation of Major General Macdougall's Committee of 1871, who, in a Memorandum which he submitted to the Militia Committee of 1876, which was considering the question, said—

The Earl of Galloway

“The advantages of linked battalions over an organization in regiments of one battalion only cannot be exaggerated, and, indeed, are not disputed.”

Now, only a week ago, the illustrious Duke on the cross-benches (the Duke of Cambridge) gave it to be understood that he did not see how the system of linked battalions was to be carried out; and his (the Earl of Galloway's) own belief was that if the evidence of Major General Macdougall was carefully read by the editors of the leading newspapers in this country, and commented upon by them in their journals, the brigade depot system would, within a very few weeks, come to an end. For what did the gallant General go on to say? In answer to Major General Herbert, he stated—

“In all cases where the two linked battalions were abroad in time of war, though it is not very likely they would be both abroad”—

In his (the Earl of Galloway's) opinion, a very erroneous impression, seeing that, at the present moment, we had 85 battalions abroad and only 55 at home—

“Two Militia regiments would be embodied. These two Militia regiments,” he added, “will practically take the place of the two linked regiments of the Line.”

So that, in order to carry out this system, we ought, at the present moment, considering there were 85 battalions abroad and only 55 at home, to have 15 battalions of Militia embodied and to have raised 15 depot battalions, of six or eight companies each, containing 600 or 800 men. Pressed to state what was the great advantage of the linked battalion system, Major General Macdougall finally admitted his meaning to be that an organization, not of linked battalions, but of three battalions, was “an immense advantage over an organization of regiments of one battalion”—a fact which nobody disputed. Now, a system of three battalions was intelligible; but when they were entirely dependent, ^{on each other} one being invariably kept at home to the order to carry out the linked brigade or brigade depot system, and ~~them~~ which fore, the loss is not in gold; but it should be put in this way—that the Indian Government, in consequence of losses by exchange, have now to remit something like £3,400,000, or three crores 40 lacs, upon all the gold payments in this country, the difference between the nominal price of the rupee as taken in the accounts — namely, two shillings, and its actual market price in this country. But still, making all allowances for that difference, the loss is so serious that if anyone could suggest any practical means by which this loss could be reduced the Government would gladly adopt it. But in all propositions involving a change in the currency, we have to consider two separate questions. First, we have to consider whether or not any alteration in the standard will be suited to the wants and conditions of the people of India; and, secondly, we have to take care that any remedy or alteration proposed will mitigate, and not aggravate, the present condition of things. It seems to me, and I speak with all diffidence on this subject, that the great object we should have in view is to raise, if possible, the price of silver in London, and not in India. I believe that the purchasing power of the rupee in India has not greatly fallen, and that was, indeed, one of the first propositions of the right hon. Gentleman. It seems to me self-evident that so long as there is a great demand in India for silver, and a small demand for it in England, so long must the purchasing power of silver in India be greater than it is in England. Possibly, some proposition might be made by which the value of silver might be raised in England. Undoubtedly, the sale of the Secretary of State's bills in London has a most depressing effect upon the silver market. How depressing that is I can well illustrate by some figures which I laid before the House some two or three years ago. In the year 1876, there was a very sudden fall in the price of silver. I believe that experts differ as to the actual amount of silver in circulation throughout the world; but I believe the lowest estimate puts the amount at £600,000,000 sterling. It is a curious illustration that I am about to give of the connection between cause and effect. Between January and July of that year, the Secretary of State for India succeeded in selling £2,700,000 of ru-

Lord George Hamilton

pees. But the sale of those bills mainly, as I believe, reduced the price of silver as quoted in the London market by 11½ per cent! That very forcibly illustrates the extreme difficulty in which the Secretary of State for India was placed in getting rid, upon advantageous terms, of his drafts upon India. The proposition of the right hon. Gentleman is that we should issue notes in India to represent gold. The first criticism I make upon that is that no notes would have any value, unless they represent something; and although you may say they represent gold, unless the Government have the gold nobody will believe them. The second great objection I have to make is that if you once attempt to make silver a token currency, you involve yourselves in interminable difficulties with the occupiers of land. Then, what are you to do with the enormous amount of rupees in circulation in India, where, at present, there is no token currency, and the purchasing power of the rupee is exactly corresponding to the intrinsic value of the silver contained in it? Another objection is, that if you increase the currency of India by the printing press, by circulating notes, you must diminish the demand in India for silver; and as you diminish the demand for silver in India, so do you reduce the price of silver in London. Therefore, if we adopt the proposal of the right hon. Gentleman, it seems to me that it might have exactly the reverse effect of what we propose, and so far from increasing the price of silver in London, which is the main object of every remedy, it might do just the contrary. The silver market is undoubtedly in a state of excessive sensitiveness, and its extreme fluctuations have undoubtedly been aggravated by the Bills which the Secretary of State has been forced to sell. I think no one who has looked into the Home charges can believe that any great reduction can be effected. If you apply the most drastic scheme of economy, it could not, for many years, seriously effect the Home charges of the Indian Government, because nearly all of them are connected with services which have been rendered, with money which has been borrowed, with materials which have been forwarded for the benefit of India. Therefore, it is impossible materially to reduce the sums payable in gold in this country unless the Indian Government repudiates its liabilities, which, of course, is impossible. Such being the position of affairs, the Secretary of State must find ways and means to meet this Home liability. Of course, prima facie, nothing can be more objectionable than getting out of his difficulties by constantly borrowing in this country, because there can be little doubt that one of the main causes of the present condition of things was the system, adopted some years ago, of always borrowing in London for the benefit of the Indian Government. Unfortunately, owing to the peculiar system of accounts adopted, all the liability for the railways was excluded from the capital expenditure, and it was not until a very short time back that this House and the public became aware how great a debt the Indian Government had in England. If, then, it be objectionable, permanently to increase the debt by borrowing in England, I think it may very fairly be asked why the Government ask leave to raise a loan of £5,000,000 in this country? My hon. Friend the Member for Hackney (Mr. Fawcett) made a very unjust criticism upon the proposal, when he called it a proposal to speculate in silver. Now, Sir, so far from the Secretary of State for India having any wish to speculate in silver, I am quite sure I am only expressing the wish of everybody in the Office, when I say that their wish is to have nothing whatever to do with silver. Unfortunately, the Secretary of State, from the exigencies of his position, is the largest seller of silver in the world, and he is obliged to force his silver on the market, whether it is wanted or not. Now, the silver market is like an individual—it has got a digestion, and it can assimilate a certain amount of food. But, if you overload its digestion, like an individual, also, it has a fit of indigestion, and then it cannot assimilate the amount that it could before. I think there are indications that the exchange will improve. I saw a statement, the other day, in the newspapers, and it has not been since contradicted, that there is a complete failure of the Italian silk crop, and that the French crop has been materially affected. In the year 1876 there was a similar failure in the silk crop, and the result, though the House will hardly believe so incredible a statement, is that it made the exchanges rise 20 per cent. If there

be this failure of the European silk crop, there will be an increased demand for Eastern silk, and that cannot fail to engender an increased demand for silver, and a rise in the exchanges. Suppose, then, by a judicious use of this loan of £5,000,000, though I hope the Secretary of State for India will only find it necessary to use a part of it, we are able to raise the price of the rupee. It by no means follows, although you may increase the permanent liability of the Indian Government in England, that therefore you are causing a larger number of rupees to be remitted from there. If, through the use of this loan, silver rises a penny in the rupee, that is a gain of 4 per cent, and upon a payment of £15,000,000, taking the rupee at 2s., it is a gain of £600,000; while if the Indian Government were to spend the whole of this loan, which is most improbable, it will only add permanently to the annual liability of India the sum of £200,000. What we have to consider to-night is not so much the net amount of pounds sterling which have to be paid, as the number of rupees which the Indian Government will have to get to England to meet these payments. Of course, the House may say, although I can hardly believe it under the circumstances, that it does not think it desirable that the Secretary of State for India should have any borrowing powers. If it does that, it will have the effect of forcing him to get home an enormous amount of silver from India. I read only the other day a letter in The Economist, written by an Indian merchant, which expresses so well what the position of the Secretary of State for India is with regard to these Bills, that I will just read two sentences—

“Why does the Secretary of State for India push his bills down people's throats? The result is that the poor draftsmen are the victims of speculators and the puppets of Exchange bankers.”

So far as I know, that is exactly correct. The number of purchasers of Indian bills is very small, and, therefore, they can drive by a combination the Secretary of State for India into a corner. It must be remembered that this matter of silver does not merely affect the Government of India. It affects also the whole of our Eastern trade. The depreciation in the value of silver need not necessarily injuriously affect a many-headed Bill that is dragging through a weary discussion, and it is doubtful when it may become law. Further, the noble Lord the Under Secretary of State recently, in an excellent official speech, showed that his Department thoroughly understands how "not to do it"—there were perfect explanations why the soldiers were young, and the sergeants inexperienced, and the legislative provisions defective; but he made only languid reference to intended remedies for recognized defects, although this particular weak spot in the system—the locking up of the Reserves—was noticed three years ago, and was the subject of much inquiry before this very Militia Committee, of which Colonel Stanley himself was Chairman. I do not follow the noble Earl (the Earl of Galloway) through the interesting details of his speech; but I prefer to give an example of the working of the existing system as it bears upon a particular regiment, the Returns of which I have been able to see. It is a two battalion regiment—one abroad, one at home; from the battalion at home, in the last six months, 352 soldiers have gone, and have been nearly replaced by recruits, some partially drilled at a depôt, some the raw article. And this is supposed to be an efficient battalion, one of the first on the roster for foreign service, or to take its place in the first line of any Army Corps that might be formed. With 141 recruits at drill, and 15 lads, its efficiency must be seriously reduced. And I may give an example of what bystanders think of the present state of things. Two general officers were present on a recent occasion in this House, and heard the views of three noble Viscounts and of other speakers: one of them near the Throne observed to me—"They may say what they please, the whole thing is rotten;" the other at the Bar afterwards said to me—"Why did not you insist on speaking, and tell them that the system is rotten?" Now, I do not say that the whole thing is rotten, because we have that good material to work upon—loyal officers and the right stuff for soldiers; but the right stuff wants keeping. There is no reason why we should be afraid of progress. I remember the change, adopted with some misgiving, from flint locks to percussion arms, and subsequent improvements, until breech-loaders were introduced. But improvement may go too fast. At Lord Panmure's Recruiting Commission in 1866, when the period of enlistment had been reduced to 10 and 12 years, renewable to 21 years, most of the witnesses were asked if they had heard any one speak well of this system. None of them had anything to say in its favour, except theoretically. Encouraged by which, the next Government reduced the term still further, and landed us in our present difficulty. I cannot help thinking that we have been in rather too great a hurry in jumping at short service. In our anxiety to create a Reserve, we have too much weakened our first line. And to reduce the system of long service with pension we have introduced something like short service with pension; and the Under Secretary of State for War further states that we must be so tender with our Reserves that they must not be worried by anything to remind them that they are soldiers, except, of course, their Reserve pay. There is no occasion to go back to bows and arrows, or flint locks; but we may consider whether we may not have made a mistake in recent changes. All the mutual admiration that may be exchanged across the Table does not alter the fact that regiments have been sent abroad hastily completed with untrained men, and that if re-inforcements are required, they must be of the same character. The matter requires all the attention that the Government, with the assistance of both sides of the House, can give to it.

[Second Night.]

VISCOUNT BURY said, he did not intend at that time to go into the details of the general military system which had just been attacked by the noble and gallant Earl (the Earl of Longford), who had, as usual, spoken very plainly to the House upon the subject. It was somewhat curious that his noble Friend who introduced the subject (the Earl of Galloway) devoted most of his speech, not to an attack on the Government, but to an attack on the noble Viscount opposite (Viscount Cardwell), whom he (Viscount Bury) would leave to defend himself and his policy. But he had two things to do—he had to show that the Government were not unmindful of the present condition of affairs, but were adopting the course they believed most conducive to putting matters right; and he had to show that the position was one for which they were not altogether responsible. The noble Earl who brought forward the Motion talked as if the Committee now to be appointed by the Government was to follow on the same lines and deal with the same materials as the two previous Committees. The Committee of 1872, however, was appointed by the noble Viscount opposite, and it resulted in the establishment of the brigade depôt system, in the details of which there were, no doubt, grave defects. The Committee of 1876 dealt not, as had been supposed, with short service, but with the detailed working of the brigade depôt system, and the way in which it affected the Militia. Now, the Committee which the Government proposed to appoint was a purely military Committee, which would deal with existing defects. He had only to refer their Lordships to the speech delivered by the noble Earl that evening, to show how unfitted such an Assembly as theirs would be to deal with the numerous details which had been brought before them. It was acknowledged on all hands that there were defects in the way in which our recruits were sent forward, and the way in which our cadres were filled. The question was, therefore, essentially a military one, and it was a question which ought to be advised upon by military men. He understood his noble Friend (the Earl of Galloway) to say that some decision should be immediately arrived at. But he would ask how was the Secretary of State to come to a right decision unless he appealed to the military men who surrounded him upon this purely military question? The Committee which would be appointed would consist of military men of the highest standing in the country—as his right hon. and gallant Friend the Secretary of State would take every means to assemble around him those whose opinions would carry most weight—and they would investigate, as only military men could investigate, the details of the brigade depôt system. It was for that reason that he did not propose to go into the details into which his noble Friend who moved the Resolutions did, and with which it was impossible for the House to deal. The noble and gallant Earl who had spoken last (the Earl of Longford) said that a short Bill should be introduced to enable the short service men who wished to do so to return to the Colours. There was already a measure on the Table of the other House containing a clause which dealt with this question. To introduce an Act of Parliament for the purpose of bringing back Reserve men to their Colours was a thing which was much easier said than done, and one which would not result in any saving of time; because experience showed that there were difficulties in getting a measure through the other House quickly, and no doubt, as the subject involved grave Constitutional questions, such a Bill would most certainly be considered by a great number of Members in the other House, and would be warmly debated, and at great length. He held, therefore, that such a Bill as the noble Earl had proposed would not facilitate matters. The question should be left in the position which it now occupied. The Bill which contained the clause referring to it had been read a second time, and was at present being debated in a Committee of the House of Commons. The Government could not be justly blamed for delay, for they could not force a measure through a free House of Commons or through their Lordships' House. Any measure that might be introduced would have to be considered for a reasonable time; and the Government had therefore refrained from bringing forward such a Bill as was proposed by the noble and gallant Earl. A military Committee alone constituted the proper machinery by means of which the Government could inform themselves on the details of the question before their Lordships; and, as he had shown, the course which the Government had pursued, of leaving the question to the ordinary channels of the other House for decision, was, on the whole, the one most likely to save time.

The Earl of Longford

THE DUKE OF BUCCLEUCH said, he entirely concurred in the views of the noble Earl who had opened the debate (the Earl of Galloway), and in many points he could, from his own experience, corroborate the noble Earl. He could not speak of the depôt system generally; but he was strongly adverse to the system pursued in the depôt to which the regiment with which he was recently connected had the misfortune to be attached. The locality in which this depôt was placed was very much exposed to the north and north-east. The subsoil of the locality was wet, while the surface of the ground was composed of clay. There was no place in the neighbourhood fit for drilling in, or for the movements of battalions. He did not know whether the officer commanding the 62nd depôt was a Staff officer or a regimental officer, as he was seldom seen there, and lived many miles away from it. It was, in fact, often very difficult to know who was commanding officer at the depôt. Sometimes it was the senior captain, who had not given himself leave of absence; but at other times it was the quarter-master sergeant, or the orderly-room clerk. He was glad to hear that the Government contemplated the immediate appointment of a Committee to go into the whole system of the sub-district, depôt, and long and short service systems. Under these circumstances, he did not think that further discussion would lead to any practical result; and, therefore, he suggested that the Motion of the noble Earl should be withdrawn.

VISCOUNT CARDWELL said, he must be allowed to express his surprise at the remarks of the noble Duke who had just spoken (the Duke of Buccleuch). He (Viscount Cardwell) would remind the noble Duke that he was himself one of the most important Members of the Committee which sat in 1876 to inquire into the system that now existed, and that the concluding words of the Report of that Committee were highly commendatory. Those words were to this effect—

"The Committee trust that the conclusions which they have the honour to submit may result in the full development of the system of organization which, upon the recommendation of the highest military authorities, has been so recently adopted and approved by Parliament and by the country."

He was, therefore, very much astonished to hear the noble Duke express the opinions which their Lordships had heard. The opinions of the noble Duke had undergone a most remarkable change since 1876. He did not think it was at all necessary to follow the noble Earl who had first addressed their Lordships upon the subject before them (the Earl of Galloway) into the details he had brought forward in support of the Motion; and inasmuch as the noble Earl had made copious quotations from his (Viscount Cardwell's) speeches, he should take care to trouble their Lordships very little now. The noble Earl had pointed out that in his earlier career he (Viscount Cardwell) took a view about depôt centres which differed from that which he supported in 1872. The explanation was this—the early opinions were rudimentary opinions, expressed in the course of discussions in the other House. When, however, he came to reduce those views into a practical form, he consulted the illustrious Duke (the Duke of Cambridge), and a Memorandum was prepared advising how those views were to be carried into effect. A Committee was afterwards appointed for the purpose of suggesting the mode in which the work was to be done; and the views to which he referred were repeatedly considered and finally adopted, the expense necessary before they could be put into practice being unanimously sanctioned by the House of Commons, and not questioned by their Lordships' House. The greater part of the speech of his noble Friend had been devoted to faults which were found with the manner in which the system he had introduced had been carried out. But for these faults, he could hardly be held responsible, as he had ceased in 1874 to have any power or control over that system, though he might concur in some of the steps taken by the War Department under the present Government. He did not deny that there might be some faults or defects which it might be necessary to remedy; and although he should not himself think it necessary to propose the appointment of any Committee, he thought it a proper course; and if it were the intention of Her Majesty's Government, in spite of the Report of the Secretary of State, to institute further inquiry, he should be delighted to see it enter upon its labours, and trusted that it might be attended with public advantage.

The Duke of Buccleuch

LORD TRURO asked, whether a list of the names of the proposed Committee, which had appeared in some of the military papers, was correct?

VISCOUNT BURY said, he had not seen the list referred to. As soon as the Committee had been selected, the names would be published.

THE EARL OF LIMERICK observed, that, as a Member of the Committee to which reference had been made, he had signed the Report, because he believed the system inaugurated by the noble Viscount (Viscount Cardwell) could be best carried out in the manner suggested by the Committee. The Committee was appointed to carry out a system which had received the assent of Parliament, and in respect of which a large amount of money had been spent. If the question before them had been an open one, he thought it likely that the Report would not have been in all respects what it was.

THE DUKE OF BUCOLEUCH said, as the noble Viscount opposite (Viscount Cardwell) had accused him of a change of opinion on the subject, he wished to explain that, in signing the Report, he had acquiesced in some things with which he did not altogether agree. He did so in the hope that the new system would prove to be successful; but, as the result of practical experience of it, he must say that he was disappointed in that expectation.

THE EARL OF GALLOWAY expressed himself satisfied with the discussion he had raised, and would withdraw his Motion.

Motion (by Leave of the House) withdrawn.

CONSOLIDATED FUND (NO. 3) BILL.

Read 2^a (according to Order); Committee negatived: Then Standing Orders Nos. XXXVII. and XXXVIII. considered (according to order), and dispensed with: Bill read 3^a and passed.

House adjourned at Eight o'clock,
till to-morrow, half-past Ten o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Monday, 26th May, 1879.

MINUTES.]—SUPPLY—considered in Committee—CIVIL SERVICE ESTIMATES, Class III.; CIVIL SERVICES, Classes I. to VII.; and REVENUE DEPARTMENTS.

PUBLIC BILLS—Resolution in Committee—East India Loan (Consolidated Fund)*.

Resolution [May 23] reported—Ordered—First Reading—East India Loan (£5,000,000) [197].

Ordered—First Reading—Conveyancing and Land Transfer (Scotland)* [198]; Lord Clerk Register (Scotland)* [196]; Grand Juries (Ireland)* [199].

Second Reading—Metropolis (Whitechapel and Limehouse) Improvement Scheme Amendment* [184]; Inclosure Provisional Order (Matterdale Common)* [171]; Inclosure Provisional Order (Redmoor and Golberdon Commons)* [172]; Inclosure Provisional Order (East Stainmore Common)* [174].

Committee—Public Health Act (1875) Amendment [33]—R.P.

Committee—Report—Local Government (Ireland) Provisional Orders (Clonmel, &c.)* [166]; Local Government Provisional Orders (Artizans' and Labourers' Dwellings)* [159]; Gas and Water Provisional Orders Confirmation (re-comm.)* [136]; Local Government Provisional Order (Abergavenny)* [137]; Local Government Provisional Orders (Aysgarth Union, &c.)* [142].

Third Reading—Costs Taxation (House of Commons)* [190], and passed.

PETITION.

AFGHANISTAN—(EXPENSES OF MILITARY OPERATIONS)—INCIDENCE OF EXPENDITURE.

PETITION PRESENTED.

MR. GLADSTONE: I beg to present a Petition from the Bombay branch of the East India Association against charging upon the Revenues of India all the expenditure of the Afghan War. A summary of their statements on the subject is this—they believe, in the first place, that all Indian opinion is extremely adverse to such a measure. In the second place, they consider that the action and policy of Her Majesty's Government in this war has been directly opposed to the spirit and wording of the 56th section of the Government of India Act, and they ask for a disapproval of it by the House. In the third place, they state that the vote by which this expenditure was sanctioned, on the part of Parliament, was principally founded on the allegation of a surplus Revenue of £1,500,000, by which the charge was to be defrayed; but that that surplus does not really exist, and that the Famine Insurance Fund is absorbed. In the fourth place they state that, although the official estimate of the expenses of the war is £3,000,000, the prevalent belief in India is that it will not cost less than £5,000,000; and they finally refer to a declaration, which they conceive to have been made by Members of Her Majesty's Government, to the effect that the war has been made for European, and not for Indian interests.

Notice taken, that 40 Members were not present; House counted, and 40 Members being found present,

SOUTH AFRICA—THE CIVIL AND MILITARY COMMANDS.—STATEMENT.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Sir, it may be of interest to the House that I should state that, after full consideration of the condition of affairs in South Africa, Her Majesty's Government have decided that the arrangements, under which the chief Civil and Military authority in the neighbourhood of the seat of war is distributed among four different persons, can no longer be deemed adequate to the requirements of the present juncture. They have, therefore, decided on appointing Sir Garnet Wolseley to the supreme Civil and Military command in Natal, the Transvaal, and the Native territories to the Northward and Eastward of these Colonies, now the seat of war. It will be remembered that this district is at a distance of more than 1,000 miles from Cape Town, where, during the approaching Session of the Cape Parliament, Sir Bartle Frere must be engaged on important and pressing affairs. Papers will at once be laid on the Table explaining the precise nature of the change, and the reasons for it.

MR. W. E. FORSTER: I did not quite gather from what fell from the right hon. Gentleman whether the Transvaal was to be under the new arrangement or not?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Yes; I said that Sir Garnet Wolseley was to be Governor of Natal and the Transvaal.

MR. CHILDERS said, that unless the amount of the Estimates and Expenditure for the war in South Africa were laid on the Table before Thursday fortnight, he would ask when hon. Members might expect it to be produced?

AGRICULTURAL STATISTICS — THE CORN RETURNS.—QUESTION.

MR. CLARE READ asked the President of the Board of Trade, If the amount of wheat returned as sold in the 150 market towns of England and Wales from which the Corn Returns are compiled fell from 3,579,623 quarters, in 1865, to 1,942,688 quarters, in 1879; whether he accounts for this great diminution by the inefficient collection of the present Returns; whether, notwithstanding the frequent re-sales included in these Returns, they represent less than one-fifth of the wheat grown in England; and, whether he has any grounds for believing that the averages calculated upon this basis fairly represent the prices the grower receives for his wheat?

VISCOUNT SANDON: Sir, the subject which is raised by my hon. Friend's Question is a difficult and complicated one, and if I were to endeavour to reply to it I should be obliged to enter into an argument, and, in fact, to make a speech of some length. I have had a careful Memorandum prepared by the Statistical Department of the Board of Trade, and I propose to lay it very shortly upon the Table of the House, so that I may give my hon. Friend all the information that I can obtain on this matter, respecting which I am aware that very considerable interest is felt.

RIBANDISM (IRELAND).—QUESTIONS.

MR. VERNER asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland, If he has seen the statement of Mr. W. Sinclair, of Holy Hill, county of Tyrone, in the "Daily Express" of May 16th, in which that gentleman says—

"Myself detained by illness abroad, I can only hope that the late outrage will draw some attention to the general state of the district, which is at present under the absolute rule of a Ribbon Distillery Gang;"

and, whether this alleged state of things will be at once investigated and put down?

MR. MITCHELL HENRY: Before the right hon. Gentleman replies to the Question, I beg to ask him the Question on the same subject of which I gave him private Notice. It is, Whether he has seen a letter from Mr. Gallaher in the "Londonderry Journal" of the 21st instant, contradicting the statement of Mr. Sinclair, and alleging that the outrage was not a Ribbon outrage, but the result of an Orange conspiracy; and, whether the letter of Mr. Sinclair from Biarritz, in the South of France, stating that certain districts in the county Tyrone were under the absolute rule of a Ribbon distillery gang, is not a great exaggeration of the circumstances of the illicit distillation which is carried on in the neighbourhood, and which was common in various parts of Ireland just as much amongst Protestants as Catholics?

MR. CALLAN also asked, If the Chief Secretary for Ireland has seen the statement of Mr. Patrick Gallaher, of Strabane, in the county of Tyrone, in the "Londonderry Journal," referring to the letter in the "Daily Express" of Mr. Sinclair, of Holy Hill, county Tyrone, of which Mr. Gallaher states "a more unfair communication was never penned by any man assuming to be a gentleman," and that—

"If Mr. Sinclair honestly investigated the matter he would find that the perpetrators of the outrage are closely connected with his own place, where there are a number of rabid Orangemen," and "that there was strong evidence to show that it was the work of some members of that blood-stained society;"

and, whether Mr. Sinclair made any information of the "stills," of the working of which he found traces on ten different farms on his property, or whether he took any steps whatever to abate that nuisance?

MR. J. LOWTHER: Sir, my attention has been called to some correspondence conducted through the Irish Press, in which statements and counter-statements of a recriminatory nature have been indulged in. I am not in a position myself to decide which of the contending parties is in fault; but the only point I think I am called upon to answer is whether at the present time I have reason to believe the district referred to is "under the absolute rule of a Ribbon distillery gang." From the reports I have perused, I believe there is a certain amount of Ribbonism, and I have no doubt there is a good deal of illicit distillation; but as to how far these movements are connected, I must say no evidence has reached me leading me to suppose that both practices are indulged in by the same parties. As regards the steps which it is our intention to take, I can only say the subject is under investigation, and such steps will be taken as are found to be necessary.

MR. CALLAN inquired, Whether any report had been received from the Constabulary authorities; and whether the Chief Secretary had any objection to state whence the statement was supplied, either that there was at present a large amount of illicit distillation, or that there was any Ribbon Society in operation in the district?

MR. J. LOWTHER: I have stated that my impression is derived from the perusal of various reports. This is all the information I have.

MR. CALLAN said, what he wanted to ask was, Whether these reports were newspaper reports, or authoritative reports from the Constabulary Office; whether they were received from those interested in the preservation of peace and order in the district and the maintenance of the Revenue, or whether they were merely the newspaper reports of insane and rabid individuals?

MR. J. LOWTHER: As I have already said, from the various sources of information I had at my command, including official and other reports.

MR. CALLAN: But, Sir, what I wish to ascertain—[Cries of "Order!"]

MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Gentleman having already had a full answer, it is not competent for him now to renew the Question.

POST OFFICE—(TELEGRAPH DEPARTMENT)—FEMALE CLERKS.

QUESTION.

MR. CHAMBERLAIN asked the Postmaster General, Whether it is a fact that the Telegraph Department has ceased to take on female clerks, and that the female branch of the Government Telegraph School has been closed; and, if so, what is the reason for thus excluding women from one of the few opportunities which they have hitherto had of employment in the public service?

LORD JOHN MANNERS, in reply, said, the Post Office authorities had no intention of discontinuing female labour in the Telegraph Department. On the contrary, they were constantly extending it, and were favourable to its extension. In consequence, however, of the excessive amount of labour at the principal London offices at night, which could only be satisfactorily done by male clerks, the further appointment of female clerks to these offices had been suspended, until the number of female clerks had been properly adjusted to the requirements of the Service.

IRISH CHURCH MISSION—DISTRIBUTION OF TRACTS.—QUESTIONS.

MR. O'DONNELL asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland, Whether he is aware that a regular centre for the printing and distribution of tracts of the most offensive description exists in Dublin, where, it is announced, they are kept—

“Stereotyped, and can be had on application, from one copy to a million copies, at cost price, for universal circulation;”

whether it has come to his knowledge that in these productions catholic places of worship are styled “mass houses,” and catholics are described as worshipping “stone goddesses and wafer gods;” whether such statements, offensive to the religious belief of many millions of Her Majesty’s subjects, are scattered wholesale in trams and Railway carriages, and even in private carriages standing at shop doors, and are flung down areas and thrust into private letter-boxes, and into the hands of passengers through the public streets; and, whether it has not been repeatedly reported to the Government by magistrates, clergymen, and respectable persons of all denominations that such practices are a cause of deep pain to honourable Protestants, and highly calculated to provoke to breaches of the peace among an earnestly Catholic people.

MR. J. LOWTHER: Sir, with respect to the two first paragraphs of the Question of the hon. Gentleman, the facts are as he has stated them. With reference to the third, I understand that these documents have been circulated pretty generally, but no intimation has ever been conveyed which would authorize me to affirm that they have been circulated in the way referred to. As to the fourth part of the Question, I cannot say that any reports have reached me on the subject; but, since public attention has recently been called to it, I have received certain communications—amongst others, I may say, from the secretary and other persons responsible for the conduct of the Irish Church Mission, in which they certainly do express themselves very much in the manner that the hon. Gentleman does, in so far as he says that these practices were the cause of giving pain to honourable Protestants; but, beyond that, no communications have been made to the Government. As to the last few words of the Question, no information has reached me that leads me to suppose that those practices are calculated to provoke a breach of the peace.

Mr. O'Donnell

MR. O'DONNELL asked Mr. Attorney General for Ireland, Why, since in Scotland outrages upon the religious belief of a section of Her Majesty’s subjects can be prevented and punished by the Law, a similar protection has not yet been extended to the Catholic people of Ireland?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. GIBSON): Sir, the expression, “outrages upon religious belief,” is somewhat indefinite, and might be used to describe events differing very widely from each other. The reply of the Lord Advocate to a Question put a few days since by the hon. Member with reference to certain occurrences at Dundee was, no doubt, justified by the facts and circumstances of that particular case. Indeed, it is obvious that all such cases, wherever they occur, must be decided on their own special facts and circumstances. I have no doubt that the law of England and Ireland, in the event of occurrences causing riots or breaches of the peace, would be found amply sufficient to protect all sections of Her Majesty’s subjects, no matter what their religion might be.

PARLIAMENTARY ELECTIONS—HADDINGTON BURGHS.—QUESTION.

MR. HOPWOOD asked the Lord Advocate, Whether his attention has been directed to an article in the “Scotsman” newspaper of the 14th instant, making among other statements the following:—

“No doubt exists in the Haddington Burghs, and there would be little difficulty in procuring evidence of the fact, that money was spent in the assumed interest of the Conservative candidate in corrupt practices. It is notorious and easily susceptible of proof, that drink was supplied freely to voters in Haddington, Jedburgh, Dunbar, and North Berwick. In the case of the Haddington Burghs there was, beyond doubt, a deliberate conspiracy to debauch the constituency. It has been pointed out above that the law has been broken by the Conservative agents in at least three important particulars, and that for such breaches certain penalties are specified. If, after this, the officials who are responsible for the vindication of the law do not take prompt measures for bringing the offenders to justice, they will be open to a charge of gross and culpable neglect of duty;”

whether he can inform the House that the Procurator Fiscal is making the inquiry which is usual when information reaches him that a breach of law has been committed; and, if not, whether he will direct that the Procurator Fiscal discharge his duty in the matter?

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. WATSON): Sir, I have made inquiry with regard to these matters, and I have not obtained any information to warrant a prosecution for any of the offences mentioned in the Question of the hon. Member. I desire further to say that it is exceedingly inconvenient and very difficult to deal with general accusations of this kind, such as are bandied about in times of excitement during an election. It is quite open to anyone to lay specific information before the Officers of the Crown; persons are protected by privilege in doing so, and whenever such information is given, a full investigation will be made.

AFRICA (WEST COAST) — TREATIES WITH NATIVE CHIEFS.—QUESTION.

MR. ASHBURY asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether, considering the existing state of trade on the West Coast of Africa, and especially in those rivers known as the "Oil Rivers," it is contemplated to extend the treaties, and thus permit British traders to establish stations beyond the present Treaty limits, by which means they will obtain direct intercourse with the natives of the interior?

MR. BOURKE, in reply, said, the British Consul on the West Coast had general instructions to make Treaties with the Native Chiefs wherever he could see the possibility of extending British trade. In regard to the Brass River, it had been thought unadvisable to make Treaties with the Chiefs in the interior, as we already had Treaties with those at the mouth of the river, and any relations come to with those in the interior would be likely to disturb the friendly arrangements already existing.

AFGHANISTAN—THE WAR—GENERAL ROBERTS' SUPPLEMENTARY DESPATCH.—QUESTION.

GENERAL SHUTE asked the Under Secretary of State for India, Whether, in justice to those officers who were mentioned in General Roberts' Supplementary Despatch as having distinguished themselves in the front attack made by Brigadier General Cobbe's Brigade on the Peiwar Kotal, he will communicate with the Government of India and procure that Despatch in its entirety with a view to its publication in the "London Gazette," where only an extract, omitting the names of officers, has yet appeared?

MR. E. STANHOPE, in reply, said, the practice of publishing subordinate officers' reports of military occurrences having been carried to a great excess, the Government of India had decided that for the future the duty of reporting on actions and campaigns should rest solely on the General Commanding-in-Chief, who was responsible for their conduct in every particular. He was afraid, therefore, he could not undertake to produce that to which the hon. and gallant Member referred.

EDUCATION (SCOTLAND) ACT—BARVAS (ISLAND OF LEWIS) SCHOOL BOARD.

QUESTION.

MR. FRASER-MACKINTOSH asked the Lord Advocate, Whether his attention has been called to the fact that four persons were recently imprisoned at the instance of the School Board of Barvas, in the Island of Lewis, under the provisions of the Education (Scotland) Act, for neglecting to send their children to school; and, whether the defence they stated, that the children were attending a school maintained by the Gaelic School Society, in which reading, writing, and arithmetic were taught, was not a good defence in law to the proceedings taken against them?

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. WATSON): Sir, my attention was called to this matter by the hon. Member; but I have not yet been able to get full information on the subject, and, therefore, I am not in a position to say whether the facts are as stated or not. I may state, however, that if reading, writing, and arithmetic are efficiently taught in the Gaelic Society's school, and the children of these parents were in actual attendance, this would form a perfectly good defence to any prosecution under the Education Act.

FIJI — EXECUTION OF NATIVE PRISONERS—ALLEGED BARBARITIES.

QUESTION.

MR. A. MOORE asked the Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether it is true that, in the month of June 1876, certain native prisoners were, by order of the Governor of the Fiji Islands, marched into a proclaimed district, and there tried by court martial; condemned and executed in a barbarous manner in his presence—some being hung, others strangled and afterwards clubbed to death, and others shot; whether it is a fact that these men were thus illegally deprived of their right of appeal to the Supreme Court of the Colony; and, whether, if these facts are true, Her Majesty's Government are prepared to take cognizance of them?

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH : Sir, these statements appeared in an article which was published in a New Zealand newspaper nearly three years ago. They are not true; and I must add, in justice to Sir Arthur Gordon, that I think the hon. Member would not have repeated them now, if whoever communicated them to him had had the fairness—I might say the honesty—to inform him that the newspaper in which they appeared, two months afterwards accepted the contradiction of them without reservation, and “Frankly expressed regret for having given currency to statements not unlikely to excite serious prejudice against an officer of the Crown placed in a position of great difficulty, and, consequently, in no need of gratuitous or additional obstacles in the discharge of his duty.”

SOUTH AFRICA—THE ZULU WAR — OVERTURES OF PEACE.—QUESTION.

MR. SULLIVAN asked the Secretary of State for the Colonies, If his attention has been drawn to a statement by the special correspondent of the “Daily News” at Pietermaritzburg, to the following effect:—

“Bishop Colenso affirms that repeatedly Cetewayo since that affair (of Isandula) has sent to Lord Chelmsford messages setting forth his anxiety to receive terms and asking for peace. He tells a narrative of some Natives recently reaching the Tugela with a flag of truce and being fired upon, but four Zulu Christians standing firm were allowed to pass into Natal to Bishop Schruger, and thence to Lord Chelmsford at Maritzburg. The latter pointed out to them that they were not men of sufficient consideration to be bearers of overtures and sent them back to Cetewayo from Maritzburg, with an intimation that men of consequence or indunas sent by Cetewayo would find him in Dundee. The Bishop is satisfied that Cetewayo is not the savage he is represented, and that he would gladly accept reasonable terms and be again in amity with us. He would do everything Sir Bartle Frere demanded before the war, and reduce his military force within due limits, and meet us generally on every point, if only we did not insist on utterly and abjectly humiliating him;”

and, whether there is any truth as to these overtures for peace on the part of Cetewayo; and, if so, whether Her Majesty's Government will, in consequence of such overtures, order a cessation of bloodshed and enter into negotiations for peace?

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH : Sir, I really do not know on what grounds Bishop Colenso has formed that opinion, which, it appears from this quotation, he has expressed as to the intention and wishes of Cetewayo; nor do I know what means of communication he may have with the Zulus. The only overtures which I have heard of as having been made since these messages, duly reported in the Blue Books, which were received before the Tugela was crossed, are, in the first place, a message, which appeared to come from certain Zulu Indunas, and not from Cetewayo himself, which was delivered early in March to the frontier magistrate, and passed on by him to Sir Henry Bulwer. The reply to that message was that any overtures must come from the King himself. A further message came to Lord Chelmsford at the end of the month. Two messengers arrived asking for a conference, and referring to Cetewayo's promises at his coronation. Lord Chelmsford was then on his march to Ekowe, and those messengers were informed that a flag of truce would always be respected, and that if he had any messages to send they would be received by him at his camp. Since that time, and the relief of Ekowe, I am not aware that any messages have arrived.

POOR LAW (IRELAND)—BLESSINGTON DISPENSARY (NAAS UNION) MEDICAL OFFICER.—QUESTION.

MR. PARNELL asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland, Whether his attention has been directed to a letter, dated the 12th day of April 1879, from the Local Government Board (Ireland) to the Blessington and Ballymore Dispensary Committee of Naas Union, requesting the committee to receive the resignation of their medical officer on account of his failing to attend one Patrick Merrigan, though a medical relief ticket was presented on his behalf, and who died without medical attendance; and, whether the dispensary committee have yet complied with this direction; and, if not, whether the Local Government Board have taken steps to compel compliance?

Mr. A. Moore

MR. J. LOWTHER: Sir, the Committee were so requested, but they took a different view of the case from that adopted by the Local Government Board, and they declined to act on the suggestion of the Board. In order to enable them to hear the statement which the medical officer had to make, and any further observation the Committee had to offer, it was decided to hold an inquiry by one of the Inspectors of the Local Government Board, and that inquiry was fixed to take place to-day.

SOUTH AFRICA (EXPENSES OF MILITARY OPERATIONS)—ESTIMATE OF EXPENDITURE.—QUESTION.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, If he is still satisfied that his Estimate for the War in South Africa is sufficient, or recognizes that it must be increased? He added, by way of explanation, that he was aware there had been no formal Estimate; but he referred to the £1,500,000 spoken of by the Chancellor of the Exchequer.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Sir, the hon. Member is quite right in saying that at present there is no Estimate on the Table. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Pontefract (Mr. Childers), however, has already given Notice of his intention to ask a Question with regard to the Estimate of the cost of the war in South Africa immediately after the Whitsuntide holidays; and I think it would be more convenient to defer answering the Question of the hon. Member for Kirkcaldy until then.

TURKEY—THE ANGLO-TURKISH CONVENTION — CONSULAR APPOINTMENTS IN ASIA MINOR.—QUESTION.

MR. J. HOLMS asked the Secretary to the Treasury, When he expects to lay upon the Table of the House the statement showing the different Consular or other appointments proposed to be made in Asia Minor, together with particulars of the salaries and other expenses connected therewith?

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON, in reply, said, he could not fix the actual day; but he hoped to be able to lay the Papers upon the Table within the next fortnight or three weeks.

FRANCE—PROLONGATION OF THE TREATY OF COMMERCE.

QUESTION.

MR. W. CARTWRIGHT asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether the prolongation of the existing Treaty of Commerce with France is limited to six months from December 31st of the current year; or whether the terms of prolongation include an engagement that the Conventional Duties under the present Treaty shall continue in force for six months after the date, whenever that may be, when a new Tariff shall have been enacted in France?

MR. BOURKE: Sir, no change has taken place in the arrangements between the French and English Governments since I made a statement on the subject a few days ago. The duration of the Treaty, as well as the duration of the Conventional Tariff, as fixed by laws and Treaty, is to be prolonged for six months after the promulgation of the General Tariff now before the French Assembly.

TURKEY—ANTI-SLAVE TRADE TREATY.—QUESTION.

MR. W. E. FORSTER asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether the Anti-Slave Trade Treaty with Turkey has yet been concluded, which he informed the House last February had then been not only submitted to the Porte, but had passed the Council of Ministers?

MR. BOURKE: Sir Henry Layard, when in England, undertook that when he returned to Constantinople he would lose no opportunity and no time in pressing on the Porte the subject of that Treaty, and we hope to hear shortly that it has been signed.

CRIMINAL CODE (INDICTABLE OFFENCES) BILL—REPEAL OF STATUTES.—QUESTION.

MR. ANDERSON asked Mr. Attorney General, If it be true that, while the Criminal Code (Indictable Offences) Bill repeals in whole or in part about 80 Statutes, it leaves unrepealed about 650, all bearing on Criminal Law; and, if so, if he will take steps to make the codification more complete before asking the House to go through further labour in discussing details?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir JOHN HOLKER): Sir, if the hon. Gentleman asserts that, in addition to the statutes intended to be repealed by the Criminal Code (Indictable Offences) Bill, there are as many as 650 other Acts bearing on the Criminal Law, I presume he has made a careful calculation, and has satisfied himself of its accuracy. The number of Statutes mentioned must, however, to a great extent, be made up of Acts of Parliament relating to offences punishable on summary conviction, of Acts which are obsolete, and of Acts which it is not desirable to re-enact. I have already explained why the provisions of all the Statutes relating to indictable offences are not codified by the Bill, and I dare say a further statement on this subject will be contained in the Report of the Commissioners. I consider the Bill contains a very large measure of codification, for it codifies all the common, or unwritten, law relating to Criminal Acts generally, and all the statute law relating to such indictable offences as are ordinarily considered to be embraced under the term "crimes." This being so, I cannot accede to the hon. Gentleman's suggestion that I shall take steps to delay the passing of the measure.

PARLIAMENTARY REPORTING — RECOMMENDATIONS OF THE SELECT COMMITTEE.—QUESTION.

MR. CHAMBERLAIN asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, If he will make arrangements to allow the House to express its opinion on the Recommendations of the Committee on Parliamentary Reporting before they are carried into effect.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Sir, the Government have not yet been able to consider these recommendations; but if they should propose to apply them, undoubtedly an opportunity will be given to the House to express an opinion upon them, because it will be necessary to submit a small Vote as a test of the opinion of the House on the subject.

PARLIAMENT—ARRANGEMENT OF PUBLIC BUSINESS.—QUESTION.

MR. W. E. FORSTER asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer, What class of Civil Service Estimates would be taken on this day fortnight; and whether there would be a Morning Sitting on the day after the re-assembling of the House?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER, in reply, said, that with regard to the Estimates to be taken on the first Monday after the Whitsuntide Recess, something would depend on the progress made to-night. If the Estimates now on the Paper should not be finished, they would be taken again; otherwise the Army Estimates would be taken. In any case, the Army Estimates would probably be put upon the Paper. On the first Tuesday after the Recess there would be a Morning Sitting for the Army Discipline and Regulation Bill.

SOUTH AFRICA—EGYPT—FURTHER PAPERS.—QUESTIONS.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON; I wish to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer, with reference to the statement he made in the earlier part of the evening, Whether the Government intend to lay on the Table further Papers relating to South Africa, and when he expects that they may be in our hands? I should also like to ask, When further Papers may be expected relating to affairs in Egypt?

MR. CHAMBERLAIN: I wish to ask, If the Papers which are to be laid on the Table in reference to South Africa will contain the instructions given to Sir Garnet Wolseley?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I have already stated that the Papers relating to South Africa will be laid on the Table before the House rises to-morrow, and I hope they will be in the hands of Members in a few days, but I can hardly say off-hand what they will contain. With regard to the other Question, I believe that further Papers with regard to the affairs of Egypt are being prepared, and that they also will be in the hands of Members in a few days.

SOUTH AFRICA—THE CIVIL AND MILITARY COMMANDS.

EXPLANATION.

SIR ROBERT PEEL: I wish to ask a Question or two in reference to the statement that was made by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, I think at an unusual time—such statements being generally made after, and not before, the Questions. I do not wish to conclude with a Motion; but I trust the House will permit me to say one or two words in explanation. I understand the Chancellor of the Exchequer stated that Sir Garnet Wolseley had been appointed both Civil and Military Governor of South Africa. ["No."] Then, of some portion of South Africa.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I said Natal and the Transvaal, and those portions of territory to the North and East of those Colonies.

SIR ROBERT PEEL: Well, I wish to know what is the effect of that appointment in regard to superseding officers already there—among them Sir Henry Bulwer, one of the most competent men in South Africa? I wish to know from the Government, Whether it is to be understood by the House and the country that the confidence of the Government has been withdrawn from the General Commanding-in-Chief; and whether the statement which has appeared in the Cape papers that Sir Bartle Frere has no intention of resigning the position he holds is correct, or whether he has acquiesced in the censure that has been passed upon him by Her Majesty's Government? I wish to put another Question and make an explanation. I do not wish to conclude with a Motion; but I am particularly anxious that this subject should be discussed before the adjournment for the holidays, and should be prepared to raise the question to-morrow on the Motion that you, Sir, do leave the Chair; but I will not do so if the House will permit me to make an explanation. It has to be remembered that at this present moment there are at the Cape forces amounting to nearly 22,000 men, and I want to know whether anything has occurred—

MR. MITCHELL HENRY: I rise to Order. I think it is unfair to other Members that the right hon. Baronet should be allowed to make remarks unless he means to conclude with a Motion.

SIR ROBERT PEEL: I will be very brief. I will limit myself to a few observations.

MR. SPEAKER: As long as the right hon. Gentleman puts a Question, and confines himself to that Question, and to such information as is necessary to make that Question plain to the House, he is in Order.

SIR ROBERT PEEL: The Question is one of very great importance, and it is this—Whether it is to be understood by the House of Commons and by the country that the confidence of the Government has been withdrawn from the General Commanding-in-Chief, Lord Chelmsford? I wish also to inquire whether Sir Henry Bulwer, the competent Governor of Natal, is superseded? I wish also to inquire whether Sir Bartle Frere is supposed no longer to exercise the functions which he has hitherto discharged in that part of South Africa? I hope the Government will also allow me to inquire whether it is intended before the vacation—either to-night or to-morrow—to offer to the country any statement as regards the position of affairs in South Africa?

MR. SULLIVAN said, he wished to put a Question to the Chancellor of the Exchequer on the same subject, and he also had no intention of concluding with a Motion if he could avoid it, but the circumstances were peculiar; the emergency was severe. They would to-morrow evening be dismissed to their homes for a fortnight; and, if they were to judge from the past, they might expect on Wednesday or Thursday to receive some stunning surprise. It was, therefore, strongly pressed upon him that he should like to know—[Interruption.] He did appeal to the Chancellor of the Exchequer, as they were about to separate to-morrow, to make, if he could, some statement with reference to the present position in South Africa, and also in reference to the intentions of the Government that were to be carried out by the new Commander-in-Chief. He must ask the indulgence of the House while he completely explained his Question. If, while hon. Members were scattered through the country, they found an invasion of Zululand once more in full swing, and scenes that all would deplore being enacted, the blood of the country would be up. [Cries of "Oh!" "Move!" and "Order!"] He would conclude with a Motion. He decidedly objected to Members being dismissed to their homes without some specific information on a subject which was deep in the heart of the country. They wished for peace; and they wanted a positive assurance from the Government that they would not renew the invasion of Zululand for any mere idle pretext of what was called vindicating the disaster of Isandlana. They wanted to know how much bloodshed the Government thought must be poured out before that vindication took place. It was to him abhorrent that, 10 days hence, they should find a war, brutal and barbarous, in full swing, and no House of Commons sitting to put even a Question to the Minister of the day. He would tell his hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham (Mr. Chamberlain) that his Motion would come too late, for they would then be told, "Our arms were in the field, and our gallant soldiers in the grip of a deadly foe. Do not paralyze their arms at a moment like this; to do so would be eminently unpatriotic." He appealed to the Government to tell the House that Sir Garnet Wolseley would be the messenger of peace—he need not be a coward for that, for he had already vindicated in Africa and elsewhere the traditional courage of the British Army—and that he would take in his portfolio some decision of the Government which would enable him, before carrying fire and sword into Zululand, to make offers to Cetewayo which might effect a settlement of the question. He begged to move the adjournment of the House.

MR. CHAMBERLAIN asked leave to second the Motion, and begged most earnestly to support the appeal made to the Government by the hon. and learned Member for Louth (Mr. Sullivan). A moment or two ago he ventured to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether the Papers shortly to be laid on the Table would contain the general instructions which had been given to Sir Garnet Wolseley? The Chancellor of the Exchequer made what he (Mr. Chamberlain) chose to call a very cavalier reply—"That he could not be expected to say what would be contained in the Papers." That seemed to him an extremely unsatisfactory position in which to place the House. They wanted to know whether the appointment of Sir Garnet Wolseley was an augury of peace, or whether he only went out to South Africa as a messenger of still more violent war? They had felt—and that had been one of the grounds of the Motion he had made—they had felt that as long as Sir Bartle Frere was High Commissioner, and enjoyed the confidence of the Government, and as long as his policy was unchanged, there was no chance of peace until the Zulu power had been utterly destroyed. That kind of peace they regarded as no peace at all, but only the beginning of further difficulties and danger. They felt that unless a new Representative of Her Majesty were sent out, there would be no hope of a peaceable settlement of this most unfortunate affair—a war commenced in injustice, and which they did not wish to see continued—a war commenced in injustice and wrong—a war commenced without any necessity—a war in which the country would never have engaged, if the House had had an opportunity of expressing an opinion upon it. He seconded the Motion for adjournment.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That this House do now adjourn."—(Mr. Sullivan.)

MR. O'DONNELL trusted that in the satisfactory assurances which, he hoped, were about to be given, the Chancellor of the Exchequer would be able to say that Sir Garnet Wolseley would be instructed to grant to the people of the Transvaal, who had been fraudulently robbed of their rights, as full and complete an instalment of independence as was consistent with the safety of our South African Colonies.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I do not understand, Sir, that the House desires now to open up a general discussion upon South African policy; but I do fully understand that hon. Members who were not present when I made a statement at the beginning of Business would wish to hear what I then said. What I stated at that time was, that after a full consideration of the condition of affairs in South Africa, Her Majesty's Government had decided that the arrangement under which the chief Civil and Military authority in the neighbourhood of the seat of war was distributed between four different persons could no longer be deemed adequate. By these four different persons I, of course, mean Sir Bartle Frere as the High Commissioner, Sir Henry Bulwer as Civil Governor of Natal, Colonel Lanyon as Administrator of the Transvaal, and Lord Chelmsford, Commander-in-Chief of the Forces. I therefore said that Her Majesty's Government had determined on appointing Sir Garnet Wolseley as Civil and Military Governor in Natal, the Transvaal, and the Native territory to the Northward and Eastward of those Colonies which are now the seat of war. Sir Henry Bulwer is the Lieutenant Governor of Natal, and Sir Garnet Wolseley will be the Governor. Similarly, he will be the Governor of the Transvaal, and he will be the High Commissioner who will conduct the relations of the Crown with the Native Tribes to the north and east of those territories. It will be remembered that that country is more than 1,000 miles distant from Cape Town, and that Sir Bartle Frere is at present—and will be for some considerable time—detained at Cape Town by important business which he has to transact in Cape Colony. With reference to the Question of the right hon. Baronet, Sir Bartle Frere has not yet answered, or we have not received, any answer to the despatch to which the right hon. Gentleman referred. I do not think it would be convenient that I should attempt, on the present occasion, to enter into any fuller explanation further than to say this—that we propose immediately to lay upon the Table Papers which will explain the precise nature and the reason of the appointment which has been made of Sir Garnet Wolseley. Of course, the instructions which will be given to Sir Garnet Wolseley will be laid upon the Table, and will be circulated as quickly as possible, but we were anxious to save time; and I am not sure whether it will be possible to include those instructions in the first batch of Papers which will be laid on the Table. Of course, they will be laid upon the Table, and I hope they will be very shortly in the hands of hon. Members. The Papers which relate to the nature of the appointments will be laid immediately. Of course, I cannot object to any discussion which hon. Members may choose to invite us to; but I hope it may be considered that this is not a very convenient opportunity for entering upon a discussion of South African policy.

Mr. Sullivan

SIR HENRY HAVELOCK said, he had no desire to enter into any general discussion; but he thought it would be convenient to the House and the country that there should be a fuller explanation as to how the new arrangements would affect the position of Lord Chelmsford. Sir Garnet Wolseley was a lieutenant-general, and Lord Chelmsford held the local rank of lieutenant-general in Africa. He wished to know whether Lord Chelmsford's position would be that of second in command, or would he revert to the command of one of the two main columns, or would he revert to the command of the troops in Cape Colony, 1,000 miles from the seat of war, or would he be entirely superseded and set aside? He knew the eminent capacity of Sir Garnet Wolseley, and he hoped he would take out a message of peace, honourable to this country, and conduct the military operations to a successful and speedy termination.

MR. WADDY thought hon. Members were fully justified in asking for some further information than the Chancellor of the Exchequer had yet given. He had given entirely the go-by to the letter, if not to the spirit, of the Questions addressed to him on this side of the House. What ought to be distinctly understood was, whether the instructions to be given to Sir Garnet Wolseley would place him in the position of being a messenger of peace, or a messenger of war, charged with the extermination of the Zulu people? Everyone, of course, knew the high merits and capacity of Sir Garnet Wolseley, and they had heard something about the vindication of the honour of this country; but were they going to tell the world that it was necessary to vindicate the majesty of the Queen of Great Britain and Ireland by exterminating these wretched Zulus? To say such a thing was almost an insult. It was, therefore, essential to know what Sir Garnet Wolseley was instructed to do in Africa. How long were we going to continue this war against this wretched Zulu Kingdom—against a country which, in fact, had never attacked us? It had already been stated that the war was an unjust one, and hon. Gentlemen opposite had demurred to the statement. But what could be stronger than the censure passed by the Government on Sir Bartle Frere for what he had done in the matter? But what were we doing now, and after that policy had been censured by the Government? We were establishing a series of military posts right across the Zulu country; and for what earthly reason? The House ought to be told what was going to be done. There were, practically, 25,000 soldiers there already; and Sir Garnet Wolseley, and he did not know how many more soldiers, were going to be sent out. The chief thing which the people of this country desired to know was, whether this war was to last two or three years, or how long? Were we to drive the Zulus out of the full extent of their territory? You would not get rid of them by so doing, but might make things worse and worse. That being so, the people wished to know whether anything short of the entire destruction of the Zulus was to be the limit of the operations that was to end the war. Whether unjust or not in its inception, it was clear that we could gain no credit to our arms by proceeding with it any further against a mere horde of savages.

SIR ROBERT PEEL: I wish to express the unfeigned satisfaction which the statement of the Chancellor of the Exchequer has given me, and I hope that now we shall see this miserable affair in South Africa placed in the hands of one competent to deal with a most difficult situation, and that that of which I and many others in this House complained of from the beginning—namely, the extreme difficulty attending the ruling and directing of South Africa by four or five heads—will now be removed by the sole direction being placed, as we have been told it will be, under the management of one capable Commander. I wish, also, to call the attention of the Government to the two assurances which they have made during the course of this Session—one was in answer to the humane request made some time ago by the hon. and learned Member for Louth (Mr. Sullivan), and the other in answer to the hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Chamberlain); and, on the first occasion, the Government stated most distinctly that until the reverses of the Army had been avenged, and until their military position was re-established, they did not intend to enter into any negotiations for peace. Let us hope, now that the military position has been re-established, that they will not shrink from listening to the humane voice that was first raised in this House by the hon. and learned Member for Louth, and that they will now in their hearts consider whether the time has not arrived for entertaining proposals of peace from a man upon whom, from the showing of the Government themselves—and no matter what anybody else may say, the Blue Books prove it—upon whom a war has been forced—a war both unnecessary and unjust—and who, over and over again, expressed his desire to be on friendly terms with the great English people. The Chancellor of the Exchequer has replied to the hon. Member for Birmingham that instructions both negative and positive have been forwarded. Now, let us hope that, above all, straightforward and honest instructions have been forwarded to the Cape—and that the first opportunity will be taken, not to overrun the country, nor to undertake measures which will lead to the further shedding of blood and to still further expenditure, but to terminate a war which shocks the hearts and feelings of the English people.

MR. W. E. FORSTER: Sir, I had no wish to take part in this debate; but I cannot avoid making a few remarks. I entirely agree with what has been said upon the subject; and I earnestly hope that the instructions given to Sir Garnet Wolseley will be such as will bring the war to a speedy conclusion. I think the Government ought not to feel surprised at the great anxiety of the House to know something as to the purport of those instructions. I am very glad, indeed, to hear the statement of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. It does much to relieve my anxiety not merely with regard to the safety of our troops, but with regard to our policy in South Africa. We have much confidence in Sir Garnet Wolseley; but I hope I may be allowed to remind the House that we are in this position:—We are informed, so far as we can gain information from the despatches on the Table, and from intelligence obtained from the newspapers, that the policy upon which the war now appears to be conducted at this moment in South Africa is such that the Zulu King—to use an expression I have seen quoted on good authority—feels that if he were to comply with the demand which has been made upon him for unconditional submission, that would, in his opinion, mean perpetual imprisonment. I cannot think this fear of his very unreasonable, and, if so, his reluctance to accept our conditions is very natural. Does the Government intend another departure in the policy they have of late pursued in South Africa? It is surely not upon military grounds alone that Sir Garnet Wolseley is being sent out to the seat of war; and I most earnestly desire that the Government will not allow the House to separate without some assurance that we may hope to look forward to a speedy end of this war. This is not the time to debate whether the war is a just one or not; but I never knew a case in which there was such a general admission of the accuracy of the statement made by Members on this side of the House that the war is an unnecessary one. Let the Government consider what is the real meaning of a war which is not a necessary war, what it means to our soldiers, what it means to the gallant men—savages though they are—who are fighting against us; what is the condition of our own brave youths, fighting as they are for their Colours, for the banner of Englishmen—fighting under the terribly disastrous circumstances of climate—still, I hope, not for the utter extermination of a hopeful race, who, savages though they are, have yet shown great courage and the power of obedience. If this war be persisted in, it will probably mean the utter extermination of this race by an overpowering force? I cannot resist the opportunity of earnestly calling upon the Government to give some assurance that there is no intention to cause the extermination of the Zulu race, and that we may look for a speedy termination of the war.

Mr. Waddy

COLONEL STANLEY: The Government have said all along that they were as anxious as any persons in the country could be to conclude this Zulu War at as early a day as was found to be consistent with the safety of our Colonies and the honour of our arms. From that declaration they have in no degree departed, and I would venture to state that the instructions with which Sir Garnet Wolseley will be furnished will be framed in the fullest accordance with those principles. It has been found necessary for the purpose of affairs in South Africa to place the conduct of matters in the hands of one officer, who shall exercise both civil and military control; and it has been found that it was a most fortunate circumstance that Sir Garnet Wolseley's presence at home has enabled the Government to avail themselves of his able services. [Laughter.] If the House will take my authority for the statement, his coming home is connected with purely military matters; and the Government have availed themselves of the circumstance of his being at home to send out without delay an officer, of whose courage and talents it would scarcely become me to speak, but which are fully recognized by the country, and which have been successful in a remarkable degree, not only in a military, but also in an administrative capacity. Singularly fortunate, also, is it that within the last few years Sir Garnet Wolseley has had, of all men, perhaps the best means of forming an intimate knowledge of Natal, and of its Frontiers, and the tribes along its borders; and we trust that, acting in the fullest accordance with the instructions he receives, he will be able so to act that, with little delay, he may give such a turn to affairs in those Colonies as may lead to the operations in the field being speedy and conclusive, and will thus enable this country, at the earliest possible period, to revert to that peace which, provided it can be obtained with safety to our Colonies and honour to our arms, we all alike desire. I am asked by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bradford whether Sir Garnet Wolseley is to be sent out with instructions for the extermination of the Zulu people? I will venture to say that no one who will take the trouble to search through the Correspondence relating to the affairs in Zululand will find such a word, or anything like such a word, in it from beginning to end. The fact is, it is utterly opposed to the policy of the Government. It is necessary that the safety of the Colonies should be provided for; it is necessary that the system of future defences should be provided for; and, in both respects, I think I may venture to appeal to the judgment of the country—if any man can be found more fitted to provide for those exigencies than Sir Garnet Wolseley? I am asked how far Lord Chelmsford's position will be affected by the change? Sir Garnet Wolseley is in the Army senior to Lord Chelmsford, and though it is true that

Lord Chelmsford at the present moment holds a local rank which gives him the position of lieutenant-general, he is still in many degrees junior to Sir Garnet Wolseley; and by the sending out of a senior officer he will naturally have to subordinate his plan and his general action to the superior officer who may be on the spot. I am bound to say that the instructions to be framed, giving Sir Garnet Wolseley the general direction of affairs, military as well as civil, must not be held to imply censure on Lord Chelmsford's proceedings. It is simply that we have found it necessary at the present time to place the direction of affairs, civil and military, in one pair of hands; and that Her Majesty's Government, having fully stated the views with which they are anxious, at as early a period as may be consistent with the general safety, to bring this war to a conclusion, will send out Sir Garnet Wolseley with instructions framed on that basis—instructions which I hope, with the great ability that distinguishes him, he may be able to carry out efficiently and ably for the benefit of the country and the Colonies.

MR. WHITBREAD desired to come to the specific question—"What ought to be done by the Government to-day and to-morrow?" The Questions which had been addressed to the Government were, in his opinion, most reasonable, and the assurances of the right hon. and gallant Gentleman who had just spoken were good as far as they went; but the House wanted fuller and more definite information. Was there any ground for withholding the instructions given to Sir Garnet Wolseley? As far as he could see it, there was absolutely none at all. The Chancellor of the Exchequer had told them that he would lay the full text of the instructions before the House as soon as he could. Why should they not be laid before the House to-day or to-morrow?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: They are not yet fully prepared.

MR. WHITBREAD asked whether the right hon. Gentleman meant to say that he had come down there and had assured the House that the Government were going to send out Sir Garnet Wolseley to South Africa to assume the supreme command, but that the Cabinet did not yet know what his instructions were to be?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I really must correct the hon. Gentleman. The hon. Gentleman asks why do we not lay the text of the instructions before the House, and I reply the text is not prepared.

MR. WHITBREAD admitted that he did use the word text, but what he wished to ask for was the substance in detail of the instructions. It seemed to him that was a most reasonable request. The House were about to separate for a fortnight. It was a question on which the country entertained the deepest feeling. They knew perfectly well what the views of the Government were generally on the subject—that they did not wish to go into the war at all. But was this appointment of Sir Garnet Wolseley to be looked on as a turning point? If it was, let the Government frankly tell the House what the instructions were. Unless the Government were prepared to state to-morrow in detail what was the substance of the instructions proposed to be given to Sir Garnet Wolseley, then, in his judgment, the House ought not to allow itself to be sent about its business. He should not have made such a strong statement but for this—they knew the language which the Government had held in this House, and they knew the language which they had held to their subordinates in South Africa, and they knew the consequences of that language, and that the country had been plunged into a miserable war. The House, therefore, wanted to know whether they might look on this as a turning point in the policy of the Government? If the instructions would bear that interpretation, why could not the Government give it to the House before sending them away for the Holidays? When they came back they would be told they were too late. That was the way they had been treated. It was always so. The Government said—"Do not discuss these things now, because you interfere with the carrying out of a policy;" and when it was over their reply was—"Oh, all that has gone by, and you are now too late to express your opinion." He therefore hoped the House would take time by the forelock, and insist on knowing what the instructions were. The Government must have made up its mind what they were to be, and he hoped the House would not allow itself to be sent about its business until it knew what they were.

Colonel Stanley

MR. NEWDEGATE said, that he declined on the present occasion to enter upon the causes of the war in South Africa. That was a matter upon which Her Majesty's Ministers must satisfy their own consciences. Considering the circumstances of the present juncture, he thought that the present was obviously a case in which the command ought to be concentrated; and, in his opinion, it could not have been concentrated in abler hands than those of Sir Garnet Wolseley. He deprecated, however, a section of the House assuming the functions which the Dutch Commissioners thought they were performing while Marlborough was carrying on a successful war. He deprecated the idea that because doubt might be entertained as to the justice of the origin of this war, the Government should, after many valuable lives had been sacrificed, and after a hostile spirit had been aroused in an African tribe which was organized in the fashion of the old Knights Templars, be tempted to believe that the country would excuse a failure in an undertaking which had already cost us so dearly. As the case now stood, the first duty of Her Majesty's Government was to secure the lives and property of the Colonists, while their next duty was to secure this country against a repetition of such onerous demands as had been made upon it for this purpose during a period of depression.

COLONEL MURE said, the reason why he was anxious to see the war concluded—however good the conduct of our soldiers—was that in no sense could it ever be called an honourable war, or one which would bring honour to the Colony or to the British arms. He looked with a deep feeling of sorrow, not only at the losses which were being sustained by our own soldiers, but at the slaughter of the Zulus, who were being slain by thousands. Many of the soldiers who had been sent out to fight the Zulus were mere boys, which he regarded as a great military mistake and a great blot upon the humanity of this country. If they were to have war let them employ men to fight, and not boys; and he urged upon the Chancellor of the Exchequer that no diplomatic harm could be done by the Government being frank and open in their communications to the House.

MR. CHAPLIN wished to confine his remarks to the point to which the right hon. Member for Bradford (Mr. W. E. Forster) limited his observations. The right hon. Member said the demand upon the Government was reasonable. He (Mr. Chaplin) said it was unreasonable. What was that demand, and what was their position to-night? The Government had come to a most serious decision. They had decided to send out a Commander-in-Chief to command our Forces in South Africa, and they came down to the House and said that the instructions they had given to Sir Garnet Wolseley would, as soon as they were prepared, be laid on the Table. The demand was that, at a moment's notice, Government should communicate the instructions given to Sir Garnet Wolseley to the House. [An hon. MEMBER: To-morrow.] It was true the hon. Member for Birmingham had qualified his demand and said "to-morrow;" but how could they be printed by to-morrow? And what did these instructions mean? The instructions to Sir Garnet Wolseley meant the future policy of the Government in South Africa. They must be of some length; and unless the House had them before it, how could hon. Members initiate a debate upon them? He hoped the Government would not allow themselves for a moment to be inveigled into a grave debate on this important matter.

MR. FAWCETT thought the request of his hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham was a perfectly reasonable one. The Question of his hon. Friend was one which the country was asking, and expected to be answered. He wished to point out that it would be fairer to the Government if 24 hours were given to them to consider whether the Question which his hon. Friend had addressed to them was one which they could consistently with their public duty answer. His hon. Friend had asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer to tell that House and the country what was the general policy which Sir Garnet Wolseley would be instructed to carry out. If the Chancellor of the Exchequer had said it would be impossible to tell without compromising that policy, of course our mouths were closed. But as the Chancellor of the Exchequer had said that the substance of the text would be laid before the House in a few days, there could be no reason for secrecy. The simple question raised by his hon. Friend seemed to him to be one of the first importance—namely, whether or not the influence of that House should be brought to bear on a question of vital importance before the House, and also whether the opinion of the House should produce any effect upon the policy about to be carried out. As he understood the Motion for the adjournment of the House would be made at the beginning of the Morning Sitting to-morrow, he would suggest to his hon. Friend whether it would not be well for him to repeat his Question on the Motion for the adjournment.

MR. MITCHELL HENRY said, when the right hon. Baronet (Sir Robert Peel) rose to put his Question accompanied with some explanations, he (Mr. Mitchell Henry) had ventured to rise to Order, on the ground that it was unfair to other Members of the House to open the flood-gates of this question, and not allow other Members to express their opinions. It was impossible it could be so. He wished now to ask a Question in relation to the appointment of Sir Garnet Wolseley. The Government, apparently, had now found out this Officer was the right man to conduct affairs in South Africa; but Sir Garnet Wolseley's opinion, based upon experience, had been long on record, and that opinion was that no war should be commenced in Zululand with a Force of less than 20,000 Europeans in the country. Contrary to that opinion, Sir Bartle Frere was sent out, and he had no experience. Lord Chelmsford, whose experience was very slight, was also sent, and the war was commenced with a Force utterly inadequate. Everyone acquainted with the Zulus and their mode of warfare shuddered at the manner in which the war was entered upon, with that spirit of light-heartedness for which M. Ollivier was celebrated at the commencement of the Franco-German War. Since the Zulu War commenced we had had disaster after disaster, and our troops had undergone suffering almost unparalleled in the history of Colonial warfare. What was now the condition of our troops there? The right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War knew perfectly well that in one division of the troops at the Cape there was an amount of sickness and a dearth of medical officers which was a disgrace to this country. It was well known that the clothes of the troops were much worn out, and that they had not received a supply of light clothing, which it was essential, in a country like Africa, they ought to receive. The country at a future time would require a complete answer to all these questions. At present he felt justified, when the Chancellor of the Exchequer, for reasons not easy to understand, and at a very unusual moment, interposed to inform the House that Sir Garnet Wolseley was going to the Cape for the purpose mentioned—he felt justified in asking, did the Chancellor of the Exchequer suppose that the country would be satisfied without knowing for what purpose Sir Garnet Wolseley was going? If so, he would find himself mistaken. The Government seemed to claim credit for their action, and it was only reasonable in the House to demand what were the instructions Sir Garnet Wolseley would carry with him? When the debate re-commenced to-morrow, if it was so arranged, he hoped the Minister for War would be able to give some information as to the condition of the troops in South Africa, their sanitary condition, the condition of the supplies sent out, when those supplies reached the troops, and the condition of the Commissariat and of the Medical Department. He believed the conditions of each and all were deplorable. There was another question to which the First Lord of the Admiralty might give an answer. Why, with a force of 5,000 or 6,000 well-seasoned soldiers in the country, did the Government continue to send out boys to reinforce the troops in South Africa, when they must know that those boys would die in great numbers? Why was it that a force of Marines—well-seasoned soldiers—was kept at home? Why did the Secretary of State for War introduce a Bill to allow of the First Class Reserves being called out, while, all the time, there was this force of well-seasoned Marines ready and willing to do their country service? It was perfectly well known the real reason was that there was a difficulty of etiquette between the Naval and Military Departments. A Government should be able to override these difficulties, and send out men who, well-trying by length of service, were able to fight well, maintain their health, and have a chance of returning in reasonable numbers to their native land.

Mr. Fawcett

SIR PATRICK O'BRIEN said, the observations of the hon. Member for Galway (Mr. Mitchell Henry) might be apposite if the whole general question of the war in South Africa were under consideration; but the House had before it a much smaller and more pressing question. He would not go back to considerations connected with former arrangements in those districts where war now prevailed, but rather would adopt the right hon. Baronet's (Sir Robert Peel's) view; and he much regretted that the speech from the Treasury Bench since he spoke did not seem to warrant the roseate view the right hon. Baronet had taken. The subject was a question of engrossing importance. Not a town or village they went to, but they found what was going on in Zululand discussed by all classes; and in view of this universality of interest, he asked why it was that this statement they had heard was made only two days before the House was to adjourn for the Whitsuntide Holidays? He inferred that this statement might have been made a week ago, and yet they had chosen that time to inform the House—not that Sir Garnet Wolseley had been put in command of 17,000 men to South Africa; there was nothing extraordinary in that, for the House had seen how General Biddulph, at the Peiwar Kotal, and other Generals in Afghanistan, were sent to carry out previous arrangements; but then there was the clear expression of the Government policy from the lips of Lord Lytton. But here, he asked, on the eve of the House breaking up for a fortnight, was the old policy to be pursued in Zululand with stronger vigour? He thought he had a perfect right to ask this Question. The Secretary of State for War had made use of one pregnant observation. He had said—"We had Sir Garnet Wolseley home for military operations."

COLONEL STANLEY: No, that must not go forth. What I said was, that Sir Garnet Wolseley was home to assist on a Committee of a military character, and for that purpose alone.

SIR PATRICK O'BRIEN, continuing, accepted that statement; but he had noted the words at the time, and several hon. Members understood the right hon.

and gallant Gentleman to say Sir Garnet Wolseley was coming home in connection with military affairs. If that was the reason Sir Garnet Wolseley came home, then it was fair to ask, was it from reasons not military he had been selected to proceed to the Cape? All the debate might have been saved if Government had at once stated what instructions Sir Garnet Wolseley would carry out. In the absence of that, the House must fall back on surmise, and it was his surmise that the Admirable Crichton of the British Army had been selected to go to Zululand because of his military capacity. All recognized his military distinction, but he would not say there were not a thousand of equal ability in civil life in England. But why was he selected, and why was the House to be told in a whisper he was selected, because of his civil distinction? He repudiated such an idea, and believed the House would join in asking for an answer. For what had Sir Garnet Wolseley been selected to go to the Cape? When did this change come over the opinion of the Government as to the power and ability of Sir Bartle Frere, and the military capacity of Lord Chelmsford? And if there was no change, if Sir Bartle Frere's intelligence was still as great, and Lord Chelmsford's military genius so transcendent as hon. Gentlemen opposite would maintain, why were they suspended? He would like to learn how, in every military club in London, where this subject would be discussed with some knowledge, to what this action of the Government would be attributed? It could be but to one cause—that having sent an indiscreet man to take civil control in South Africa, and a man of no special military distinction to take the military command, the Government at last saw the error of their ways, and to save Questions of an unpleasant character being put to them, they selected an opportunity to acquaint Parliament when they thought there would be a narrow attendance, the only Business anticipated being the voting of a sum of £4,000,000 or £5,000,000. ["Oh, oh!" and laughter.] They made this passing statement, and the House was to submit in perfect quietude. He was wrong in calling it a statement—this assurance. Hon. Gentlemen opposite might well try to interrupt him, for he had heard their warrior souls expressed in words on a late occasion when they were going to drag the flag that had borne the battle and the breeze over the hills of Rasselas and over the mountains of Afghanistan. They spoke in a high and inflated style, which he could not attempt to imitate. He was not there to make a warrior speech; but he had a right to ask, what everyone would ask to-morrow, what did the Government mean by this new move? Did not everybody know that there was not a second-class clerk in any branch of the Public Service—and herejoiced that it was so—who could not put on a sheet of paper what was the policy of Her Majesty's Government? But he could imagine why the policy was not given out. The policy was a waiting one. "God is good," says the proverb, and in 14 days Providence might set all right. So in 14 days, when the House met again, things might change, and Government would say—"Why did you not wait for the information we had to give you? Now we give you a statement we trust you will all receive." An alternative policy, he thought, the people disliked as much as a great Leader of the House once said they "disliked coalitions." At least his voice should be raised, though the front Bench was dumb, and if they refused an answer it should not be because they were not asked. What was the text of the new policy; or was the old policy to be carried out before Sir Bartle Frere and Lord Chelmsford were sent away, and Sir Garnet Wolseley took control? Was it to be a policy of high-handed aggression or conciliation? ["Oh, oh!"] That was the Question he asked, and, notwithstanding the right hon. Gentleman's speech, that was the Question the nation would ask to-morrow.

SIR JULIAN GOLDSMID said, that Sir Garnet Wolseley was going out as Governor of Natal and as High Commissioner of Natal and the adjacent territories. Under such circumstances, what position would Sir Bartle Frere hold, as he was High Commissioner at present? Surely there ought to be some revocation of his appointment, because he was for the future to be only High Commissioner at the Cape. He should also like to know whether, if the Government had only recently discovered that it was necessary to combine the civil and military authority in one man, they would communicate to the House the reasons which led them to come to that conclusion? He apprehended, he might add, that, although the Government might not be prepared that evening to inform the House as to the substance of the instructions to be given to Sir Garnet Wolseley, they would do so before the House separated to-morrow.

MR. O'CONNOR POWER said, the Question of the hon. Member for Birmingham simply asked that the House should be placed in possession of the instructions Sir Garnet Wolseley was about to receive, and the hon. and learned Member for Louth made a distinct appeal as to what was the nature of those instructions. In all the House had heard from the Treasury Benches that evening, and from what had been said by the hon. Gentleman opposite who had undertaken to speak for the Government, they had had no answer whatever to the appeal which was made by the hon. and learned Member for Louth. The sentiment which was uppermost in the minds of hon. Members, and what was also uppermost in the minds of the people outside, was that the people had had enough of this unjust, cruel, and exterminating war. That was the sentiment which had given life to the whole of the discussion, and the Government, in its attempts to answer the statements made on that side of the House, had made no answer, and taken no notice of those sentiments, and the appeal which was based on this. The Secretary of State for War said if they took the trouble to examine the whole of the Correspondence in reference to the question, they would find that the Government never was, and was not now, and would not be in the future, in favour of a policy of extermination. He admitted that if they looked at the Paper for the despatches which had been written by the Secretary of State for the Colonies, they would have not so much reason to complain; but the Secretary of State for War forgot that while he wrote those despatches which the Government had endorsed, the Government had also endorsed the conduct of those in South Africa, who had acted diametrically opposite to them. It was no use telling them that the view of the Secretary of State for the Colonies was of the most peaceable character. That clearly appeared in the Blue Books; but they had over and over again expressed their regret that their views had not been carried out. That was the real root of the question. The Chancellor of the Exchequer said that it had been found no longer advisable to leave the control of the civil and military affairs in South Africa in the hands of four different persons. What did that mean? Did it mean that there was a conflict of opinion as regarded the manner in which the war was to be prosecuted? They knew that there was a conflict of opinion between the officials in South Africa in the discussion of what led to the war. Was it only in the most critical time of the proceedings that the Government had found out what they ought to do? Those were important Questions, which were suggested by the announcement of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and it was only reasonable that the hon. Gentlemen on that side of the House should be anxious for complete information on the subject before they consented to adjourn for the Holidays. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bradford had said that our soldiers were fighting with the courage of Englishmen, but it might rather be they were fighting with the courage of Irishmen, especially under the circumstances that an Irishman was now selected to retrieve our fortunes in South Africa. He only regretted that the valour of our soldiers was being exhibited in a bad, unjustifiable, and dishonourable war.

Sir Patrick O'Brien

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH: Sir, perhaps I may be allowed to say a few words in reply to the Question addressed to me by the hon. Baronet the Member for Rochester (Sir Julian Goldsmid). He desires to know, firstly, for what reason Her Majesty's Government propose to make this change in the civil and military command in South Africa; and, secondly, what will be the position of Sir Bartle Frere in future. I think it will be far more convenient to the House if I ask hon. Members to wait for a few days, until they receive the Papers which will be laid on the Table of the House, and which will fully explain the reasons for this change and the position of the several officers in South Africa. But I may say these Papers will fully establish the absolute necessity for vesting the whole supreme civil and military command in the district affected in one person, and will also show that Sir Bartle Frere will retain not only the functions of Governor of Cape Colony, but the functions of High Commissioner that were vested in his predecessor, Sir Henry Barkly. The point, however, that has principally occupied the House this evening is, what is the nature or purport—I may say the spirit—of the instructions with which Sir Garnet Wolseley is going out? I do not think I need say much in reply to the statement of the hon. Member for Mayo, who seemed to think that, whatever instructions were given, it was pretty certain they would not be obeyed—

MR. O'CONNOR POWER: Oh, no; I never said that Sir Garnet Wolseley would not obey his instructions. What I said was that those already in South Africa had flatly disobeyed their instructions.

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH: However, I recognize the natural desire of hon. Members to know the spirit of the instructions to be given to Sir Garnet Wolseley; but I would point out the extreme difficulty—nay, the danger to the Public Service—of complying with such a request at the present moment. Supposing these instructions were read from beginning to end by myself or by my right hon. Friend, what would be the result? They would be immediately telegraphed to South Africa, and published there, before the officers intrusted with the duty of carrying them out had arrived, and the very effect that we desire by these instructions to produce might thus be rendered absolutely impossible. This, however, I will say, in addition to what has been said by my right hon. and gallant Friend the Secretary for War—that Sir Garnet Wolseley's instructions will be consistent with the spirit and the letter of the expressions of opinion, with which the House is acquainted, on the part of Her Majesty's Government—to obtain as soon as possible an honourable peace; and that, therefore, as a matter of course, so far from any measures tending to the extermination of the Zulu people, or driving them to despair, Sir Garnet Wolseley will be told that it is the object of Her Majesty's Government not to extend the British territories in South Africa, but to secure for the future the safety of those now belonging to us; and that he will be not only authorized, but directed, to receive and entertain any bond fide overtures that may be made to him by the Zulu King, in order that, as soon as possible, the end of his mission may be accomplished.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: Sir, I think that probably the statement just made by the right hon. Gentleman will be satisfactory to the House; but I cannot but regret that it was not made sooner. I must also point out that the reason which the right hon. Gentleman has given for not stating the instructions to Sir Garnet Wolseley more in detail seem somewhat inconsistent with that which was given at an earlier period of the evening by the Chancellor of the Exchequer. I understood the Chancellor of the Exchequer to say that Papers would be laid on the Table and be almost immediately in our hands. If that be so, it would then be possible for the contingency that the Secretary of State for the Colonies dreads to take place; for these instructions would be telegraphed to South Africa, and be discussed there, before the arrival of Sir Garnet Wolseley. I assume that the Government will lay the Papers upon the Table as soon as, in their opinion, they can be presented without any injury to the Public Service; and I do not know that under the circumstances we can expect more than the statement just made by the right hon. Gentleman. I cannot sit down without saying I have heard with great satisfaction the announcement made by the Government this evening. We, on this side, must look upon it, to a very great extent, as a justification of the course that we thought it necessary to take a month or two ago. It is not with the policy of the Government, as laid down by them, that we have had to find so much fault. What we had have to find fault with is, that the policy was placed in the hands of men who evidently held different views, and that the instructions given by the Government were not carried out. The selection of Sir Garnet Wolseley—a man in whom the country has every reason to have great confidence, who has had the opportunity of holding personal conferences with Her Majesty's Ministers, and who, I may assume, is personally acquainted with those views, and is also in perfect agreement with them—is of such a character that the affairs of the country will be in very different hands, when Sir Garnet Wolseley reaches the Cape, from those in which they have hitherto been unfortunately placed. I think the Government cannot be surprised at the great anxiety that has been expressed for information this evening. We cannot help looking upon this as a very critical turning-point in this matter; and although we know the general views of the Government on the subject, I think the House will have heard with satisfaction that the instructions Sir Garnet Wolseley will take with him will emphasize those views which have already met with the approval of this House. We, on this side, do not yield to any hon. Members opposite in our desire that the conclusion of the war shall be one that will give safety to the Colony, and, at the same time, honour to this country. But what we do wish clearly to understand is, that the honour of the British arms does not require the slaughter of an indefinite number of Zulus, and we also desire to know that the Government are not pledged to the opinion, which we know is held by Sir Bartle Frere, that there is no possible security for our Colonists in South Africa until the military organization of the Zulu Kingdom is entirely destroyed. I gather from what has fallen from the right hon. Gentleman that these are not the views held by the Government, and that the instructions given to Sir Garnet Wolseley will be in conformity with those despatches from the Colonial Office which have met with most approval in this House.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE said, he had that morning sent to the Secretary of State for War a letter written by Bishop Colenso and referring to the messengers reported to have been sent by Cetewayo to Lord Chelmsford to ask for peace—a subject on which the hon. and learned Member for Louth (Mr. Sullivan) had already asked a Question. From this letter, the Secretary of State would see that these messengers were men who had formerly brought most important messages from Cetewayo to our Government, and that, in Bishop Colenso's opinion, they were of sufficiently high authority to be the bearers of overtures of peace.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT desired to ask the Colonial Secretary, whether the commission at present held by Sir

Sir Michael Hicks-Beach

Bartle Frere was cancelled or about to be cancelled? That commission was one conferring such great and general powers that Sir Bartle Frere considered it justified him in making war without the consent of the Government; and unless it were cancelled, they would have no security for the future, and it would be likely to conflict with Sir Garnet Wolseley's commission.

SIR MICHAEL HICKS - BEACH said, if the hon. and learned Gentlemen would wait until he saw the Papers, he would find that they explained precisely the position of the matter.

MR. PARNELL did not think the assurance of the Government so satisfactory as the right hon. Gentlemen on the front Bench seemed to believe. He wished to know whether Sir Garnet Wolseley's instructions would forbid the employment of Native auxiliaries for following up the Zulus when beaten in the field? The practice had given rise to horrors that was a disgrace to humanity and civilization.

MR. SULLIVAN said, he recognized the force of the suggestion made by the hon. Member for Hackney, and thought it would, therefore, be desirable of him to withdraw his Motion for the adjournment of the House, and give Notice that to-morrow he would ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer, whether he could state to the House in substance the instructions given to Sir Garnet Wolseley with reference to the negotiations for peace? He thought it unreasonable that he should ask anything as regarded military movements. Those must be left to the General in the field; but, under the peculiar circumstances of the House adjourning for a fortnight, he thought it right that he should ask for the substance of the instructions with regard to the negotiations for peace; and if he did not get a satisfactory answer, it would be his duty to oppose the Motion for the adjournment of the House.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

SOUTH AFRICA — THE TRANSVAAL.

NOTICE OF AMENDMENT TO MOTION.

MR. O'DONNELL: I beg to give Notice that to-morrow I shall move as an Amendment to the Motion of the Chancellor of the Exchequer for the adjournment for the Holidays—

"That inasmuch as the consent of Parliament to the annexation of the Transvaal was obtained by representations which have been proved to be unfounded, and whereas no valid reason exists for preferring the discontented objection to the friendly alliance of the inhabitants of that territory, this House is of opinion that the Imperial pledge which was pledged, and which has been broken, ought to be retrieved without delay by the restoration to its former independence of the South African Republic."

MR. SPEAKER: I must point out to the hon. Member that upon the Motion of which the Chancellor of the Exchequer has given Notice for to-morrow no Amendment can be moved, except with reference to the time of the adjournment.

MR. O'DONNELL said, he would pursue his object in a form that would bring it within the Rules of the House.

AFGHANISTAN — THE WAR — SIGNATURE OF A TREATY OF PEACE.

OBSERVATIONS.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Before the Clerk proceeds to read the Orders of the Day, I will take the opportunity of stating that I have received a communication from my noble Friend the Secretary of State for India, which informs me that this evening he has received from Major Cavagnari a telegram, dated to-day, and stating that a Treaty of Peace with the Ameer of Cabul was signed this day.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

SUPPLY—CIVIL SERVICE ESTIMATES.

[Progress.]

SUPPLY—considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

CLASS III.—LAW AND JUSTICE.

(1.) Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £339,680, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1880, for the Salaries and Expenses of the Commissioners and other Officers appointed under the 6th and 7th Sections of the Prison Act, 1877, and the Expenses of the several Prisons in England and Wales to which that Act applies."

only authorized, but directed, to receive and entertain any bond fide overtures that may be made to him by the Zulu King, in order that, as soon as possible, the end of his mission may be accomplished.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: Sir, I think that probably the statement just made by the right hon. Gentleman will be satisfactory to the House; but I cannot but regret that it was not made sooner. I must also point out that the reason which the right hon. Gentleman has given for not stating the instructions to Sir Garnet Wolseley more in detail seem somewhat inconsistent with that which was given at an earlier period of the evening by the Chancellor of the Exchequer. I understood the Chancellor of the Exchequer to say that Papers would be laid on the Table and be almost immediately in our hands. If that be so, it would then be possible for the contingency that the Secretary of State for the Colonies dreads to take place; for these instructions would be telegraphed to South Africa, and be discussed there, before the arrival of Sir Garnet Wolseley. I assume that the Government will lay the Papers upon the Table as soon as, in their opinion, they can be presented without any injury to the Public Service; and I do not know that under the circumstances we can expect more than the statement just made by the right hon. Gentleman. I cannot sit down without saying I have heard with great satisfaction the announcement made by the Government this evening. We, on this side, must look upon it, to a very great extent, as a justification of the course that we thought it necessary to take a month or two ago. It is not with the policy of the Government, as laid down by them, that we have had to find so much fault. What we had have to find fault with is, that the policy was placed in the hands of men who evidently held different views, and that the instructions given by the Government were not carried out. The selection of Sir Garnet Wolseley—a man in whom the country has every reason to have great confidence, who has had the opportunity of holding personal conferences with Her Majesty's Ministers, and who, I may assume, is personally acquainted with those views, and is also in perfect agreement with them—is of such a character that the affairs of the country will be in very different hands, when Sir Garnet Wolseley reaches the Cape, from those in which they have hitherto been unfortunately placed. I think the Government cannot be surprised at the great anxiety that has been expressed for information this evening. We cannot help looking upon this as a very critical turning-point in this matter; and although we know the general views of the Government on the subject, I think the House will have heard with satisfaction that the instructions Sir Garnet Wolseley will take with him will emphasize those views which have already met with the approval of this House. We, on this side, do not yield to any hon. Members opposite in our desire that the conclusion of the war shall be one that will give safety to the Colony, and, at the same time, honour to this country. But what we do wish clearly to understand is, that the honour of the British arms does not require the slaughter of an indefinite number of Zulus, and we also desire to know that the Government are not pledged to the opinion, which we know is held by Sir Bartle Frere, that there is no possible security for our Colonists in South Africa until the military organization of the Zulu Kingdom is entirely destroyed. I gather from what has fallen from the right hon. Gentleman that these are not the views held by the Government, and that the instructions given to Sir Garnet Wolseley will be in conformity with those despatches from the Colonial Office which have met with most approval in this House.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE said, he had that morning sent to the Secretary of State for War a letter written by Bishop Colenso and referring to the messengers reported to have been sent by Cetewayo to Lord Chelmsford to ask for peace—a subject on which the hon. and learned Member for Louth (Mr. Sullivan) had already asked a Question. From this letter, the Secretary of State would see that these messengers were men who had formerly brought most important messages from Cetewayo to our Government, and that, in Bishop Colenso's opinion, they were of sufficiently high authority to be the bearers of overtures of peace.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT desired to ask the Colonial Secretary, whether the commission at present held by Sir

Sir Michael Hicks-Beach

Bartle Frere was cancelled or about to be cancelled? That commission was one conferring such great and general powers that Sir Bartle Frere considered it justified him in making war without the consent of the Government; and unless it were cancelled, they would have no security for the future, and it would be likely to conflict with Sir Garnet Wolseley's commission.

SIR MICHAEL HICKS - BEACH said, if the hon. and learned Gentlemen would wait until he saw the Papers, he would find that they explained precisely the position of the matter.

MR. PARNELL did not think the assurance of the Government so satisfactory as the right hon. Gentlemen on the front Bench seemed to believe. He wished to know whether Sir Garnet Wolseley's instructions would forbid the employment of Native auxiliaries for following up the Zulus when beaten in the field? The practice had given rise to horrors that was a disgrace to humanity and civilization.

MR. SULLIVAN said, he recognized the force of the suggestion made by the hon. Member for Hackney, and thought it would, therefore, be desirable of him to withdraw his Motion for the adjournment of the House, and give Notice that to-morrow he would ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer, whether he could state to the House in substance the instructions given to Sir Garnet Wolseley with reference to the negotiations for peace? He thought it unreasonable that he should ask anything as regarded military movements. Those must be left to the General in the field; but, under the peculiar circumstances of the House adjourning for a fortnight, he thought it right that he should ask for the substance of the instructions with regard to the negotiations for peace; and if he did not get a satisfactory answer, it would be his duty to oppose the Motion for the adjournment of the House.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

SOUTH AFRICA — THE TRANSVAAL.

NOTICE OF AMENDMENT TO MOTION.

MR. O'DONNELL: I beg to give Notice that to-morrow I shall move as an Amendment to the Motion of the Chancellor of the Exchequer for the adjournment for the Holidays—

"That inasmuch as the consent of Parliament to the annexation of the Transvaal was obtained by representations which have been proved to be unfounded, and whereas no valid reason exists for preferring the discontented objection to the friendly alliance of the inhabitants of that territory, this House is of opinion that the Imperial pledge which was pledged, and which has been broken, ought to be retrieved without delay by the restoration to its former independence of the South African Republic."

MR. SPEAKER: I must point out to the hon. Member that upon the Motion of which the Chancellor of the Exchequer has given Notice for to-morrow no Amendment can be moved, except with reference to the time of the adjournment.

MR. O'DONNELL said, he would pursue his object in a form that would bring it within the Rules of the House.

AFGHANISTAN — THE WAR — SIGNATURE OF A TREATY OF PEACE.

OBSERVATIONS.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Before the Clerk proceeds to read the Orders of the Day, I will take the opportunity of stating that I have received a communication from my noble Friend the Secretary of State for India, which informs me that this evening he has received from Major Cavagnari a telegram, dated to-day, and stating that a Treaty of Peace with the Ameer of Cabul was signed this day.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

SUPPLY—CIVIL SERVICE ESTIMATES.

[Progress.]

SUPPLY—considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

CLASS III.—LAW AND JUSTICE.

(1.) Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £339,680, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1880, for the Salaries and Expenses of the Commissioners and other Officers appointed under the 6th and 7th Sections of the Prison Act, 1877, and the Expenses of the several Prisons in England and Wales to which that Act applies."

only authorized, but directed, to receive and entertain any bond fide overtures that may be made to him by the Zulu King, in order that, as soon as possible, the end of his mission may be accomplished.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: Sir, I think that probably the statement just made by the right hon. Gentleman will be satisfactory to the House; but I cannot but regret that it was not made sooner. I must also point out that the reason which the right hon. Gentleman has given for not stating the instructions to Sir Garnet Wolseley more in detail seem somewhat inconsistent with that which was given at an earlier period of the evening by the Chancellor of the Exchequer. I understood the Chancellor of the Exchequer to say that Papers would be laid on the Table and be almost immediately in our hands. If that be so, it would then be possible for the contingency that the Secretary of State for the Colonies dreads to take place; for these instructions would be telegraphed to South Africa, and be discussed there, before the arrival of Sir Garnet Wolseley. I assume that the Government will lay the Papers upon the Table as soon as, in their opinion, they can be presented without any injury to the Public Service; and I do not know that under the circumstances we can expect more than the statement just made by the right hon. Gentleman. I cannot sit down without saying I have heard with great satisfaction the announcement made by the Government this evening. We, on this side, must look upon it, to a very great extent, as a justification of the course that we thought it necessary to take a month or two ago. It is not with the policy of the Government, as laid down by them, that we have had to find so much fault. What we had to find fault with is, that the policy was placed in the hands of men who evidently held different views, and that the instructions given by the Government were not carried out. The selection of Sir Garnet Wolseley—a man in whom the country has every reason to have great confidence, who has had the opportunity of holding personal conferences with Her Majesty's Ministers, and who, I may assume, is personally acquainted with those views, and is also in perfect agreement with them—is of such a character that the affairs of the country will be in very different hands, when Sir Garnet Wolseley reaches the Cape, from those in which they have hitherto been unfortunately placed. I think the Government cannot be surprised at the great anxiety that has been expressed for information this evening. We cannot help looking upon this as a very critical turning-point in this matter; and although we know the general views of the Government on the subject, I think the House will have heard with satisfaction that the instructions Sir Garnet Wolseley will take with him will emphasize those views which have already met with the approval of this House. We, on this side, do not yield to any hon. Members opposite in our desire that the conclusion of the war shall be one that will give safety to the Colony, and, at the same time, honour to this country. But what we do wish clearly to understand is, that the honour of the British arms does not require the slaughter of an indefinite number of Zulus, and we also desire to know that the Government are not pledged to the opinion, which we know is held by Sir Bartle Frere, that there is no possible security for our Colonists in South Africa until the military organization of the Zulu Kingdom is entirely destroyed. I gather from what has fallen from the right hon. Gentleman that these are not the views held by the Government, and that the instructions given to Sir Garnet Wolseley will be in conformity with those despatches from the Colonial Office which have met with most approval in this House.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE said, he had that morning sent to the Secretary of State for War a letter written by Bishop Colenso and referring to the messengers reported to have been sent by Cetewayo to Lord Chelmsford to ask for peace—a subject on which the hon. and learned Member for Louth (Mr. Sullivan) had already asked a Question. From this letter, the Secretary of State would see that these messengers were men who had formerly brought most important messages from Cetewayo to our Government, and that, in Bishop Colenso's opinion, they were of sufficiently high authority to be the bearers of overtures of peace.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT desired to ask the Colonial Secretary, whether the commission at present held by Sir

Sir Michael Hicks-Beach

Bartle Frere was cancelled or about to be cancelled? That commission was one conferring such great and general powers that Sir Bartle Frere considered it justified him in making war without the consent of the Government; and unless it were cancelled, they would have no security for the future, and it would be likely to conflict with Sir Garnet Wolseley's commission.

SIR MICHAEL HICKS - BEACH said, if the hon. and learned Gentlemen would wait until he saw the Papers, he would find that they explained precisely the position of the matter.

MR. PARNELL did not think the assurance of the Government so satisfactory as the right hon. Gentlemen on the front Bench seemed to believe. He wished to know whether Sir Garnet Wolseley's instructions would forbid the employment of Native auxiliaries for following up the Zulus when beaten in the field? The practice had given rise to horrors that was a disgrace to humanity and civilization.

MR. SULLIVAN said, he recognized the force of the suggestion made by the hon. Member for Hackney, and thought it would, therefore, be desirable of him to withdraw his Motion for the adjournment of the House, and give Notice that to-morrow he would ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer, whether he could state to the House in substance the instructions given to Sir Garnet Wolseley with reference to the negotiations for peace? He thought it unreasonable that he should ask anything as regarded military movements. Those must be left to the General in the field; but, under the peculiar circumstances of the House adjourning for a fortnight, he thought it right that he should ask for the substance of the instructions with regard to the negotiations for peace; and if he did not get a satisfactory answer, it would be his duty to oppose the Motion for the adjournment of the House.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

SOUTH AFRICA — THE TRANSVAAL.

NOTICE OF AMENDMENT TO MOTION.

MR. O'DONNELL: I beg to give Notice that to-morrow I shall move as an Amendment to the Motion of the Chancellor of the Exchequer for the adjournment for the Holidays—

"That inasmuch as the consent of Parliament to the annexation of the Transvaal was obtained by representations which have been proved to be unfounded, and whereas no valid reason exists for preferring the discontented objection to the friendly alliance of the inhabitants of that territory, this House is of opinion that the Imperial pledge which was pledged, and which has been broken, ought to be retrieved without delay by the restoration to its former independence of the South African Republic."

MR. SPEAKER: I must point out to the hon. Member that upon the Motion of which the Chancellor of the Exchequer has given Notice for to-morrow no Amendment can be moved, except with reference to the time of the adjournment.

MR. O'DONNELL said, he would pursue his object in a form that would bring it within the Rules of the House.

AFGHANISTAN — THE WAR — SIGNATURE OF A TREATY OF PEACE.

OBSERVATIONS.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Before the Clerk proceeds to read the Orders of the Day, I will take the opportunity of stating that I have received a communication from my noble Friend the Secretary of State for India, which informs me that this evening he has received from Major Cavagnari a telegram, dated to-day, and stating that a Treaty of Peace with the Ameer of Cabul was signed this day.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

SUPPLY—CIVIL SERVICE ESTIMATES.

[Progress.]

SUPPLY—considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

CLASS III.—LAW AND JUSTICE.

(1.) Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £339,680, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1880, for the Salaries and Expenses of the Commissioners and other Officers appointed under the 6th and 7th Sections of the Prison Act, 1877, and the Expenses of the several Prisons in England and Wales to which that Act applies."

only authorized, but directed, to receive and entertain any bond fide overtures that may be made to him by the Zulu King, in order that, as soon as possible, the end of his mission may be accomplished.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: Sir, I think that probably the statement just made by the right hon. Gentleman will be satisfactory to the House; but I cannot but regret that it was not made sooner. I must also point out that the reason which the right hon. Gentleman has given for not stating the instructions to Sir Garnet Wolseley more in detail seem somewhat inconsistent with that which was given at an earlier period of the evening by the Chancellor of the Exchequer. I understood the Chancellor of the Exchequer to say that Papers would be laid on the Table and be almost immediately in our hands. If that be so, it would then be possible for the contingency that the Secretary of State for the Colonies dreads to take place; for these instructions would be telegraphed to South Africa, and be discussed there, before the arrival of Sir Garnet Wolseley. I assume that the Government will lay the Papers upon the Table as soon as, in their opinion, they can be presented without any injury to the Public Service; and I do not know that under the circumstances we can expect more than the statement just made by the right hon. Gentleman. I cannot sit down without saying I have heard with great satisfaction the announcement made by the Government this evening. We, on this side, must look upon it, to a very great extent, as a justification of the course that we thought it necessary to take a month or two ago. It is not with the policy of the Government, as laid down by them, that we have had to find so much fault. What we had have to find fault with is, that the policy was placed in the hands of men who evidently held different views, and that the instructions given by the Government were not carried out. The selection of Sir Garnet Wolseley—a man in whom the country has every reason to have great confidence, who has had the opportunity of holding personal conferences with Her Majesty's Ministers, and who, I may assume, is personally acquainted with those views, and is also in perfect agreement with them—is of such a character that the affairs of the country will be in very different hands, when Sir Garnet Wolseley reaches the Cape, from those in which they have hitherto been unfortunately placed. I think the Government cannot be surprised at the great anxiety that has been expressed for information this evening. We cannot help looking upon this as a very critical turning-point in this matter; and although we know the general views of the Government on the subject, I think the House will have heard with satisfaction that the instructions Sir Garnet Wolseley will take with him will emphasize those views which have already met with the approval of this House. We, on this side, do not yield to any hon. Members opposite in our desire that the conclusion of the war shall be one that will give safety to the Colony, and, at the same time, honour to this country. But what we do wish clearly to understand is, that the honour of the British arms does not require the slaughter of an indefinite number of Zulus, and we also desire to know that the Government are not pledged to the opinion, which we know is held by Sir Bartle Frere, that there is no possible security for our Colonists in South Africa until the military organization of the Zulu Kingdom is entirely destroyed. I gather from what has fallen from the right hon. Gentleman that these are not the views held by the Government, and that the instructions given to Sir Garnet Wolseley will be in conformity with those despatches from the Colonial Office which have met with most approval in this House.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE said, he had that morning sent to the Secretary of State for War a letter written by Bishop Colenso and referring to the messengers reported to have been sent by Cetewayo to Lord Chelmsford to ask for peace—a subject on which the hon. and learned Member for Louth (Mr. Sullivan) had already asked a Question. From this letter, the Secretary of State would see that these messengers were men who had formerly brought most important messages from Cetewayo to our Government, and that, in Bishop Colenso's opinion, they were of sufficiently high authority to be the bearers of overtures of peace.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT desired to ask the Colonial Secretary, whether the commission at present held by Sir

Sir Michael Hicks-Beach

Bartle Frere was cancelled or about to be cancelled? That commission was one conferring such great and general powers that Sir Bartle Frere considered it justified him in making war without the consent of the Government; and unless it were cancelled, they would have no security for the future, and it would be likely to conflict with Sir Garnet Wolseley's commission.

SIR MICHAEL HICKS - BEACH said, if the hon. and learned Gentlemen would wait until he saw the Papers, he would find that they explained precisely the position of the matter.

MR. PARNELL did not think the assurance of the Government so satisfactory as the right hon. Gentlemen on the front Bench seemed to believe. He wished to know whether Sir Garnet Wolseley's instructions would forbid the employment of Native auxiliaries for following up the Zulus when beaten in the field? The practice had given rise to horrors that was a disgrace to humanity and civilization.

MR. SULLIVAN said, he recognized the force of the suggestion made by the hon. Member for Hackney, and thought it would, therefore, be desirable of him to withdraw his Motion for the adjournment of the House, and give Notice that to-morrow he would ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer, whether he could state to the House in substance the instructions given to Sir Garnet Wolseley with reference to the negotiations for peace? He thought it unreasonable that he should ask anything as regarded military movements. Those must be left to the General in the field; but, under the peculiar circumstances of the House adjourning for a fortnight, he thought it right that he should ask for the substance of the instructions with regard to the negotiations for peace; and if he did not get a satisfactory answer, it would be his duty to oppose the Motion for the adjournment of the House.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

SOUTH AFRICA — THE TRANSVAAL.

NOTICE OF AMENDMENT TO MOTION.

MR. O'DONNELL: I beg to give Notice that to-morrow I shall move as an Amendment to the Motion of the Chancellor of the Exchequer for the adjournment for the Holidays—

"That inasmuch as the consent of Parliament to the annexation of the Transvaal was obtained by representations which have been proved to be unfounded, and whereas no valid reason exists for preferring the discontented objection to the friendly alliance of the inhabitants of that territory, this House is of opinion that the Imperial pledge which was pledged, and which has been broken, ought to be retrieved without delay by the restoration to its former independence of the South African Republic."

MR. SPEAKER: I must point out to the hon. Member that upon the Motion of which the Chancellor of the Exchequer has given Notice for to-morrow no Amendment can be moved, except with reference to the time of the adjournment.

MR. O'DONNELL said, he would pursue his object in a form that would bring it within the Rules of the House.

AFGHANISTAN — THE WAR — SIGNATURE OF A TREATY OF PEACE.

OBSERVATIONS.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Before the Clerk proceeds to read the Orders of the Day, I will take the opportunity of stating that I have received a communication from my noble Friend the Secretary of State for India, which informs me that this evening he has received from Major Cavagnari a telegram, dated to-day, and stating that a Treaty of Peace with the Ameer of Cabul was signed this day.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

SUPPLY—CIVIL SERVICE ESTIMATES.

[Progress.]

SUPPLY—considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

CLASS III.—LAW AND JUSTICE.

(1.) Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £339,680, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1880, for the Salaries and Expenses of the Commissioners and other Officers appointed under the 6th and 7th Sections of the Prison Act, 1877, and the Expenses of the several Prisons in England and Wales to which that Act applies."

MR. DODSON said, he wished to ask a few questions. He observed by the Estimates that his right hon. Friend the Home Secretary (Mr. Assheton Cross) had reduced the number of prisons by 43; his original estimate was that he would reduce them by 50, and that number was afterwards increased to 54. He should like to know to what further extent his right hon. Friend hoped to be able to reduce the prisons? Was any further reduction contemplated in the staffs of the prisons, which had been brought down from over 2,500 to 2,230? According to the Estimates, also, the right hon. Gentleman had reduced the cost of the prisons, compared with what it was in 1877, the last complete year of the old régime, by £52,000. The original reduction contemplated was £50,000, so that his right hon. Friend had been even more successful than he hoped for; but that, he was sure he would admit, was partly due to the great fall in the cost of fuel, food, and clothing. He should like to know if his right hon. Friend had any idea of how much of that reduction was due to the reduction in the number of the prisons and of the staff? At the time he introduced his Prisons Bill his right hon. Friend said he hoped to double the return from prison labour. Up to the present time, however, there was no advance in this respect. In the year 1877 the return from extra receipts was £65,000, which included some other items, prison labour amounting to £56,000; while the estimated receipts this year, with a somewhat larger number of prisoners, were only £60,000. Therefore, he thought he might presume that the net earnings from prisoners' labour actually decreased, and he should like to ask why that was so? The result appeared to have been the same last year, for in the foot-note to the Estimates it said "estimated receipts £60,000" for last year. Could not his right hon. Friend tell them the actual receipts? He was putting these questions in no carping spirit, but merely to elicit information, and with the most sincere desire that the most sanguine expectations of his right hon. Friend might be realized. Of course, even if all those expectations were realized, the difference would only be a halfpenny or three-farthings in the pound on the rate, and even that could not be realized for some years till the pensions began to run out. The financial success of the Prisons Act would depend upon continued firmness on the part of the Government. Of course, a Central Department was very much handicapped in obtaining economy, because in such offices there was always a natural tendency to extravagance, not from carelessness or want of vigilance, but from this officer and that officer recommending this improvement or that improvement in the desire to make the system perfect. Unless, in fact, this tendency was repressed by a firm and vigorous hand, in a very few years the cost of the new system would be greater than that of the old.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS regretted that he was unable fully to answer the questions of his right hon. Friend, for the simple reason that the accounts were not sent in until after the close of the financial year; and, therefore, the Commissioners did not expect to be able to get them ready for presentation to Parliament before July. Still, he would answer to the best of his ability, and would promise that the different matters should be fully dealt with in the Report. They thought it right to take two years in which to decide what prisons should be closed. Very little more than a year had elapsed since the passing of the Act, and 43 had already been closed, and orders had since been given for closing one other. He and the Prison Commissioners had it in contemplation to close quite as many as was originally proposed; but on that subject he would not say more, except that in order that certain prisons might, to the public advantage, be closed, £29,000 had been taken for alterations, in order to make certain prisons larger. A reduction of the staff would naturally follow from this; but it was not his intention to reduce the present staff more than he had done. From what he had seen of the Estimates, he thought £10,000 of the £52,855 saved was due to the reduced cost of food, &c.; but he had no hesitation in saying, from what he had already experienced, that there would certainly be an eventual saving of £50,000 from the reduction in the number of prisons and of the staff. There had also been an increase of 1,000 in the number of prisoners; yet, in the face of that, the expenses had been thus largely decreased. This was, however, only an increase for a time. As to the prison labour, when the local authorities gave up the prisons they sold off all their materials; and, therefore, there was no great demand at the present time for such goods as they had to sell, for there was such a thing as glutting the market. A system like that, either, could not at once be put in order, and it was some time before they got into full swing. Therefore, he did not think the estimate for the first year would be reached, though he did hope and expect that the one for the second year, of £60,000, would be realized. Up to the present, also, he had not done very much in the matter of prison labour, for he thought it very desirable first to make inquiries as to its effect on trade outside. He accordingly appointed a Departmental Committee, who went into the matter very thoroughly. Their Report was again submitted to a very able person, who went most carefully and narrowly through it, and then presented a very able and elaborate Report on the matter, for his (Mr. Assheton Cross's) private inspection. Before, however, finally dealing with the matter, he thought it better also to have the opinion of two absolutely independent and impartial persons, who had nothing to do with the matter officially whatever, and, therefore, he submitted this Report to two gentlemen who had nothing whatever to do with prison labour in any shape or form. One of them was a most active county magistrate in the West of England, and the other was a medical gentleman. They had also reported, and he now hoped to be able to deal with the question. He had felt, however, that it was far more satisfactory that this question of prison labour should not be touched at all until there had been the most careful inquiry as to its effects. Therefore, it would still be some little time before this system got into working order, although he was sure the amount earned would reach the estimate in a year or two.

MR. COLE was sorry that the Home Secretary had not been able to give them more exact details as to the amount received from prison labour during the Government had had the prisons under their exclusive charge.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS said, he had not been quite understood. The accounts had not yet been made up for the reasons he had stated. The Government did not get the system of prison labour in work for the first three months either.

MR. COLE could not understand why the labour should have been stopped when the Government took over the gaols. There was, undoubtedly, a strong feeling outside against prison labour, and it was said that certain industries were ruined by the competition. That might be true, perhaps, to some extent, as regarded mat-making; but, on the other hand, he had always been in favour of making a felon earn his own living by industrial labour. It was said that that would glut the labour market, but it was not at all the case, for the criminal was taken from his work outside, and it mattered very little whether he laboured inside a gaol or outside. He should be put to work at the same trade as he ordinarily worked, and if the man did not know a handicraft trade, which was often the case, he hoped the Home Secretary would do what he himself had always contended ought to be done—that was, to try and teach the prisoners some trade while they were in prison. In Devonport gaol, of which he had had a large experience, the Governor actually built the whole of a large wing entirely by prison labour, and it was admitted on all hands that the work was far better than that in the old gaol. Why, then, should not these felons be taught various handicraft trades which would be of benefit to them when they came out. [MR. ASSHETON CROSS: It is being done.] He (Mr. Cole) was very glad to hear it, because there was too great a tendency to teach only one or two trades, and to keep prisoners employed at those trades, and so the complaint as to the glutting the market arose. If they were employed in a great number of various industries no complaint could properly arise. He hoped the right hon. Gentleman did not mean to close Plymouth gaol, which was now very full in consequence of the closing of the gaol at Devonport.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS stated that he had recently told the Mayor that that prison was not going to be closed.

SIR WALTER B. BARTELOT wished his right hon. Friend could have given them a more clear and distinct account of the cost of every prison, naming each prison, throughout the country, now that they were under the Government, so that they might compare it with the cost under the magistracy. The present statement was a very vague one, and they ought to have all this information given them without having to go to the judicial statistics. The present was a very unfair way of making out the accounts, for it was his firm conviction if the accounts were analyzed, instead of there being a saving under the present system, that a loss would be shown. As a visiting magistrate of more than 30 years' experience, he was unhesitatingly of opinion that, as a majority of the sentences were for very short terms, it would be impossible to make any very large sum by the earnings of the prisoners. The old system was gone, and they had to deal with the new state of things; but he did think that the Government should give them the means of judging whether it was working fairly or not.

MR. RYLANDS said, he had never for a moment anticipated that the Prisons Act would be carried out in a manner satisfactory to the local authorities, and he had no sympathy with those magistrates who cringed to the Home Office and were willing to sell their local rights and powers of administration in order to get relieved of responsibility which belonged to them. It was necessary, to some extent, to struggle against officialism, which certainly, in his opinion, had lessened the efficiency of prison discipline, and was very likely to lead to increased expenditure. The right hon. Gentleman, when he introduced the Prisons Act, made a promise to the House to which he (Mr. Rylands) thought he must be held. That promise, from which he was quite sure there was no wish to depart, was that—"While the local rates would be relieved to the extent of £92,000, there would only be an additional charge upon the Public Revenue of £285,000." The right hon. Gentleman, in stating what was perfectly clear from the Estimates, that this point had not been reached, had treated the matter with perfect candour. But the position of affairs at starting this year was this. In the first place, the Government had admitted that they were at a considerable distance from the goal at which they themselves wished to arrive, inasmuch as they had not been able to bring down the expenditure to anything like the amount anticipated; and, in the second place, they had also admitted that they were unable to bring up the earnings for prison labour to anything like the amount expected. He wished to point out to the Home Secretary that there had been already, owing to certain causes, such as the reduced cost of food and clothing, referred to by the right hon. Member for Chester (Mr. Dodson), a very considerable diminution in the prison expenditure since the year 1875, and that, therefore, economy might have been secured had the Government so willed it without this great revolution in prison management. But he had to complain that the account presented for the information of the House was delusive, inasmuch as it did not contain a number of charges which had come upon the Exchequer in consequence of the passing of the Prisons Act; for instance, there was a charge of £11,000 for printing and stationery, which was paid out of another Vote and which, therefore, did not appear in the present account. There was also a charge of £600 on account of prisons included in the Supplementary Estimates; in fact, the House would find various charges cropping up in the different Votes, which would not have been there but for the prisons having been taken over by the State; and although it would not be fair to make use of captious criticism, he thought that the House would be obliged to put the Government, so to speak, upon their trial with regard to the prisons which had been so unreasonably taken over. He thought that as soon as the Government were in a position to state the facts the House should receive a full account, not merely of the charges which appeared on the face of this Vote, but of all charges which had been brought upon the Exchequer in relation to prisons in consequence of their being taken over by the State, and that these items should be brought to a focus and appear in a tabulated form. He did not press this upon the Government because he had opposed the Bill, or with any wish to show that, under the new system, there would be less economy. On the contrary, he should be agreeably disappointed if the system proved to be an economical one, as would also be the case with several distinguished gentlemen in the Treasury who, he was quite certain, had not expected that the taking over of the prisons would be an economical operation. If, however, those expectations were agreeably disappointed, he should be very glad; but it was to be feared, from their experience of Government administration—what with the increase of officials and their superannuation allowances, the building of new prisons and the pulling down or enlarging of old ones, as well as with the staff of architects and builders likely to be employed—that the volume of cost would continue to swell year by year. If such was found to be the case, many hon. Members would not fail to press the fact upon the attention of the Government.

Sir Walter B. Barttelot

MR. ASSHETON CROSS said, that according to a Return which he held in his hand, the cost of the county and borough prisons for the year 1873 was £585,000, from which amount had to be deducted the sum of £43,000 for interest on loans to local authorities for building purposes; in round numbers, therefore, the cost of the county and borough prisons for the year 1873 amounted to £542,000. According to the estimate presented by him to the House at the time, the probable reduced cost of the prisons was £484,500, which he had proposed to meet by taxation to the extent of £371,000, prisoners' labour £106,000, and other contingent receipts of £7,500. Taking this sum of £484,500, and comparing it with the estimate of the year 1879-80, which amounted to £472,680, it would be seen that he was still within the sum stated to the House. Again, he had stated that the sum of £97,000 had already been paid out of the taxes in the year 1873; this sum would, therefore, have to be deducted from the £371,000, a circumstance which appeared to have slipped from the mind of the hon. Member for Burnley (Mr. Rylands), when he reminded the House that he (Mr. Assheton Cross) had promised that the extra burden upon the taxpayers should not exceed £285,000.

MR. SERJEANT SIMON said, that, without intending to repeat the observations which he had felt it his duty to make on a previous occasion, he must refer to the difficulty of adjusting prison labour in such a way as would not bring it into undue competition with the work done outside. There were certain things connected with the system of prison labour to which he called attention. In the first place, he understood that it had been the custom for the prison authorities to issue tenders to, and also to receive them from, manufacturing firms outside the prison walls, thereby creating competition with the labour of the honest man. This procedure, if truly stated, he held to be extremely objectionable. One of the tenders referred to had been shown to him in the Lobby, and he was informed that tenders similar to that which he had seen were also issued from a prison in Cambridgeshire, and were by no means uncommon. Surely the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary would see that such a course was inconsistent with what was due to the honest labourer, because, from the circumstance that prisoners were housed and fed at a comparatively small expense, their work could always be made to undersell his. Therefore, he desired to know whether the right hon. Gentleman was aware that such a practice as had been described existed in the prisons, and, if so, whether he would issue such instructions as would prevent its repetition? The subject, as he was quite aware, was difficult and delicate; at the same time, he knew that his right hon. Friend always desired to do what was just and right to the honest labourer. Again, when the Prisons Bill was before the House, great stress had been laid upon the fact that prison labour was confined to one or two industries, and that it was not generally distributed over the different industrial employments. One reason alleged for this was, as stated by his hon. and gallant Friend (Sir Walter B. Barttelot), that the prisoners sentenced for short terms of imprisonment could not be taught certain trades, and that mat and brush-making were much handier for them to learn. But he (Mr. Serjeant Simon) hoped that when the prison regulations were issued, due regard would be paid to the promise given when the Prisons Bill was before the House, that industrial labour in prisons should be extended to the industries generally, and not be confined to, or put in competition with, one or two trades.

SIR BALDWIN LEIGHTON complained that, although the Government were pressing the localities to provide extra accommodation for lunatics, the Commissioners had thrown many difficulties in the way of their obtaining the grants to which they were entitled.

MR. A. MOORE hoped the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary would not be carried away by the observations which had been made by the hon. and learned Member for Dewsbury (Mr. Serjeant Simon) with respect to prison labour, and that he would also bear in mind that besides the honest labourer there was the honest taxpayer. He objected very strongly to the agitation with regard to this subject, because it was prejudicial to the public interest, and could never see why prison labour should not be made use of for public purposes, nor why prisoners upon whom large sums of money were spent should not be allowed to do something towards their own maintenance. That doctrine, in his opinion, was most objectionable, and he believed that by the proper use of prison labour very large contracts might be undertaken. It was, therefore, to be hoped that the right hon. Gentleman would not lose sight of the interest of the honest taxpayer by prohibiting remunerative labour in prisons. It was desirable that these institutions should be allowed to produce as much as they could, and that the Government should utilize the results of prison labour for the public benefit in any way they thought fit, always provided, of course, that they did not undersell ordinary labour.

SIR ANDREW LUSK, although he disliked the Prisons Act, admitted that the Home Secretary had carried out its provisions fairly and efficiently, and that he had also shown a desire to turn prison labour to account from a business point of view. Speaking as one of many years' experience of the Central Criminal Court, he considered that a good deal of sentimentalism had been talked upon this matter of prison labour; and he begged to assure the House that the magistrates, in sentencing a man to a term of imprisonment, were only influenced by a desire to promote the ends of justice, and that they paid no regard whatever to the possibility of turning the labour imposed to profitable account. The public good would, in his opinion, be very much interfered with if they were to allow themselves to be influenced by any such considerations. Referring to the subject which he had brought to the notice of the Home Secretary when the previous Prison Vote was under the consideration of the Committee, he reminded the right hon. Gentleman that the magistrates considered it hard that they were unable to grant permission, under proper circumstances, to persons who wished to see their relations in prison. Some liberty should, in his opinion, be granted in this respect, to supersede the difficult and, in many cases, almost impossible application on the part of poor people to the Home Secretary. It was to be feared that by unnecessary deprivations of this kind prisoners, whose punishment was intended as an example to others, became hardened, and were sometimes in a worse state when they came out of prison than when they went in. He therefore trusted that the right hon. Gentleman would afford some facilities in the direction indicated.

MR. PARNELL said, he could not see how the managers of prisons were to put themselves in a different position to the managers of any other manufactories, because, after all, they must look out for orders for their manufactures, and, in doing so, they necessarily placed themselves in competition with the outside world, because consumers of manufactured goods would always try to buy in the cheapest market, and would probably give the preference to employers of labour like themselves. For these reasons, the managers of prisons were in considerable difficulty, and had to arrange for the sale of their goods as best they were able. But his object in rising was to call attention to the arrangement of the Order Book for that evening, with reference to Supply, and, for the purpose of putting himself in Order, he thought it would be necessary that he should conclude with a Motion. It appeared to him that the Government had adopted a course which was exceedingly inconvenient in placing upon the Paper a great number of Classes of Supply, and following that up by a demand for a Vote on Account. He had never known of an instance in which the other Classes of Estimates had been set down prior to a Vote on Account, while the course proposed by the Government was rendered all the more inconvenient at so late a period of the Session. He never objected to Votes being taken on account at an early period of the Session, because the system adopted by the

Sir Baldwin Leighton

Treasury and by the country necessitated the return to the Exchequer of all unexpended balances, the Government being, consequently, obliged, at the commencement of the Session, to ask the House for Votes on Account to meet the current expenditure of the various branches of the Public Service. But he thought that the position of the Government in the present Session was certainly one which should have prevented any appeal being made for a second Vote on Account. At the beginning of the Session, a very exceptional and stringent Rule was adopted by the House and the Government, who promised that the Estimates should in future be brought forward regularly, and Votes on Account avoided. That promise had not been fulfilled, inasmuch as the Government, having taken one very considerable Vote on Account, were now asking for a second Vote to meet the expenditure for another month. He therefore considered that, under such circumstances, it would have been reasonable for the Government to have placed the Vote on Account before the Votes classed in the Estimates, and that the hon. Baronet the Secretary to the Treasury was ill-advised in adopting the opposite course, by which the Vote on Account would, in all probability, be reached very late in the evening, and at a time when hon. Members would get no explanations from the Government for this unusual and unsatisfactory procedure. He was not aware of any case where the Government had obtained a Vote on Account after Votes in Supply were granted; and, for this reason, it seemed to him that they should vindicate the course pursued on the present occasion. Again, he wished to point out to the hon. Baronet who had the arrangement of the Government Business that no single night during the Session had as yet been devoted to the consideration of the Irish Estimates. He was aware that upon one occasion, after the Easter Recess, these Estimates had been brought forward; but it would be remembered that the hon. and gallant Member for Galway (Major Nolan), in view of the absence of the Irish Members, had felt it incumbent upon him to ask the Government for a postponement of the Votes until their return. To this the Government had very kindly consented; but as the Irish Estimates had only been brought forward once during the Session, he (Mr. Parnell) thought the Committee were entitled to ask for some explanation of the very unprecedented course which had been adopted. He believed, upon the occasion in question, the Irish Members were asked to vote for the Irish Constabulary and Board of Works, as well as for the Scotch Universities. Without going into these matters, he wished to remind the Committee that very important questions attached to them all. It was only on Friday evening last that the Irish Members came to the conclusion that they would oppose the Vote for the Scotch Universities. The Chancellor of the Exchequer had stated that he would take Class IV., in which this Vote was included, that evening; but immediately the Government heard that it was to be opposed by the Irish Members, Class IV. was dropped. The hon. Baronet (Sir Henry Selwin-Ibbetson) said that Class IV. was not mentioned; but he would, perhaps, allow him to say that it was not mentioned by him. The Chancellor of the Exchequer, however, on rising to reply to a Question with regard to the Business on Monday, had mentioned Class IV. amongst those which were to be considered in Committee. At all events, Class IV. had been excluded, and it was found that no Vote was to be asked for on account of the Scotch Universities. But the Government had asked for a Vote on Account, the practical effect of that being to preclude all discussion with reference to the Vote. Under those circumstances, he thought he should be excused for asking the Government at what time of the evening they proposed to take the Vote on Account, and whether they would except from that the Votes for the Scotch Universities and the Irish Constabulary? Otherwise, the Irish Members would be prevented during the present Session from discussing the Votes in question, or, at all events, they would be driven on to so late a period as to render discussion impossible. Secondly, he wished to ask the hon. Baronet whether the Queen's Colleges in Ireland were getting any money, there having been no Vote on account of these institutions, and nothing being asked for that evening?

THE CHAIRMAN pointed out that the hon. Member had stated his intention to conclude with a Motion.

MR. PARNELL said, he had not forgotten the Motion. He was simply asking the hon. Baronet how the Queen's Colleges were subsisting during the time that no money was voted to them? He was aware that they only derived a portion of their endowments from the Votes; but as it was well known that, as regarded the Army Estimates, money voted by the House for particular services was applied to services for which it was not intended, it had struck him that the same thing might, perhaps, be taking place with regard to the Queen's Colleges. If the hon. Baronet would like to postpone the Vote for the Scotch Universities, it would not be necessary to take any discussion upon it to-night; but, if not, discussion would be necessary. As far as he was concerned, the Vote for the Scotch Universities might pass as a matter of course; but as he felt it his duty to press that the Vote on Account should be brought forward at as early an hour as possible, he begged to move that the Chairman report Progress.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."—(Mr. Parnell.)

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON confessed his regret that the interests of the Public Service had forced upon him the obligation of asking the House to take a second Vote on Account that evening. When he proposed the first Vote on Account, three months' Supply was asked for, and it was stated that notwithstanding the facilities given to the Government at the beginning of the year, the period of the Session was so much advanced that he could not see the possibility of getting a sufficient number of Votes passed to enable the Government to carry on the Public Service unless they had Votes on Account. To that proposal opposition was taken, and the amount cut down to two months' Supply. As he had foreseen, the state of Supply was such that the Public Service would be practically without sufficient money for the requirements—that was to say, that the sum at the disposal of the Government would be run out in the course of next week or so, unless another Vote on Account was obtained, because there was very little chance of getting money in Supply in time to meet the necessities of the Public Service. With regard to the question of the hon. Member for Meath (Mr. Parnell) concerning the Civil Service Votes, the same conditions did not apply to these as to the Votes for the Army and Navy, and there was no power of distributing public money over Votes not passed by the House. For that reason, he regretted to say that the Queen's Colleges and Queen's Universities in Ireland had not up to that time been able to get any of the money voted in the Estimates of the present year. With regard to the other point raised by the hon. Member, that by this time the Government ought to have had Supply much more forward, he thought the Committee, or, at all events, the hon. Member for Burnley (Mr. Rylands), would bear him out when he said that he had strenuously endeavoured to keep Supply as much as possible before the Committee of the House whenever an opportunity had offered. Notwithstanding that the Session had been rather rife with Votes of Censure upon the Government, which had taken up many nights, he had never missed a single occasion of endeavouring to get Supply passed by the Committee. It was a remarkable fact, however, that he had only got into Supply on four occasions. On the 18th April, 21 Votes in Class I. and 9 Votes in Class II. were passed; on the 21st April, 10 Votes in Class II.; on the 12th May, 17 Votes in Class II.; and, on the 19th May, 15 Votes in Class III. were passed, making a total of 72 Votes which he had been able to get in the Civil Service Estimates, and leaving 72 Votes still to be considered by the Committee. The Committee would see from that statement that the Government were not in a position to do without a further Vote on Account. The Vote asked for on account was for one month's more Supply; but it in no way precluded discussion on any single Vote embodied in the Estimates, for after this had been granted there would still remain a large sum to be voted. The Committee, therefore, would have fair and ample opportunities for discussion and consideration of any Vote to which hon. Members might take exception. Although the hon. Member for Meath thought that it was his intention to drive off the Votes to a period when hon. Members were likely to be worn out, or were wanting to get away, he could assure him that such, at any rate as far as he was concerned, was not the desire of a Secretary to the Treasury, whose object was to make Supply his first care, and to keep it before the Committee of the House until the whole was passed. He ventured to think that in the course of the next few weeks the Government might be able to place Supply on the Minutes, and if hon. Members opposite would have confidence enough in Her Majesty's Government not to pass too many Votes of Censure, he believed an endeavour might be made to meet the views of the hon. Member for Meath, and give him an opportunity of criticizing the Votes in question. If the Irish Votes had been postponed, the fault was due to the good-nature of the Secretary to the Treasury rather than to any wish to obstruct Business, for he had more than once been asked to postpone their consideration in order to meet the convenience of the Irish Members. He could assure the hon. Member for Meath that he would not be long without the opportunity of discussing the Irish Votes, which should be brought forward on the first occasion when Irish Members were present in sufficient numbers properly to consider them. Every week's postponement of the Votes for the Queen's Colleges and Universities, in his opinion, rendered their discussion the more necessary. He repeated, that his anxiety was to meet the views of hon. Members, and to bring forward the Civil Service Estimates as early as possible during the Session, in order to complete Supply and to allow opportunities for fair discussion upon particular Votes.

MR. RYLANDS said, he must bear testimony to the anxiety of the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury to meet the views of everyone in the House. Nothing could be more satisfactory than the endeavours of the hon. Gentleman to meet the convenience of all. Still, he thought there was some reason for objecting to the course now taken by the Government in placing Votes on Account in the Paper on the same day as Committee of Supply. The objection taken to that course was of this kind. It was understood that Votes on Account were within the terms of the Resolution with regard to the conduct of Public Business; so that if a Vote on Account were taken on any day but Monday, hon. Members would have a right to move a Resolution before going into Committee of Supply. He might say that he had the highest authority in the House—namely, the Speaker—upon that point, for Mr. Speaker had informed him that the rule would be that Votes on Account would be considered as ordinary Supply. Having robbed independent Members of some of their privileges—they had, unfortunately, been robbed by his hon. Friend who sat upon the Treasury Bench—they were now asked to restrict their privileges still more. The Government were asking them now to put down on Monday two Votes in Supply—one in regard to ordinary Supply, and one on Account. Notwithstanding his objection to the course taken, however, he did not intend to stop the progress of the Votes. This was the first occasion on which Votes on Account had been put down on the same evening as Votes in Supply, and he trusted it would not be made a precedent with regard to the Business of the House. He wished to give the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury Notice that when Votes were put down as Votes on Account on Monday, resistance would be made to their being taken. Considering, however, the explanation given by the Secretary to the Treasury, that he had only put down the Votes on that occasion with a view to the convenience of Members, and in order to push forward Supply, he did not think it would be unreasonable to take them on that occasion without construing their being so taken in any way into a precedent.

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON wished to say, in explanation, that it was absolutely necessary to take these Votes on Account before Whitsuntide. Unless he had put them down for Monday, it would be necessary for him to have taken a portion of the Whitsuntide Holidays, and detained hon. Members till Thursday. As he did not wish to put hon. Members to that inconvenience, he had taken the course of putting down the Votes on Account on the same evening as Supply for the ordinary Civil Services. He fully agreed with what had been said as to its not being an ordinary course to take; but he only adopted it on the present occasion with a view to consulting the convenience of the House.

MAJOR O'BEIRNE said, that he had the same objection as his hon. Friend the Member for Meath (Mr. Parnell) to Votes being taken on account of the Irish Constabulary. The state of affairs in that force was incompatible with discipline, and, speaking as an officer, he must say there was reason for grave objection. He did not, however, then intend to enter into that question; but he wished to protest against any Votes being taken on account of the Scotch Universities. He thought it was the duty of Irish Members to resist any Vote on that account, inasmuch as Scotch Members had taken considerable trouble to give the greatest possible opposition to the Irish University Bill.

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. and gallant Member is not in Order in going into the question of a Bill not under discussion by the House.

MAJOR O'BEIRNE observed, that the opposition of the Scotch Members to a Bill which had been introduced was very unreasonable; and so long as Scotch Members objected to the Imperial funds being applied in the same manner in Ireland as in Scotland, they must resist any Votes on Account of the Scotch Universities.

MR. MITCHELL HENRY said, that the Motion before the House was that of the hon. Member for Meath to report Progress. The subject they were debating before the Motion of the hon. Member was moved was that of prisons, and he wished to say a word or two on that subject when the present discussion was closed. He understood that the object of his hon. Friend the Member for Meath would be accomplished, if the Secretary to the Treasury assured them that this Vote on Account which he proposed to take would not include anything for the Scotch Universities. If the hon. Gentleman gave them that assurance, which he imagined he would be able to do, he apprehended that his hon. Friend the Member for Meath would withdraw his Motion. He considered that he was quite right in objecting to any Vote being taken on account which should include grants in aid of the Scotch Universities. With respect to this discussion on University Education, he wished to point out that their only practical way of objecting to a particular system of University Education was by moving to reduce the Votes, and the only effect of postponing the Vote on Scotch Universities now would be that that Vote would be taken definitely on another occasion; and so long as the Scotch Members objected to the institution in Ireland of a similar system to what they themselves enjoyed, so long must the Irish Members oppose any Vote for the Scotch Universities. He wished to call the attention of the House to what he thought were the ill effects of its abandoning its privileges on Monday. When that was proposed, he stated to the House his conviction that by discussing preliminary matters first they were enabled to have a more full and free discussion afterwards. They had been discussing the Prison Estimates, and the subject of prisons had caused considerable excitement in the country. By having a discussion before Committee, they would have obtained a full attendance of Members. But now anything they might say on the subject of prisons in Committee would not be reported, and they might as well address themselves to empty Benches as to the House in its present condition. These things were wrong, and were the result of the abandonment of the privileges of hon. Members for discussing questions before going into Committee. He protested at the time against Monday being taken from them, inasmuch as a Motion before Supply was almost the only opportunity they could get for discussions to be fully reported. It was well known that the discussions on the Estimates were not reported. But he hoped that when they had disposed of the Motion then before the House they would come to the question of prisons, and that the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary, who was responsible for them, would then be in his place. He did not grudge the right hon. Gentleman his necessary refreshment; but it would be more satisfactory that he should be in his place when the Prisons Vote was under discussion. He would not sit down without bearing testimony to the courtesy of the Secretary to the Treasury in postponing Irish Votes whenever requested to do so for the convenience of hon. Members. The hon. Gentleman was the most conciliatory Secretary to the Treasury that ever sat in that House, and he had always in the most obliging manner agreed to postpone Votes to suit the convenience of Members of all parts of the House. The hon. Baronet, he was sure, was actuated by a sense of justice and a wish to discuss Votes fairly and fully, and, he trusted, for the benefit of the country. He therefore begged to tender to the hon. Gentleman his vote of thanks for the course he had taken with regard to Irish Votes.

MR. A. MOORE thought it very unfair to place amongst the Votes on Account, which were otherwise unobjectionable, one to which considerable objection was raised. They did not object to give money for denominational purposes; but it was a great injustice to ask them to vote this money for the Scotch Universities so long as all parts of the country did not equally share in an expenditure from the public funds for the same purposes. If the hon. Baronet the Secretary to the Treasury would consent to postpone the Vote for the Scotch University Education till another occasion, when it could be brought on at an early hour, he thought the hon. Member for Meath would be justified in withdrawing his Motion; but it was unfair to ask them to vote this money while they had no chance of protesting against it.

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON was not quite sure that they were in Order in discussing a Vote when there was a Motion to report Progress before the House. As, however, there had been a strong expression of opinion against taking a Vote on Account for the Scotch Universities that evening, he would certainly omit that item from the Votes on Account. He must remind hon. Members that, because Votes on Account were taken, it in no way prevented the Vote itself being discussed. The particular sums voted were only for three months, and they had still nine months to vote on account of the Supply required; and there would, therefore, then be an ample opportunity for discussing the principles of the grants. But as the Votes were required for carrying on the different Services, he must press for a Vote on Account that night, with the exception of the item that he had mentioned. He would remind the hon. Member for Galway (Mr. Mitchell Henry, that it was not absolutely the fault of the Government that the Prisons Vote had come on to be discussed in a thin House. Various Members had raised a somewhat unexpected discussion; but had the Prisons Vote been taken in the manner proposed by the Government, it would have been considered in a full House. Therefore, he thought the Government must be acquitted of not bringing the Prison Vote on for discussion in a full House.

MR. O'DONNELL was of the same opinion as other hon. Members as to the manner in which the hon. Baronet the Secretary to the Treasury always treated the representations of hon. Members on that side of the House. He must, however, say that he felt that the discussions during that Session had very strongly corroborated the view he took, that Public Business was not facilitated by taking away the right of discussion before going into Committee of Supply. He could not but think that hon. Members were desirous to discuss items in the Estimates, so as to bring in general considerations which would have been very much better treated by means of the regular Resolution on going into Committee of Supply. The result was not only that the time of the House was quite as much occupied as before, but that they had a discussion which did not go directly to the point. It had been very fairly pointed out that they could not make the discussions upon the Estimates as generally interesting as they would be if brought on before going into Committee of Supply. He hoped he should not be in any way considered ungrateful in alluding to the conduct of the Secretary to the Treasury in postponing Irish Votes when requested to do so on account of the scant attendance of Irish Members, when he stated his opinion that that system was very injurious. Irish Members were to blame, and were fully responsible for deranging the regular progress of proceedings in the House, by requiring matters to stand over to meet their convenience. The practice of postponing matters in which Ireland was interested in consequence of the small attendance of Irish Members must injure the influence of Ireland in that House. If Ireland got anything like her proper value from the representation of 165 Members, there would not be a single Irish grievance, from tenant right to Home Rule, that would not be remedied in the space of three Sessions; therefore, he was heartily opposed to every attention being shown to Irish Members which encouraged them to abstain from doing their duty to their constituents in that House.

MR. PARNELL asked leave to withdraw his Motion, as he thought that the hon. Baronet the Secretary to the Treasury had made a very reasonable arrangement. He thought that the Vote on account of the Irish Constabulary should also be postponed.

MR. GOURLEY considered that there was a great difference between the Vote for the Scotch Universities and the Irish University Question. Whatever happened, the money must be granted by Parliament for the Scotch Universities, and he thought the Government were not acting rightly in consenting to the request for the postponement of the Vote on Account for them. It was very well known why their Irish Friends were asking for a postponement of this Vote; it was from the opposition of the Scotch Members to the Bill with reference to the Irish University. But the difference between a Bill for the Irish University, and voting money required for Scotch Universities, was very great. The payments on account of the Scotch Universities had been incurred, but the Irish University was yet in embryo; and, therefore, it was unfair to require the postponement of a Vote on Account for the Scotch Universities. He did not think that the Government were acting with a due desire to push forward the Business of the House in consenting to the postponement of the Vote.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Original Question again proposed.

MR. PARNELL wished to make some observations with reference to the disproportion between the salaries of the prison officials in England and Ireland. His hon. Friends were obliged, by the Forms of the House, to move to reduce the salaries of the English prison officials in order to give effect to their view that Irish prison officials should be paid larger salaries. He did not wish to go at length into this question, because he hoped that satisfactory assurance would be given either that the salaries of the English prison officials would be reduced, or that the salaries of the Irish officials would be raised to the same level. He had in his hand a long list, showing the disproportion in the salaries of the officials in the two countries. To take the case first of the higher officials. An English Chairman was paid £1,000 a-year out of the Prisons Vote under discussion, and another £1,000 a-year as Chairman of the Convict Prisons Board; whereas an Irish Chairman only got £1,200 a-year altogether. If the Irish Chairman could manage to exist on £1,200 a-year, he did not see any reason why the Englishman should not do so; he could not see any reason why the English Chairman should be paid an additional £1,000, whereas the Irish Chairman only obtained an additional £200 from the Prisons Vote. When they came to the seven Inspectors who were maintained in England, they would find that they had £700 a-year each, whereas the three Irish Inspectors only got £500 a-year each. The number of Inspectors in Ireland being less than in England they might assume that they had the same amount of work to do as those in England, and if £500 a-year was sufficient for an Irish Inspector it ought also to be sufficient for an English Inspector. He found, on looking into the Estimates, page 216, that the Governors of English prisons got an average salary in England of £710 a-year—he was speaking of the minimum salary, because they went from £710 to £2,000. On page 278 of the Estimates, he found that in Ireland the Governors of prisons were only paid from £100 to £350 a-year—an enormous disproportion, which he thought required some explanation of the Government. He found that the Deputy Governors in England received an average salary of £200 a-year; whereas the Deputy Governors in Ireland were paid from £60 to £130 a-year. Then the chaplains in England got an average salary of from £100 to £200 a-year, while the chaplains in Ireland were paid from £30 to £75 a-year in the case of Protestant chaplains; the Roman Catholic chaplains, however, in Ireland, were paid salaries averaging from £100 to £200 a-year. The same disproportion was seen in the salaries of the medical officers; and he might say that the same thing was observable in the whole list of officers from the Governors down to the lowest hewer of wood and drawer of water. He considered that if men could exist upon those salaries in Ireland they ought to do the same in England. There was a less number of officers in Ireland, because, probably, there was a less number of prisons. He wished to know why the English officers received so much higher salaries than those in Ireland? And unless a reasonable explanation was given, he must move to reduce the Vote.

Mr. O'Donnell

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON quite admitted, that at first sight, without going into figures, it might seem necessary that some explanation should be given with regard to the disproportion between the salaries paid to the English and Irish prison officials. But the Committee should not lose sight of all the circumstances connected with this matter. In the first place, the question was very much, and very properly, influenced by the amount of work that was to be done in the different countries—by the amount of inspection, and the amount of charge which was thrown upon each individual Inspector. One very important element was the number of prisons under the eye of each Inspector, and another was the number of prisoners in each prison. The number of prisoners in England was much in excess of the number in Ireland. In the 72 prisons in England the average number of prisoners was 284, and those prisons were, for the most part, very large ones. In fact, a very much larger proportion of work was required in England, and it would seem that an Inspector had much harder work in England than in Scotland or Ireland. Then, again, the number of prisoners was 20,500 in England, as against 2,300 in Scotland, and 2,940 in Ireland. What was the case with regard to the Irish Inspectors of prisons? The first proposal made for the salaries of the Irish Inspectors of prisons was that they should receive salaries of not less than £400 a-year. That amount was the first recommendation of the Irish Government, and on their asking for an increase of that amount for the three Inspectors, the demand was at once complied with, and they now received from £500 to £600 a-year. That was the only application which had been made with regard to the salaries of those Inspectors, and it was assented to at once, and there was no reason to think that it was not very fair remuneration for the services performed. From all that he had heard, he would venture to say that the salaries that had been paid had not been objected to by the officers who had been appointed; but, on the contrary, no complaints had been raised by any of them. When they looked to the relative remuneration of the different classes of the community in Ireland they would see that the salaries paid to the prison officials bore a very fair relation to that remuneration. He did not for a moment dispute that the remuneration that was given to the same officials in this country was greater. A medical man, however, in one country received very much greater remuneration than a medical man in the other, and the payments amongst all classes were greater in England than in Scotland and Ireland. The salaries paid were in relative proportion to the ordinary remuneration in the country; and, with regard to the amount of work done, they were fair salaries. He was sure that if the population and the number of prisoners in England, as compared with the number of prisoners in Ireland, and also the number of prisons were looked at, and the relative scale of professional remuneration in the different countries was considered, it would be found that the officials in Ireland were fairly and adequately paid.

MAJOR NOLAN said, the case was really much worse than had been stated. The Secretary to the Treasury seemed to say that, because there had been no complaint, there was no grievance; but, as a matter of fact, there were many complaints. The simple argument seemed to be that because all trades and professions in Ireland were worse paid in Ireland than they were in England, that, therefore, the servants of the Crown should also be worse paid. That was not a fair way of putting the question. If it was maintained that the Government officials in Ireland did less work than the Government officials in England, that might be a reason for paying less; but no such contention had been stated. Except in the case of the Inspectors, the Secretary to the Treasury made out no such case whatever. The true test was the cost of living, and though that certainly was cheaper at one time in Ireland than in England it was not the case now. With the exception of milk and eggs, he believed all sorts of food were quite as cheap in London as in any Irish town. Bread was probably cheaper, for they had to import a great deal of corn in Ireland, while many of the necessaries and all the luxuries of life were much cheaper here than there. As a consequence of their smaller pay, the minor Government officials in Ireland had, without doubt, to content themselves with lower positions than their English brethren enjoyed. Amongst the higher officials, he believed, many unnecessary offices existed. The speech of the Secretary to the Treasury did not give them much hope of any improvement, for he said that, as all other classes were accustomed to receive less remuneration in Ireland than England, the rule must hold good with Government officials also. That might be an argument with some little force, if there was a notable difference between the taxation of the two countries; but, as a matter of fact, he believed Ireland was more heavily taxed than England. The Irish were a whisky-drinking people, and spirits were taxed far more heavily than beer, which was what the English people drank; while, on the other hand, the Income Tax and the tobacco duty, for instance, were the same in both countries. Under such circumstances, he certainly thought it was most unfair to treat the Irish officials worse than the English.

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON thought his argument had been misrepresented. What he said was that the State, as an employer of labour, in the interests of the taxpayer, ought not to pay more for labour than its proper value, and that value depended upon the general remuneration of the different professions and statuses. Would any hon. Member, for instance, say that the leading medical men and barristers in Dublin made as large incomes as the leading men of those professions in London? For some reason or other there was a larger amount of service to be obtained in Ireland, and the State, therefore, need not pay so much for it as in England. No complaint, also, had been made by these officials. Not one single complaint had reached the Treasury, except that made by hon. Members that night. The argument as to the Inspectors applied also to all other cases. Where there was not the same amount of labour to perform, the salaries ought not to be so high as they were where work was heavier. He ventured to say, in no one case had there been any complaint to the Prison Commissioners.

Major Nolan

MR. CALLAN thought the hon. Gentleman could not have read the evidence before the Commission which inquired into the salaries of Civil servants three years ago.

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON remarked that the Prison Commissioners were not appointed then.

MR. CALLAN replied, that the principles laid down then governed the Treasury now, and the objection was a technical and a puerile one. The principle then laid down was that the cost of living should regulate salaries. [Sir HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON dissented.] That was so, notwithstanding the oracular shake of the head of the hon. Baronet. He believed that the cost of living in Ireland was quite as great as it was in England, and if they did pay a little more for their milk in London they got a superior quality. The logical sequence of the argument of the hon. Baronet was that the English officials were superior in every shape and form to the Irish officials.

MR. O'SHAUGHNESSY admitted the principle laid down by the hon. Baronet that the State ought not to pay more for its work than the market value; but he complained that a totally erroneous standard of value had been chosen. The officers and warders, on whose behalf complaint was made, were in a totally different position from medical men and barristers. Their position should have been compared with that of merchants, shopkeepers, artisans, and labourers. He would find that those classes earned little, if anything, less than men of the same class earned in England; and, therefore, the enormous difference of salary which had been pointed out certainly was not warranted. The general staff of the prisons, also, had had their duties largely increased by the consolidation of the prisons; but their salaries remained the same. These men had onerous, almost slavish, duties to perform, which made them prisoners very nearly to the same extent as those they had in charge, and they certainly were not properly remunerated for the work they had to do. He knew, in one case, that both the Governor and the doctor, when they undertook increased duties under the new Act, did so on the understanding that they would receive increased remuneration. There was much feeling on this subject in Ireland, and the House must expect to hear of it until the salaries in the two countries were to some extent equalized.

SIR ANDREW LUSK hoped this discussion would now close, and that the Vote would be taken. For his part, he thought the Government ought to be careful how they spent the money of the country. Whenever there was a vacancy for one of these offices there were always 50 applicants, and as long as that was the case what was the good of saying any more about it? He did not want to draw invidious comparisons, or he might say something about Ireland—the police, for instance. The Government had borne a great deal of contention and contradiction, and now he thought it would be reasonable to give them the Vote.

MR. MITCHELL HENRY never listened with greater pleasure to the hon. Baronet (Sir Andrew Lusk) than when he appeared in the character of the “heavy father,” and advised them all as to what they should and should not do. He did hope, however, that the hon. Baronet would institute some of these invidious comparisons, and would call attention, for instance, to some of the Government Departments in Ireland. This question of the discrepancy in salaries was a most important one, and there could not be a more fallacious argument urged against the contention of himself and his Friends than that of the Secretary to the Treasury. They could, no doubt, get gentlemen to be Prime Minister, or Home Secretary, or even Chief Secretary for Ireland, at half the salaries paid to the present holders of those Offices. The fact was, that the salaries of the smaller officials were intentionally and designedly fixed at a lower rate than they were in England. It was especially the case in regard to lunatic asylums, as he had himself pointed out, and he was very glad that the Irish Members were at last learning to discuss the Votes systematically. For a great deal of the discussion that evening the Treasury Bench was responsible. For instance, a very interesting discussion on the incomes of professional men in Dublin and London had been started; but as he did not think that question was germane to the topic now before them he should not deal with it. It was said that these officials did not complain. No wonder; they were Conservatives, appointed by a Conservative Government—which always managed to secure a great deal of patronage—and not one of the Irish Conservative Members was in the House to speak for them. The Irish Liberal Members were equally to blame; but, notwithstanding the small attendance, he hoped his hon. Friend would not allow the subject to drop, but would bring it forward on every one of the Estimates. The only way in which they could get justice for Ireland was by making it inconvenient for the House to do injustice to Ireland. It appeared that there were 3,000 prisoners in Ireland, some 200 or 300 less in Scotland, and about 20,000 in England. Thus Scotland, with a population only two-thirds that of Ireland, had nearly as many prisoners as Ireland, while the disproportion was still greater in the case of England. If that were so, what justification was there for the complaints constantly made of the lawlessness and disorder of the Irish people, and what excuse was there for changing their system? The Irish prisons and the Irish lunatic asylums were managed on a totally different system from the English ones; as a result, they had far less crimes and far more cures of lunatics than in England. Under such circumstances, he was justified in asking why this change had been made, and why their whole system had been altered, and why systems of torture which never existed before were now introduced? This system of paying smaller salaries in Ireland than in England was so unjust that if a compact body of Irish Members only made it inconvenient to continue it, the Government would soon discharge their consciences by doing what was right.

MR. PARNELL would certainly take a Division after the statement they had heard from the hon. Baronet. He did not think it was political economy to take the cheapest labour they could get, nor, until he heard the statement of the hon. Baronet, did he think it was English economy. He should move to reduce Item D of the Vote by £75,000, which was about the disproportion between the English and Irish salaries.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
“That the Item for Pay and Allowances of Officers, including Uniform, be reduced by the sum of £75,000.”—(Mr. Parnell.)

SIR JOSEPH M'KENNA hoped his hon. Friend would not divide. At the same time, he must entirely disagree from the proposal to treat Irish and English officials differently on the score that they were to regard the scale as dependent on the labour market. The whole question was, whether the work was the same? If it was, it ought to be paid for at the same rate. There was no such thing as a labour market in regard to Public Offices. What would he said if, in the Army, the Irish soldier was paid 1*s.* and his English comrade 1*s.* 1*d.* a-day? If this discussion were taken to heart by the Government, he had great hopes that good would result from it; but he did not think it should lead to a Division on this occasion.

MAJOR NOLAN wished to point out that officers in the Army and the Navy were not paid any less when they were serving in Ireland. The argument that the Government should only pay what they could get people to do the work for was utterly fallacious. As for any appointment over £40 or £50 a-year, they would always have plenty of applicants. The Government must settle what was a fair rate of pay, and they should make no distinctions.

MR. MITCHELL HENRY said, this Amendment was moved to Item D. As a point of Order, he wished to know whether he could now move a reduction of Item A, on which Vote he wished to bring forward the question of the management of prisons and the conduct of the Chief Commissioner?

THE CHAIRMAN said, when this Motion had been disposed of, the whole Vote would be again before the Committee; but it would not be competent to the hon. Member to move a reduction of any Item previous to Item D.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 24; Noes 120: Majority 96.—(Div. List, No. 111.)

Original Question again proposed.

MR. SULLIVAN thought the present a proper occasion for asking the Home Secretary, or his Representative, for some information as to the number of Catholic chaplains appointed to the prisons in this country. At an early part of the Session he had moved for a Return of the number of prisons in which there was an average of 50 Catholic prisoners and upwards during the year. He was now very anxious to know what had been done in this matter, and felt confident that he should receive a satisfactory reply from the Government.

SIR MATTHEW WHITE RIDLEY said, although he was unable to give their number, Roman Catholic chaplains would be appointed whenever there was a sufficient number of Roman Catholic prisoners, and would be paid upon the scale recommended by the Committee which sat upon this subject four or five years ago, and every endeavour would be made to bring all the Catholic prisoners to the same gaol where practicable.

MR. SULLIVAN expressed his satisfaction at the reply of the hon. Baronet, and inquired whether the number of 50 prisoners or upwards had been taken by Government as a minimum, or what number of prisoners would be held to justify the appointment of Catholic chaplains to the prisons?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS said, that the appointment of chaplains had not been restricted to cases in which the Catholic prisoners numbered 50 and upwards. In his own county, Lancashire, the gaols had always had Roman Catholic chaplains, although the county was considered to be Protestant.

MR. MITCHELL HENRY trusted to be excused if he failed to address the Committee effectively upon a subject which was originally intended to be laid before the House by the hon. Member for Meath (Mr. Parnell), who was at that moment suffering from loss of voice. He was anxious to pass over a great many topics connected with prison management which he had expected English Members to refer to in the course of the evening. But having been connected for many years with the prisons of this country, he felt bound to take notice of some points in their management. He desired to make an appeal to the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary, to which he trusted a satisfactory response would be given. Now, great pains had been taken by Government with regard to prison diet, and he was bound to say that, in his opinion, the ordinary diet of the prisoners—if the food was properly cooked and of good quality, of which there sometimes appeared to be a doubt—was better than it used to be. At any rate, he did not think it would be fair to try conclusions either for or against the present dietary until further experience had been gained upon the subject, although he confessed to some suspicion that it was not perfectly satisfactory. His object in rising was to bring to the notice of the Committee the scandal and shame of using starvation as a means of punishment in prisons; and, in so doing, he was compelled to call the attention of hon. Members to the case of a prisoner whose death, in his (Mr. Mitchell Henry's) opinion, was attributable to this system of punishment to which he was exposed. He was aware that, in making this statement, a portion of the Committee would be against him. At the close of last year a prisoner died in Clerkenwell Prison. He was a young man of 18 years of age, and upon whom, in accordance with the rules of the prison, an inquest was held; it was shown by the evidence that he had been for many days in solitary confinement on a diet of bread and water; the jury, which seemed to have been an inquisitive one, and not satisfied to perform their duties in a perfunctory manner, required an adjournment of the inquest, which was resumed on the 20th of November. A great deal of evidence was then taken, and the inquest was again adjourned to the 4th of December, when the Chairman of the Visiting Committee was examined, and gave a very unfavourable account of the working of the prison rules. The jury eventually returned a verdict to the effect that—

Sir Joseph M'Kenna

"John Nolan was found dead, or had died, in the infirmary of Coldbath Fields Prison, from the mortal effects of inflammation of the lungs; and, further, that his death was accelerated by the bread and water diet sanctioned by the Governor: the jury are of opinion that it is impossible for a medical officer properly or effectually to attend to his duties in prison without being resident: and the jury are also of opinion that the punishment of bread and water should only be administered under the supervision of the Visiting Committee."

That verdict caused a great deal of dissatisfaction in the public mind, and the Home Secretary felt it his duty to appoint a small Medical Commission to take evidence, and to ascertain whether there were any grounds for instituting further proceedings against the prison officials in whose charge the young man was during the time of his imprisonment. The Home Secretary appointed the Commission, against the construction of which no complaint could rightly be made. This Commission came to nine separate conclusions, all of which were totally opposed to the verdict of the Coroner's jury. They found that the punishments inflicted were not excessive, whether measured by the power of the Governor to inflict them, or by the nature of the punishments themselves; that death was neither induced nor accelerated by the bread and water punishment to which the deceased was subjected; that he did not suffer injury from the plank bed; and that his death was attributable to the weather, which was quite cold enough to account for it. The Commissioners also added to their Report that they could not endorse the opinion of the Coroner's jury, that the duties of the medical officer could not be properly performed unless by a resident. He (Mr. Mitchell Henry) said, with great regret, however, that, in his opinion, it was impossible for anybody to read the evidence and come to the conclusion that this Report was supported by the evidence adduced. The circumstances of the case to which he asked the attention of the House were these. The young man in question was sentenced to three months' imprisonment with hard labour, as being a rogue and a vagabond; he had been a glass-blower, and was said to be of a sturdy and robust constitution; he was, during the course of his imprisonment, repeatedly punished by starvation. After he had been in prison for a few days he did not perform his allotted task of oakum picking, and was, accordingly, put on a diet of bread and water on the 21st and 22nd of August; after that he again failed in doing what he ought to have done, and was sentenced to further solitary confinement and bread and water diet on the 28th, 30th, and 31st August and on the 1st September. One reason for his punishment was that he had wetted his bed, and a small blister was put upon his back, as the Commissioners said, for medical purposes; but that statement he (Mr. Mitchell Henry) begged leave to doubt. The young man, who evidently in his starved condition had no power over his organs, again incurred punishment; he was taken ill and sent to the infirmary on the 3rd of September; on the 5th of that month he was discharged, and on the 7th September he again fell under the dia-pleasure of the Governor, and was sentenced to bread and water on the 8th and 9th September. Here were seven days within the space between the 21st August and the 8th September inclusive, during which he was upon bread and water diet; he was then found to have lost 6 lbs. in weight—that was to say, one pound for every day of bread and water diet, or one-nineteenth of his whole weight. Again, on the 19th and 25th September, and on the 1st, 5th, 7th, and 10th of October, he was placed on bread and water diet, so that out of 50 days' imprisonment 13 days were passed by him on bread and water in solitary confinement. Bread and water diet meant one pound of bread and some water to support a man for 24 hours. A pound of bread was in quantity about half of a very moderate-sized loaf, and this was given to prisoners sometimes altogether, when it was greedily devoured, and sometimes in two portions. Inquiries had been made into the effects of this dreadful discipline, and some knowledge had been gained respecting it. The following accounts had been given by one of the prisoners who appeared before the Commission of 1871, and who described the effects of starvation in this way :—

“The first time you are put into a dark cell, and have nothing but this piece of bread with some water to drink; the sense of hunger is overpowering; a man presses upon his stomach, and does anything to remove the sensation of the absence of food; but after a time he tries to sleep, and then he gets sick and can hardly eat the bread given him next day, after which time he finds himself quite unable to eat it.”

That was literally and truly, and was intended to be, starvation. He did not wish to go into medical details; but everyone had some knowledge of physiology, and would remember that the food was digested by means of the gastric juice; the gastric juice being poured into the stomach by the organs, if there was no food, then would act upon the stomach and cause great inconvenience. He had shown that the young man had spent 13 days out of 50 days upon this starvation diet. Besides this, he was also put upon a plank bed, on which he slept for 16 days until the 25th October. Upon one occasion, when he came in from exercise, the warden noticed that he looked exceedingly ill, besides seeing something else which the Commissioners had not noticed—the man's trousers were wet, or, in other words, he was not able to retain his urine. If that was not evidence of a debilitated constitution he (Mr. Mitchell Henry) did not know what was. The young man was there and then taken to the infirmary, and in five days he died of inflammation of the lungs. All those facts had been laid before the Coroner's jury, who had delivered their verdict in the terms which had been read to the Committee; but the Commissioners, who had before them the same evidence, arrived at a conclusion entirely different. They said that the debilitated tone of the deceased had had nothing to do with the inflammation of the lungs. He maintained that nobody would believe that statement. Everybody must feel that if you put a young man for 13 days upon a diet of bread and water his constitution must become debilitated; and he, therefore, challenged the Report of the Commissioners, when they said that the disease of this man's lungs was in no way accelerated or induced by the repeated punishments of bread and water which he underwent. He appealed to the Home Secretary; this system of starving prisoners was not a right one, and it was a system which, if the people of England knew it to be practised, would not be tolerated. Some other punishment must be found. If a man could not pick a certain quantity of oakum, and had besides the misfortune to soil his bed, he certainly ought not to be punished by starvation. He was bound to say that the Home Secretary had, in his opinion, supported the contention of the Governor of the prison upon the powers which he had to inflict bread and water punishment in a way not intended by the Act of Parliament. The House would recollect that when the Prisons Bill was under discussion it was determined that proper rules should be laid down for punishment, and it was enacted that the Governor of a prison should have no right to put a prisoner into the punishment cell for more than 24 hours, the intention being that no person should be placed on bread and water diet for a longer period than that named. But how did the Governors of prisons interpret that rule? They no longer put prisoners into what was called a punishment cell, but converted into a punishment cell the ordinary cell of the prisoner; they put him on bread and water for 24 hours, and, after an interval, they gave him another 24 hours. In this way it came about that John Nolan was, in his opinion, debilitated by being placed upon bread and water diet for 13 out of 50 days. The Chairman of the Visiting Committee had contested the reading of the rule set up by the Governor, and they both applied to the Home Secretary, who, it was to be regretted, had giving his decision against the Chairman of the Visiting Committee, saying that the Governor of this prison was quite right in acting as he had done. It was, therefore, to be concluded that Governors of prisons might convert the cells of prisoners into punishment cells, lock up their prisoners therein, and place them upon bread and water diet, until the House of Commons laid down strict rules against the practice by Act of Parliament. In another case, that of a man 26 years of age, who had been sentenced to two years' imprisonment with hard labour, was charged with committing an assault upon a warder. He was tried before Lord Coleridge, and found guilty, and the comment made by the Government organ, The Daily Telegraph, upon the case was, that the learned Judge and jury evidently did not believe the evidence of the warder, and that, notwithstanding the serious charges brought forward by the warder, the Judge merely sentenced the prisoner to six weeks' imprisonment; thus not adding a single day to his punishment. There had also been other cases, and he had received from one prisoner a complaint with regard to the very same warder, who was described as a most tyrannical person. This warder was concerned in the imprisonment of Nolan, and there could be little doubt that his conduct had throughout been most tyrannical. In conclusion, he would appeal to the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary once and for ever to put a stop to this system of starving prisoners, as it was one which the people of England would not submit to, if they were conscious of the fact that it was being pursued.

Mr. Mitchell Henry

MR. ASSHETON CROSS wished, in the first place, to assure the hon. Gentleman that, so far as he was concerned, he was no advocate of starvation. He did not wish it to go forth to the public that any system of that character was carried on with his approbation; and he would deny in the most positive terms that in regard to the matter to which the hon. Gentleman had drawn attention any alteration had been effected by the Act of 1877. Prisoners were now treated exactly as they formerly were, and he could not for one moment allow it to be supposed that there had been the slightest change made as regarded the treatment and discipline of prisoners since the passing of that Act. A good deal had been said about the confinement of men in the punishment cell. Under the Act of 1865, the Governors of prisons had the power to confine a man for 36 hours; whereas now, by the measure of 1877, the period of punishment was limited to 24 hours, which he considered to be quite long enough.

MR. PARNELL said, that Governors never made use of the power conferred upon them by the Act of 1865.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS replied, that the hon. Gentleman was quite wrong. He had greater opportunities than the hon. Member of knowing what took place on this subject, and he could assure him that representations had been made to him over and over again, by persons who had been employed in the management of gaols, to the effect that if there was a mistake in the Act of 1877, it was in the clause limiting the hours of solitary confinement which a Governor was enabled to impose. The representations made to him upon this point were that the alteration made had practically destroyed the punishment; but, notwithstanding that, he still entertained the opinion that the alteration made by the Act of 1877 was beneficial. He wished to point out that locking a man up in his ordinary cell was a very different thing from sending him to a punishment cell. In many prisons the punishment cells were dark, and some were in perfect darkness. He had done all he could to abolish the cell system entirely. But even ordinary punishment cells were very dark, and when a man was confined to them he was entirely removed from the general life of the prison. Therefore, confining a man in a punishment cell was, on account of the extreme isolation, a very severe punishment. Isolation in the dark often acted injuriously; and he had, therefore, practically prohibited the use of completely dark cells. But, still, confinement in a punishment cell, being severe from its isolation, he had objected to a man being confined there for more than 24 hours. That had nothing, however, to do with a man being locked up in his ordinary cell for a longer period. When this question was raised, he took the best possible advice upon the subject, and he was informed that punishment cells were very different from the ordinary cells. He was satisfied upon that point, and was sure that everyone who knew anything about prisons would agree that locking a man up in his ordinary cell was very different from confining him in the separate punishment cells. The next question that had been raised was with regard to the diet of bread and water. He must again speak in the most positive terms, for he did not wish the House to be under a wrong impression in this matter. He must, in the most emphatic terms, state that, in the management of prisons from one end of England or Scotland to the other, there had not been, for a single moment, starvation, or anything like it. Nor had there been anything done which in the least degree tended to lessen the health of prisoners. No officer in any gaol in the United Kingdom would do anything which would be likely to produce starvation or diminish the health of the prisoners. The strongest regulations had been issued for the purpose of rendering it impossible for a prisoner to suffer in health from gaol discipline. First of all, by Rule 36, no punishment was to be inflicted upon any prisoner unless the surgeon should certify that such a prisoner was in a fit condition of health to undergo such punishment. They could not have a much more stringent regulation than that. Then, again, by Rule 104, the surgeon was bound to report to the Governor the case of any prisoner in bad health which he might think necessary. And if he thought the health of any prisoner was in danger from confinement, he was to inform the Governor, and the Governor was to report to the Commissioner. By Rule 106, the surgeon was to report to the Governor any case in which the discipline or treatment seemed likely to injure the health of any prisoner, and the Governor might issue such directions as the circumstances should require. He hoped that the Committee would think that nothing could be more stringent and calculated to preserve the health of prisoners than a regulation of that sort.

Mr. Ascheton Cross

He would now come to the particular case to which the hon. Member for Galway (Mr. Mitchell Henry) had referred—that of John Nolan. That case happened some time ago, and he was bound to state that steps were taken to inquire into it, and from the result of the investigations nothing more had been done. The unfortunate man, no doubt, died, and the coroner's jury found the verdict to which the hon. Gentleman had referred. If anyone would read the Paper containing the evidence taken before the coroner's jury, and the verdict, and the Correspondence between the Visiting Committee and the Home Office, they would see that it was the evidence given by Sir William White that led the jury to believe that the Visiting Committee had not so much power as they ought to have; and the jury went on to say that they thought something ought to be done. That verdict having been found, what was the course he was bound to pursue? The sole object he had in view was that the matter should be as fully investigated as possible, and the hon. Gentleman had admitted that more independent men than those who were appointed to form the Committee could not be found. They were men of the highest experience, and his instructions to them were to find out whether anything wrong had been done, and, if so, to report upon it. He might mention that the surgeon of the gaol had been about 26 or 27 years in the service, and had enjoyed the entire confidence of the Visiting Justices during all that time. What stronger guarantee could they have that no injustice should be done to any prisoner? Then, as to the Governor. He, no doubt, had been changed; but the Governor in charge at the time spoken of had been the Governor of a county gaol in the South for a long time, and was a man bearing the highest possible character. The Commissioners were appointed to inquire carefully into the whole case, and they had no possible interest but to report fully and accurately. He expressly instructed them that if they found out anything wrong they were to report it. Well, what result had the Commissioners come to in the matter? They said—

"1. That John Nolan died from inflammation of the lungs. 2. That though we have formed this opinion without the assistance which a post-mortem examination would have rendered us, we believe it to be fully borne out by the evidence laid before us. 3. That the punishments inflicted upon Nolan were not excessive, whether measured by the power of the Governor to inflict them or of the prisoner himself to sustain them."

He did not think they could have stronger testimony than that of the Commissioners—

"That the punishments inflicted upon Nolan were not excessive, whether measured by the power of the Governor to inflict them or of the prisoner himself to sustain them."

They went on to say—

"4. That Nolan's death was neither induced nor accelerated by the repeated bread and water punishments to which he was subjected. 5. That he did not suffer any injury from the plank bed. 6. That the prisoner was treated during his fatal illness with skill, attention, and indulgence. 7. That the commencement of Nolan's fatal illness coincided in point and time with a marked fall of temperature, high winds, and extreme dampness of atmosphere, and his death with an increased general mortality from the diseases of the organs of respiration, which diseases had been progressive for several weeks. 8. That we cannot endorse the opinion of the coroner's jury that the duties of the medical officers cannot be properly performed without residence."

So far as the officers of the gaol were concerned, could they have higher testimony than was contained in that Report. He would refrain from going into further detail in the matter; but he was bound to read that part of the Report which referred to the matter in question. On page 8 of the Report, the Commissioners said—

"We will now inquire what happened to the prisoner under those two diets respectively. Nolan entered the prison 8th August, under the predecessor of the present Governor, Captain Helby, and on the 21st August was sentenced by him to two days' consecutive bread and water. On the 24th August Captain Helby took charge of the prison, and on the 25th sentenced Nolan to one day, and on the 31st to two days' bread and water. On the 3rd September Nolan was admitted to the convalescent ward for a slight cold, and discharged on the 5th. On the 7th September, two days after his discharge from the convalescent ward, Nolan again incurred two consecutive days' bread and water, and when weighed on the 14th September was found to have lost 6 lbs. in the 113 lbs., which was his weight on entering the prison. This is nearly 1-19th of his weight."

"If now we start afresh from the day of the second weighing, when Nolan was found to have lost 6 lbs., and bear in mind that he had now been for some days on the more nutritious diet to which his standing as a prisoner entitled him, and bear in mind, also, the fact that his task of work was to pick only 2 lbs. of oakum per diem, and to keep his cell and person clean, we shall be in a condition to appreciate the following statement of facts:—

"On the 19th and 25th of September, and on the 1st, 5th, 7th, and 10th of October, Nolan was sentenced to one day's bread and water. Nolan, therefore, having, in accordance with prison rules, come into the enjoyment of the diet No. 3, with hard labour, and never doing any harder work than picking 2 lbs of oakum a-day; having made this change on or about the 8th September (five days before his second weighing), he is submitted to bread and water, for one day at a time, six times in the space of 21 days. If we distribute these six days' bread and water over the entire interval from the 14th September, when Nolan was weighed the second time, to 25th October, when he was taken into the infirmary, we have six days of abstinence out of 40 days in which he was upon a diet which must be pronounced extremely liberal for a lad of 18, doing no harder work (if it pleased him to do any work at all) than picking 2 lbs. of oakum per diem. If we take what may be called the effective dietary at 2½ lbs. per diem, the 1½ lbs. of food sacrificed on six occasions being 9 lbs. in all, will still leave the average daily food at the high level of more than 2½ lbs. a-day. And under this dietary Nolan regains the weight he had when he entered the prison, or, at the least, 5 lbs. out of the 6 lbs. which he was found to have lost when he was weighed on the 14th September, the beginning of the period now under consideration."

"But even this statement of facts and figures scarcely places the matter in the clearest light which can be thrown upon it; for we find that from the 10th October, when the last dietary punishment was inflicted, to 23rd October, or nearly a fortnight, Nolan was not submitted to forfeiture of his food even for a single day; and during this term he is reported to have done the easy task allotted to him, of picking 2 lbs. of oakum per diem. We are quite at a loss, then, to understand how, with so liberal a dietary and so light a labour and deductions so few and slight, the dietary punishments to which Nolan was sentenced could have accelerated his death, whether this term 'accelerated' is taken to mean the setting up of some predisposition to the disease of which Nolan died, or so impairing his strength as to render him a more easy victim to it."

He was bound to say, speaking for the officers of the gaol, they were old servants, and, according to the Report, they did nothing to injure the prisoner, but they did only their duty. Under these circumstances, what was he to do? He thought that it was a serious thing that in these gaols—although there was not under the old system—there was not a resident surgeon or assistant surgeon. He thought there ought to be, and he, accordingly, issued the necessary directions. Further, he gave instructions that whenever bread and water punishments were inflicted in the current form, the more nutritious stirabout diet should be introduced at intervals of not less than three days. He also thought it was right that there should be a separate medical Inspector of all the gaols in England. Having appointed a certain number of medical Inspectors, he appointed a separate medical Inspector whose sole duty it was to go from gaol to gaol in order to inspect the surgeons, and see that they did their duty, and to ascertain whether the punishments or diet injured the prisoners. He might say that the reports made by that gentleman had been of the greatest possible value. With regard to the question of diet, he agreed that the result of the new system must be tested by experience. When the diet was introduced he had a report drawn up from the different prisons, and the effect was found so good that he left off having those reports made. The last report, he was happy to say, stated that, taking all the prisons together, the death-rate during the last 12 months had lessened by 2 per 1,000 from what it was before. That was most satisfactory. Taking that fact in connection with the reports which he had received, not only from the ordinary officials, but from the medical Inspector, and bearing in mind that the death-rate had so materially decreased, he thought it must be said that the result of the diet now in use was most satisfactory. Under these circumstances, he hoped that the Committee would be satisfied that there was no system of starvation going on in the gaols of this country, either in the general management of prisoners, or when they had been unfortunately condemned to punishment.

MR. HOPWOOD thought this was a matter of very grave importance, and trusted the Committee would pardon him if he said a word or two upon it. He thought that poor Nolan had not died in vain, inasmuch as his case, according to the right hon. Gentleman, had led to an improved dietary in cases of punishment—such as Nolan was subjected to—and to a more thorough inspection of prisons. He might say that he believed that Nolan's death was accelerated by the diet upon which he was put. Every now and again the public were seized with a fit of fury against criminals, and sometimes against the Poor Law, and whenever that happened, for some years, what he did not hesitate to say were the most cruel punishments, were inflicted. That system was persisted in for years, when once adopted; but the right hon. Gentleman had told them that, from the strength of his own good-heartedness, he had made alterations in it. That, certainly, showed that it was wrong; in fact, there was a danger that the limits would be reached in the experiment of whether a man could live upon a straw a-day. He had recently received a letter from a gentleman, unknown to him, who had been a surgeon in a gaol, who wrote to him strongly upon this subject; and he stated, as an official, that he felt there was a responsibility upon him, although the dietary was prescribed by the rules, and that it was, in his opinion, too meagre, especially when accompanied by severe punishments. It was perfectly dreadful, to his mind, to know that such things occurred as had been mentioned in the course of the discussion; and he must, as a Member of that House, insist on being allowed to use his own discretion in commenting upon them. Was it possible, he would ask, that anyone could seriously argue that, in the case of a man who had died of consumption, the putting him on a diet of bread and water was not likely to accelerate, and did not, as a matter of fact, accelerate his death? Who was there, among the Members of that House, who had not seen someone suffering under that dreadful disease, but seen him, at the same time, in all probability, surrounded by friends anxious to comfort him in every way, and to pour nourishment into his sinking frame, as well as by medical men, solicitous to prescribe for him some remedy, by means of which the dreadful malady might be cured or modified? But poor Nolan, on his death-bed, had had none of these advantages. Let hon. Members think for a moment of his condition, with warders, the Governor of the gaol, and the surgeon of 27 years' standing, and then ask themselves whether those men must not have seen that he had the signs that he was soon about to make his exit from this world plainly impressed upon his brow? He could not, for the life of him, understand how men could be so brutal, so deadened to every feeling of humanity, as to subject the unfortunate man in these circumstances to such treatment as that which it was shown he had received. Who could wonder that the Coroner's jury had come to the mild conclusion that his death had been hastened by that treatment? And yet the officers of the gaol were to be white-washed, as if no blame were to be attributed to them! He remembered the case of a man who, in connection with some bankruptcy proceedings of a protracted nature, committed an offence, for which he was sentenced to a punishment which, he dared say, he merited. He found himself, after enjoying a position of luxury, confined within the walls of a prison, where he was visited by some of the friends of the days of his prosperity. Speaking of his condition, he said to them—"Oh, I can get on, but I want bread. The prison portion is regulated in accordance with each particular constitution, and I am dying for want of bread." Thus, a man who was once possessed of great wealth, and who had been accustomed to live in luxury, had actually been reduced to a state of starvation. He mentioned that case, because it served to illustrate the way in which the whole system of the management of our gaols was carried out. All the prison rules were framed on the Procrustean notion that the constitution of every man and woman was the same at the same or different ages, and that the quantity of food supplied to them ought to be regulated by an inflexible standard. That such had been the state of things, at all events in the past, had been admitted by the Secretary of State for the Home Department himself, because he had, in the kindness of his heart, been endeavouring to provide a remedy for it in some degree. But experience showed that cases were still again and again recurring, in which both men and women received their first mittimus to the grave within the walls of a prison. He would, therefore, appeal to the intelligence of the public and the compassion and good feeling of Members of that House not to rely too much upon the officialism which framed rules adapted only to the case of a person of average health and strength, and which made no allowance for the weak and the unhealthy. A man who was sentenced to undergo imprisonment for seven days and under got for breakfast daily only 8 oz. of bread. That was all—just half, he believed, of a 4 lb. loaf—[A laugh]

he meant to say half of a 1 lb. loaf, and he could not help thinking that hon. Members would scarcely be so ready to laugh if they were confined to that quantity of food for their morning meal. Then came dinner—and it was a mockery to call it dinner—consisting, as it did, of only a pint and a-half of "stirabout," containing 3 oz. of Indian meal and 3 oz. of oatmeal. For supper the allowance was 8 oz. of bread; and that was the scale of diet laid down for men and women, and boys of 16 years of age, with and without hard labour. The diet was the same, no matter what amount of labour a man had to go through; and that reminded him of another point on which he wished to say a few words. This poor man, who was in an advanced stage of consumption, was set to pick 3 lbs. of oakum, although it was, he believed, a pretty stiff dose for a sound man of that age to pick 1½ lbs. at a time. At all events, he had had the punishment inflicted upon him five or six times, and he was reduced to a state of great exhaustion, as anyone might perceive whose faculty of perception had not been blunted by the routine of officialism. He was not, however, disposed to make an attack on the prison authorities, while he must implore of the Committee to divest their minds of the notion that everything went on right in our gaols. The notion was a mistaken one; and to be constantly on the watch on those matters ought to be the motto of the House of Commons. He had referred to the dietary fixed for prisoners who had to undergo sentences of seven days' imprisonment and under; but when the period of imprisonment extended to one month the scale of food supplied was, daily, 6 oz. of bread and 1 pint of gruel for breakfast; for dinner on Sundays and Wednesdays, bread 6 oz., suet pudding 6 oz.; on Mondays and Fridays, bread 6 oz., potatoes 8 oz.; and on Tuesdays, Thursdays, and Saturdays, 6 oz. of bread and half-a-pint of soup. The supper consisted daily of 6 oz. of bread and 1 pint of gruel. He must say that the way in which the system was worked appeared to him to approach very much to the nature of torture, and he must congratulate the Secretary of State for the Home Department on having made alterations which would serve to make it a little more bearable. The time of the Committee could not, at all events, he thought, be said to have been wasted in discussing the subject, and drawing the attention to it not only of the right hon. Gentleman, but of the public.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS said, he could not permit some of the observations which had just been made by the hon. and learned Member for Stockport (Mr. Hopwood) to pass unchallenged. He could not help feeling indignant, when he heard it publicly stated in that House that all prisoners were treated alike, and that one inflexible rule was applied to every case without the slightest discrimination. He was anxious that such a statement should not remain uncontradicted for a single moment.

MR. HOPWOOD said, he had referred to the system of treatment as subject to medical inspection.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS said, he would read an extract from the rules which had been laid down—

“The Secretary of State wishes especially to draw the attention of the Prison Commissioners and the medical Inspector to certain points connected with prison management, on which he entertains a very strong opinion. While, upon the one hand, he deems it, of course, essential that prison punishment should be uniform and certain, and that no imposition should be permitted to be practised by those who are in custody, yet it seems to be, on the other hand, equally clear that prison punishments and imprisonment bear unequally on particular persons. Many persons are continually coming into our gaols whose entire nervous system has been prostrated by the evil life which they have led, and are, therefore, more apt to suffer from their incarceration, and more ready to sink gradually under some form of disease or another. Some, again, who have been convicts for the first time, are more likely to feel their situation and to sink under the hardships of a prison from a feeling of shame and degradation. The Secretary of State is very anxious that all such cases should be watched at their various stages, so that the necessity of hospital treatment might, as far as possible, be prevented. As it has been said that it is better that 99 guilty persons should escape conviction rather than that one innocent person should be unjustly condemned to suffer, so it is better that almost any number of prisoners should be treated better than they deserve rather than that any one of them should die through harsh treatment.”

MR. MITCHELL HENRY: What is the date of those instructions?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS: They are contained in a letter which I gave to the medical Inspector when I appointed him, after Nolan's case; but I am not speaking for myself, but for the body of Visiting Justices who were animated by the same feelings. I will only add that all these stories of cruelty are absolutely untrue.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL was quite sure that every hon. Member would be prepared to agree with the hon. Member for Galway (Mr. Mitchell Henry) that it was extremely hard that a man who had been sentenced to imprisonment should have his death hastened by the treatment to which he was subjected while in goal. But, having had a great deal to do with prisons, and having had occasion to study the subject carefully, he must say that he was very strongly of opinion that, if imprisonment was to be of any use as a deterrent from crime, such an amount of severity must be exercised as to make it disagreeable to a prisoner. That being so, some hon. Members, he thought, went too far when they argued, as he had heard them argue in that House, as if the treatment should be such as to make the position of a prisoner comfortable. He admitted that his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Stockport (Mr. Hopwood) was justified in contending that the Committee must not assume that whatever was done by the officials was, as a matter of course, right; but, on the other hand, he was disposed to think that the hon. and learned Gentleman was much too apt to arrive at the conclusion that everything which was done by officials was wrong. The case of Nolan was, no doubt, a very unhappy and unfortunate case, and the circumstances connected with it demanded careful inquiry. But, seeing that the Government had instituted such an inquiry; when men, impartial and competent, had acquitted the officials of Clerkenwell Prison of serious blame in the matter; and when the Secretary of State, as the result of the investigation, issued a warning to the officials of gaols, so as to prevent the risk of such things in the treatment of prisoners in future, the Committee would, in his opinion, scarcely be justified in any longer delaying the passing of the Vote, because of the particular case in question.

MR. MITCHELL HENRY said, the hon. Gentleman who had just sat down had spoken with respect to officials in a manner which was, no doubt, becoming in him as a former Governor of Bengal. But the hon. Gentleman was not in the House when he had referred to the case of John Nolan, and he, for one, entirely objected to the doctrine that the representations made by officials were to be accepted as correct without due inquiry. He had risen, principally, however, for the purpose of pointing out to the Committee that he had made no attack on the Government, or on the prison officials. It was the system of which he complained, and to which he desired to direct the attention of the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Home Department. Under the rules which the right hon. Gentleman had made, such a case as that of Nolan's might, he contended, over and over again occur. The right hon. Gentleman was very indignant because he had said that starvation was part of our prison discipline. But what else, he would ask, did confining a man to such a diet as a few ounces of bread and a certain quantity of water a-day mean? For his own part, he could call such a system nothing else but starvation. It was all very well for the right hon. Gentleman to read long extracts; but he had shown the Committee what had happened, and what might occur again, under the very rules with which the right hon. Gentleman seemed to be so well satisfied. A man, such as Nolan, might be subjected to a diet of bread and water for 13 days out of 50. That he maintained was not right, and completely justified him in saying that starvation was still a part of our prison system. That the right hon. Gentleman had no fault to find with the officials of a particular prison in connection with a particular case was no answer to the charge which he brought against the system. He objected to a man's being starved at all; and he would urge upon the right hon. Gentleman the propriety of issuing orders that no prisoner should be put upon a diet of bread and water for longer than one day in seven. The right hon. Gentleman had read a paragraph from the Report of the Commissioners, and, as every hon. Member was aware, it was very difficult to follow accurately the precise statements contained in a paragraph when read in that way. But the Commissioners referred to the history of a man who, having been subjected to a bread and water diet for six days, lost 6 lbs. in weight, and the Commissioners found that he died, but not as the result of starving him. In the next paragraph they showed that with better food and a greater quantity of it he had, though subjected to hard labour, in a few days recovered 5 lbs. of the 6 lbs. he had lost. The right hon. Gentleman had issued a Circular which did him great honour; but it had only been issued within the last six weeks or two months, and why had it been issued? Because the right hon. Gentleman knew perfectly well that the statements which had been made by himself and other hon. Members had produced a strong feeling of excitement in the country, and that there was too much truth in them to admit of their being passed over in silence. He hoped that now the state of things would be better. Prisoners, he contended, ought to be allowed to have a chance of recovering if they got an attack of illness, such as inflammation of the lungs. Our prison system, as it had hitherto been carried out, was indefensible. The right hon. Gentleman knew that it was so, and he hoped, therefore, that he would charge the prison officials to be more careful in future. He could have dwelt on other points connected with the subject at greater length; but he should confine himself for the present to urging upon the right hon. Gentleman the necessity of making some alteration in the system, so far as putting prisoners on a diet of bread and water was concerned.

Mr. Hopwood

Mr. HIBBERT hoped that, although the Committee had been engaged in discussing the Vote for nearly five hours, they would permit him to make a few observations upon it before it was passed. The points to which he wished especially to direct his remarks was the powers to be given to the Visiting Justices. A short time ago, a conference of Visitors of gaols was held in London, and, after considerable discussion, they arrived almost unanimously at the conclusion that the powers which they possessed might with advantage be increased. His right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Home Department seemed inclined to consider the representations which had been made to him on the subject favourably. As things now stood, the Visitors had no power beyond that of being able to protect prisoners from injury, or of reporting the misconduct of warders, or any other matter connected with the gaols to which, in their opinion, the attention of the Secretary of State ought to be drawn. He would suggest that their powers might be increased without interfering with their position as Visitors under the existing law. At present, for instance, all prison contracts were, he believed, made in London by the Commissioners. Now, great assistance might, he thought, be obtained from the Visiting Committee, if they were asked to give their opinion upon those contracts, each for the gaol with which it was connected. He did not mean to contend that they ought to have the power of deciding what contracts should be accepted; but he could not help thinking that, on questions relating to the supply of food and clothing, their experience might be turned to account with great advantage to the public. Contracts might be sent down to them for their consideration, or they might be asked to enter into contracts, with the provision that those contracts should be sent up to the Central Office in London for confirmation. A change of that kind would, he believed, tend to promote economy. He would also suggest that the £6,000, which were given in the shape of gratuities to prisoners, should be left to be divided by the Visitors, instead of by the Commissioners in London, as was now the case. On that point, the assistance of the Visitors might have been sought with the greatest advantage. Formerly, the Visitors had control of the prison labour; but now the materials were bought in London, the whole of the arrangements were carried on by the Central Office in London, and the Visitors had really nothing at all to do with the whole matter. They might give help there, also. Lastly, he believed his right hon. Friend did in his original Bill intend that the Visitors should have some power in the appointment of prison warders. He thought the Visitors were likely to know far better than the central officials the character of the people of the district in which the prison was situated; and, therefore, he thought the Estimates might easily be altered so as to give the Visiting Committee the power of obtaining warders, and of sending up recommendations for certain appointments to London, to be confirmed there. He did not see, indeed, why they should not have the full power given them to make these appointments, under conditions to be laid down by the Home Secretary. Unless some change were made, he was sure the Home Secretary would find the gentlemen composing the Visiting Committees dropping off, and that they would not long consent to act as mere dummies. Then, as to prison labour, nothing was said in the Vote of the purchase of materials, and all the information given was that the receipts were expected to reach £60,000. They ought to have some statement of the amount expended in materials, and they ought also to know the actual amount received and expended last year. He hoped, also, that his right hon. Friend, in coming years, would have this Vote greatly amplified. The information as to the number of officials in each class was very meagre, and the Vote ought also to be brought forward in the usual form for England, Ireland, and Scotland. At present, it was impossible to ascertain what the system in each country cost, because the Irish prisons were mixed up with the convict system, and the Scotch with the General Prison at Perth. As far as he could make out, every prisoner in England cost about £22, in Scotland £28, and in Ireland £30; but it was impossible to make any accurate estimate of the amount.

Mr. ASSHETON CROSS said, the estimate as to the amount to be earned by prison labour was prepared in December and January, when it was impossible to give the exact figures; but these were now in preparation, and would appear in the Report of the Prison Commissioners. He would endeavour before another year, also, to communicate with the Irish and Scotch Departments, and see if some common form of keeping the accounts could not be adopted. This year it was not possible to do it. As to the expenses, as that depended upon the number of persons in a gaol, and the distance they were apart, he was afraid that the expenses would always be exactly the same. The cost of the raw material was not given, because they had followed the practice in all the convict establishments, which was to give the figures in the present way. Then, as to the Visiting Committee. Of course, as the prisons had been transferred from the local authorities to the Secretary of State, the authority must be transferred also; but there was the greatest desire on his part, and on the part of the Prison Commissioners, to retain the services of the Visiting Committee. For his part, he could not conceive a more honourable duty than that which they would perform, of stepping in between the prison officials and the prisoners, on the part of the public, to see that no injustice was done. As regarded the question of contracts, if his hon. Friend could show any point in which the Government were wrong it should be rectified; but it must be remembered that all articles could be bought much cheaper on a large scale than on a small one. At the same time, he might add, that in this respect, as in all others, the hints of the Visitors had been considered most carefully. In regard to clothing, he hoped before another year that they would be able to make every single article they would require in the prisons for themselves. As to gratuities, that was the only means the Commissioners had at their disposal of inducing prisoners to behave well; but he quite agreed that the money earned should be given in such a way that when the prisoner came out he could not go off at once and spend it in drink. He was quite aware that they had not yet got a perfect plan; but, after going over the whole matter very carefully, the Treasury consented to give a Supplementary Vote, in order that he might assist, as far as he could, the Discharged Prisoners' Aid Society. The Government would give them a certain sum, but would have nothing to do with the distribution of the money. That would be left entirely to the Society, aided, he hoped, by the Visiting Committee. The officials of the prisons would be entirely at their service in making reports on particular prisoners, &c.; and all that the Government required would be that, at least, an equal sum to that granted by it should be raised by local subscriptions, and that the Society should be able, if called upon, to show that the money had been properly expended. As to the appointment of warders, he offered not to give the Visiting Committee the appointment of these men, but to allow them to nominate men for the prison service, not, of course, for particular and individual prisons. It must be remembered that the prison service was now a whole, and the result of that was to give a warder much greater chances of promotion than if he were stationed in one prison, and had there to wait his turn for promotion. He thought he had now dealt with all the points raised by his right hon. Friend.

Mr. Mitchell Henry

MR. DODSON said, he was very glad to hear that the right hon. Gentleman attached so much importance to the office of the Visiting Committee. It must be remembered that the position of these gentlemen was very much changed. Formerly, the Visiting Committee was, practically, the governing body of the prison, and they were persons of weight and authority. Now they had no authority over the prison officials whatever, and the officials knew it. Further, the officials had the ear of the Prison Commissioners, and, through them, of the Home Secretary, while the Visiting Committee knew they had not the same ready means of access to the right hon. Gentleman. Not unnaturally, therefore, the Visiting Justices felt that instead of being persons with authority they were now looked upon as prying busy-bodies, and in any conflict between them and the officials or the Commissioners they would probably go to the wall. It all depended upon the light in which the Home Secretary regarded the Visiting Justices. If they found their reports readily listened to, their suggestions carried out, themselves treated as representatives of the public, and the Home Secretary ready to avail himself of their services as a check upon the prison officials, then, he had no doubt, gentlemen would be found willing and ready, as heretofore, to discharge the duty of Visiting Justices. Unless, however, the greatest care was taken by the Home Secretary to make the position of the Visiting Justices one, if not of direct authority, at any rate, one of indirect weight and importance, he would find a difficulty in discovering gentlemen to take the post.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS said, that there was one great safeguard given to the Visiting Justices. They had the absolute power, if they thought it necessary, or if they were not treated properly, of suspending the Governor of the gaol, which was a very great power to give any body of persons. He might add, that he had received a great many communications and representations from various gentlemen on Visiting Committees, and they had invariably ended by tendering him their warmest thanks for the way in which their suggestions had been received and considered.

That was what he hoped and wished always to be the case.

MR. O'CONNOR POWER was very glad that the hon. Gentleman the Member for Oldham (Mr. Hibbert) had brought forward this question about contracts, because the question was very closely allied to a subject which occupied the attention of the Committee at an earlier period of the evening. The contracts for the supply of food were most important branches of the prison arrangements, for some of the complaints against the present system were founded on the allegation that collusion existed between those who supplied the food to the prison and those who had to distribute it. So far from Nolan's case having been exaggerated, his experience of prisons led him to believe that it was not an exceptional case by any means. He well remembered when it was once his duty to visit an English prison how the Governor attempted to capture him, in a metaphorical sense, at the outset. He was marched to the kitchen—there the Governor pointed to some dishes, and stated that each of them contained a prisoner's food for the day. To that he replied that the dishes threw no light on the subject he had come to investigate. He knew what the supply of food should be; the question with him was whether the prisoner got it. "Oh!" replied the Governor, "here is the chief warder, whose business it is to see that each prisoner gets his proper amount of food." He suggested, in reply to that, that the best test of the system was a rigid inspection of the cells without any notice, and he suggested that he should be allowed to go at once into the cells where the prisoners were eating. The suggestion took the Governor rather by surprise; but he could not help himself, and a visit was paid to the cells. In the first one visited it was evident that the man had a much smaller supply of food than he had seen in the kitchen. On asking the reason, the chief warder replied that that particular prisoner belonged to a light-labour party. If a man complained of being sick, in fact, he was put on a light-labour party, and his food was reduced. What was the chance of the man getting better under such circumstances? The lessened work was set against the lessened food, and the man was left with the same chance of getting well as before. Against this Procrus-tean system of management there was no remedy, except independent inspection. He was, therefore, very glad to hear the assurance just given by the Home Secretary to the hon. Member for Oldham (Mr. Hibbert) with reference to the Visiting Justices. He was not by any means satisfied with the way in which the Visiting Justices did their work under the old system; but they were, at all events, the only independent body of Inspectors and Overseers cognizant of what was going on. He should, therefore, be very sorry that their powers should be weakened or destroyed. The Home Secretary had read a rule which he had ordered to be circulated, which there could be no doubt was a very good rule. But, in connection therewith, he wished to mention the case of certain men whose previous life affected neither their physical nor their moral condition—he meant the Irish political prisoners, who were admitted by the Judges who tried them to be men of high moral character. These men, after being in prison, found themselves, after a few months or years, entirely broken down in their constitution. They had a right to punish a man within certain limits; but they had no right whatever to subtract in the slightest degree from the fee simple of his constitution. The State had no right to rob any man of the fee simple of his constitution; it was a great mistake to say that their prison system was now perfect. The right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Home Department had said that he had issued instructions calculated in every way to protect the health of the prisoners; but still there was a feeling that all was not as it should be. They objected to the right hon. Gentleman allowing himself to be influenced by those who were interested in the conduct of the prisons. It must strike everyone as being odd that, in the case of Nolan, all the officials came forward and said that although there was not a case against anyone, yet they must acknowledge that something very wrong had been done. This was a very important subject—it was a question of detail of the whole treatment of these prisoners, and he thought that they ought to be satisfied with the discussion that they had had that night and resume the consideration of the Vote the next day, or after the Whitsuntide Recess. He must protest against passing that Vote before they had had further discussion; and, therefore, he begged to move to report Progress.

Mr. Ascheton Cross

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."—(Mr. O'Connor Power.)

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON really hoped that the hon. Member was not in earnest in making his Motion. They had now had what everyone must admit to be a most unprecedented discussion, lasting nearly six hours, on a single Vote of the Civil Service Estimates. Although he quite admitted the importance of the Vote, and the extreme importance of the subject that had been brought under consideration, he did hope that the Committee, having considered the matter at length, would now pass the Vote. He appealed to the hon. Member to be satisfied with the ample-ness of the discussion, and to withdraw his Motion.

MR. RYLANDS observed, that this Vote had been very carefully and fully discussed, and he thought that next year they would be able to discuss the subject still more fully and carefully. He thought, also, that the exhaustive discussion that they had had would supply some very valuable hints to the Home Secretary in dealing with these questions; and, under the circumstances, he trusted that the hon. Member for Mayo would allow the Vote to pass, on the understanding that Progress would be immediately reported afterwards.

MR. PARNELL remarked, that he had studied the case of Nolan very carefully, and but for having lost his voice would like to make some further observations with regard to it. Did he understand the right hon. Gentleman to say that there would be a Supplemental Estimate introduced for the Prisons that Session?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS said, that it would be necessary to introduce a Supplemental Estimate for some purposes. As they had to provide compensation to some local gaols, it would be necessary to force the matter on in order to provide the requisite funds.

MR. PARNELL said, that in that case, as there would be an opportunity for raising further discussion on a very important point—namely, the repeated infliction of the punishment of solitary confinement by gaolers, when the Supplementary Estimates came on, he should, therefore, recommend his hon. Friend the Member for Mayo to withdraw his Motion.

MR. O'CONNOR POWER said, that, under the circumstances, he would beg leave to withdraw his Motion. He would, however, first ask the Chairman of Ways and Means, whether they would be in Order in raising the point suggested upon the Supplemental Estimates?

THE CHAIRMAN said, that, not having the Supplemental Estimates before him, he could not inform the hon. Member what questions could be raised upon them.

Motion by leave, withdrawn.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

(2.) Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a further sum, not exceeding £1,101,400, be granted to Her Majesty, on account, for or towards defraying the Charge for the following Civil Services and Revenue Departments for the year ending on the 31st day of March 1880, viz.:—

CIVIL SERVICES.

CLASS I.—PUBLIC WORKS AND BUILDINGS.

Ireland:—	£
Public Buildings	12,000

CLASS II.—SALARIES AND EXPENSES OF PUBLIC DEPARTMENTS.

Ireland:—	£
Chief Secretary's Office, &c. ..	2,500
Charitable Donations and Bequests Office	150
Local Government Board	10,500
Public Works Office	2,500
Record Office	500

CLASS III.—LAW AND JUSTICE.

England:—	£
Reformatory and Industrial Schools, Great Britain	65,000
Broadmoor Criminal Lunatic Asylum	2,300

Scotland:—
Lord Advocate and Criminal Proceedings	5,600
Courts of Law and Justice	5,100
Register House Departments	3,000
Prisons, Scotland	7,000

Ireland:—
Law Charges and Criminal Prosecutions	7,000
Chancery Division, High Court of Justice	3,300

Queen's Bench, &c. Divisions, ditto ..	£ 2,300
Land Judges' Offices, ditto ..	1,000
Probate, &c. Registries, ditto ..	1,000
Court of Bankruptcy ..	900
Admiralty Court Registry ..	150
Registry of Deeds ..	1,600
Registry of Judgments ..	200
County Court Officers, &c. ..	6,400
Dublin Metropolitan Police (including Police Courts) ..	12,000
Constabulary ..	92,000
Prisons, Ireland ..	12,000
Reformatory and Industrial Schools ..	20,000
Dundrum Criminal Lunatic Asylum ..	500

CLASS IV.—EDUCATION, SCIENCE, AND ART.

England :—	£
Public Education ..	320,000
Science and Art Department ..	28,400
British Museum ..	10,000
National Gallery ..	1,500
National Portrait Gallery ..	200
Learned Societies, &c. ..	2,000
London University ..	900
Deep Sea Exploring Expedition (Report) ..	300

Scotland :—
Public Education ..	70,000
Universities, &c. ..	-
National Gallery ..	200

Ireland :—
Public Education ..	80,000
Endowed Schools Commissioners ..	-
National Gallery ..	200
Queen's University ..	-
Queen's Colleges ..	-
Royal Irish Academy ..	150

CLASS V.—COLONIAL, CONSULAR, AND OTHER FOREIGN SERVICES.

	£
Diplomatic Services ..	17,000
Consular Services ..	22,000
Colonies, Grants in Aid ..	4,000
Orange River Territory and St. Helena ..	200
Suez Canal (British Directors) ..	150
Suppression of the Slave Trade ..	600
Tonnage Bounties, &c. ..	1,200
Cyprus, Military Pioneer Force ..	-

CLASS VI.—SUPERANNUATION AND RETIRED ALLOWANCES, AND GRATUITIES FOR CHARITABLE AND OTHER PURPOSES.

Superannuation and Retired Allowances ..	£ 75,000
Merchant Seamen's Fund Pensions, &c. ..	2,500
Relief of Distressed British Seamen Abroad ..	2,600
Pauper Lunatics, England ..	-
Pauper Lunatics, Scotland ..	-
Pauper Lunatics, Ireland ..	20,000
Hospitals and Infirmarys, Ireland ..	3,000
Savings Banks and Friendly Societies Deficiency; ..	-

Miscellaneous Charitable and other Allowances, Great Britain ..	£ 800
Miscellaneous Charitable and other Allowances, Ireland ..	400

CLASS VII.—MISCELLANEOUS, SPECIAL, AND TEMPORARY OBJECTS.

	£
Temporary Commissions ..	4,000
Miscellaneous Expenses ..	600
Total for Civil Services ..	£944,400

REVENUE DEPARTMENTS.

	£
Customs ..	-
Inland Revenue ..	-
Post Office ..	-
Post Office Packet Service ..	64,000
Post Office Telegraphs ..	93,000

Total for Revenue Departments £157,000

Grand Total .. £1,101,400'

MR. O'CONNOR POWER said, that he had understood the Secretary to the Treasury to accede to the suggestion of the hon. Member for Burnley (Mr. Rylands), that if they allowed Vote 16 to be passed he would immediately consent to report Progress. It was asking rather too much to expect them to vote away a million of money in a breath. He begged leave to move that the Chairman do leave the Chair.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do now leave the Chair."—(Mr. O'Connor Power.)

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON thought that the course he had taken had been assented to by hon. Members generally. It was arranged that they should be allowed to take a Vote on Account, in order to meet certain demands which it was absolutely necessary to satisfy before they separated for the Holidays. He pointed out that their only opportunity to get this Vote on Account was that evening, although he admitted that it was an unusual course to take a Vote on Account on the same night as the Civil Service Estimates. Had he not taken the Vote that evening, he should have had to prolong the Sitting till Thursday—thus shortening the Holiday. With that difficulty before him, he ventured on that occasion to take the unusual course of asking for a Vote on Account of the Civil Service that day before they separated. He had agreed to leave out of the Vote an Item which was objected to by several hon. Members below the Gangway opposite—namely, the University Vote for Scotland. That had been struck out of the sum demanded, and was not, therefore, included in the Vote just put from the Chair.

MR. O'CONNOR POWER begged leave to withdraw his Motion.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

House resumed.

Resolutions to be reported To-morrow, at Two of the clock;

Committee to sit again To-morrow, at Two of the clock.

EAST INDIA [LOAN].

Resolution [May 23] reported.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL said, that the House was very much taken by surprise in having this matter brought on at that period, as no notice whatever of the proposal to take it had been given. The Bill was not in the Paper that morning—no one knew what it meant. He had not the slightest idea that the House was to be committed to a loan of these £2,000,000, which he understood it was the proposal of this Bill to lend to India.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, that the loan which they had heard mentioned was a loan of £2,000,000 by this country to India. He understood that it was the desire of the House to have the discussion upon this Bill taken in connection with the general question of Indian finance. There would be an opportunity at a later stage of the Bill of making any explanation with regard to it, and he hoped that the House would now consent to take the Report of the Committee upon it.

Resolution agreed to.

Bill ordered to be brought in by Mr. RAIKES, Mr. EDWARD STANHOPE, and Mr. CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 197.]

PUBLIC HEALTH ACT (1875) AMENDMENT BILL—[BILL 33.]

(Mr. Alexander Brown, Mr. Whitwell, Mr. Ryder.)

COMMITTEE. [Progress 7th April.]

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clauses 1 and 2 agreed to.

Clause 3 (Powers of local authority for supply of water).

MR. A. H. BROWN moved, in page 3, at end to add—

"Nothing in this section shall empower a local authority to obtain or supply water within the limits of a Water Company or of any local authority or person empowered by Act of Parliament, or any Provisional Order confirmed by Parliament to supply water, without the consent of such Water Company or local authority or person."

Amendment agreed to.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Remaining clauses agreed to.

MR. A. H. BROWN moved, in page 5, after Clause 4, to insert the following Clauses:—

(Supply of water by Water Company under guarantee of local authority.)

"Where the district or any portion of the district of a local authority is situate within the limits of supply of any Water Company empowered by Act of Parliament or any Order confirmed by Parliament to supply water, and the Company are under an obligation to supply water therein on the terms prescribed by section thirty-five of 'The Waterworks Clauses Act, 1847,' and it appears to the local authority that the district or portion as the case may be ought to be supplied with water, and the Company as to any part of that district or portion have not obtained from the owners or occupiers of houses in that part, an agreement to the effect specified in that section, the following provisions shall have effect:—

"1. The local authority may, if they think fit, undertake in respect of that part to make good to the Company for successive years the amount, if any, by which the annual water rents from time to time received by the Company from that part fall short of a sum equal to ten per centum per annum on the cost of providing and laying down such pipes, and constructing such service reservoir, if any, as may be necessary for bringing water to and supplying that part;

"2. The Company shall, within three months after the giving of such undertaking, provide and lay down such pipes and construct such reservoir, if any, and provide in manner required by 'The Waterworks Clauses Act, 1847,' such a supply of pure and wholesome water as may be necessary for the domestic use of all the inhabitants of that part;

"3. If the Company fail within those three months to provide and lay down such pipes, or to construct such reservoir, if any, or to provide such supply of water as aforesaid, the part in respect of which the undertaking is given by the authority shall be excluded from the limits of supply of the Water Company;

"4. Any undertaking given by a local authority under this section shall be binding on the authority and their successors, and any expenses or payments incurred or made by a local authority under this section shall be deemed to be expenses incurred by them in the execution of the provisions of 'The Public Health Act, 1875,' and shall be provided for accordingly;

"5. This section shall apply to any local authority or person empowered to supply water within the district of another local authority or person as if the first-mentioned authority were a Water Company."

He hoped that the House would allow these clauses to be inserted then, in order that they should be re-printed in the Bill. There would be plenty of time for the consideration of the matter at a later stage, when the Amendments would be incorporated into the print of the Bill. He was most anxious to do nothing which would injure the rights of Water Companies; but it would be a great convenience that the Bill as a whole should be re-printed, including these clauses.

SIR HENRY HOLLAND moved to report Progress. The negotiations which the hon. Member had had with reference to these matters had signally failed, and he objected to these clauses being inserted.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."—(Sir Henry Holland.)

MR. A. H. BROWN said, that, of course, if anyone objected to the insertion of the clause, he could not insist. He might, however, point out, that as the Public Health Act did not apply to the Metropolis, so this clause did not apply at all to the Metropolis. Still, as there was an objection to the Bill being re-printed in the amended form, he would agree to report Progress.

Motion agreed to.

House resumed.

Committee report Progress; to sit again upon Thursday 12th June.

Mr. A. H. Brown

EAST INDIA LOAN [CONSOLIDATED FUND].

Considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Resolved, That it is expedient to authorise the Commissioners of Her Majesty's Treasury to issue, out of the Consolidated Fund of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, the sum of two million pounds sterling, during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1880, by way of Loan, to the Secretary of State in Council of India.

Resolution to be reported To-morrow, at Two of the clock.

MOTIONS.

CONVEYANCING AND LAND TRANSFER (SCOTLAND) ACT (1874) AMENDMENT

BILL.

On Motion of Mr. YEAMAN, Bill to amend "The Conveyancing and Land Transfer (Scotland) Act, 1874," ordered to be brought in by Mr. YEAMAN, Mr. BAXTER, and Dr. CAMERON.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 198.]

LORD CLERK REGISTER (SCOTLAND) BILL.

On Motion of The LORD ADVOCATE, Bill to make provision in regard to the office of Lord Clerk Register of Scotland; and for other purposes, ordered to be brought in by The LORD ADVOCATE and Mr. Secretary Cross.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 196.]

GRAND JURIES (IRELAND) BILL.

On Motion of Mr. JAMES LOWTHER, Bill to amend the Law relating to Grand Juries and Presentment Sessions in Ireland, ordered to be brought in by Mr. JAMES LOWTHER and Mr. ATTORNEY GENERAL for IRELAND.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 199.]

House adjourned at a quarter after One o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Tuesday, 27th May, 1879.

MINUTES.]—PUBLIC BILLS—First Reading—Costs Taxation (House of Commons) * (99); Gas and Water Provisional Orders Confirmation * (101); Local Government Provisional Order (Artisans and Labourers Dwellings) * (102); Local Government Provisional Orders (Abergavenny Union, &c.) * (103); Local Government Provisional Orders (Ayagarth Union, &c.) * (104).

Second Reading—Parliamentary Burghs (Scotland)* (80); Prosecution of Offences (74).

Committee—Disqualification by Medical Relief (6).

Committee—Report—Statute Law Revision (Ireland)* (80).

Royal Assent—Consolidated Fund (No. 3) [42 Vict. c. 14]; Public Health (Scotland) Act, 1867, Amendment [42 Vict. c. 15].

PRIVATE BILLS.

Ordered, That the time for the Second Reading of any Private Bill brought from the House of Commons, limited by the Order of the 4th day of March last to the 10th day of June next, be extended to the 17th day of June next.

PRIVATE AND PROVISIONAL ORDER CONFIRMATION BILLS.

Ordered, That Standing Orders Nos. 92. and 93. be suspended; and that the time for depositing petitions praying to be heard against Private and Provisional Order Confirmation Bills, which would otherwise expire during the adjournment of the House at Whitsuntide, be extended to the first day on which the House shall sit after the recess.

SOUTH AFRICA—NATAL AND THE TRANSVAAL—APPOINTMENT OF SIR GARNET WOLSELEY AS HIGH COMMISSIONER.

QUESTIONS. OBSERVATIONS.

THE EARL OF CARNARVON: My Lords, I wish to put certain Questions to my noble Friend the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, of which I have given him private Notice. I do not quite understand, from the explanations given last night by the noble Earl at the head of the Government, or from the statement reported as having been given by the Secretary of State in "another place," what is the precise position of Sir Garnet Wolseley towards the Lieutenant Governor of Natal and the Administrator of Affairs in the Transvaal. I would, therefore, ask my noble Friend, in the first place, Whether Sir Henry Bulwer and Colonel Lanyon have been recalled or superseded, or whether they still retain their positions in South Africa? I wish, in the second place, to know, Whether the Colony of Natal and the Province of the Transvaal will be administered as a single Colony or State, and, if so, what place will be the seat of government? Thirdly, I wish to ask my noble Friend—though this is a matter of less importance, but still one which it is desirable to call attention to—Whether the letters patent in the commission, which define the functions, powers, and jurisdiction of Sir Bartle Frere have been cancelled, or rather revoked, by Her Majesty's Government, in order to be issued in an amended form? Your Lordships will not forget that Sir Bartle Frere has hitherto held office, not only as Governor of the Cape, but has exercised jurisdiction over the Provinces of Natal and the Transvaal, and has exercised power as High Commissioner over the Native tribes in these particular districts. My Lords, I have no desire to raise any discussion on the subject; but, at the same time, I think it right to address myself to one point which appears to me to be of great importance. I have not a word to say against the appointment of Sir Garnet Wolseley. I have the highest opinion of him, both as a military man and a civil administrator; but I am extremely desirous that at this conjuncture Her Majesty's Government, while looking at the military aspect of affairs as a first consideration, should not close their eyes to what is almost of equal importance—namely, the civil government of those Provinces. If Sir Garnet Wolseley is called on to discharge military duties, as senior commanding officer, and take an active part in the campaign, it would be clearly impossible for him to give his attention to civil affairs. On the other hand, I think it would be very undesirable at this moment, if it could be avoided, to spare from Natal the services of a Chief of the great experience, knowledge, and clear head of Sir Henry Bulwer, and I think it would be dangerous to leave the Transvaal to the administration of any mere local subordinate official, who might be without knowledge of the temper of the population or of the antecedents or requirements of the Province. I cannot, therefore, but hope that, while Sir Garnet Wolseley has been placed in the supreme command, Her Majesty's Government will pay earnest attention to the necessity of securing the services on the spot of able and experienced officers in the Transvaal, and, if possible, also in Natal.

EARL CADOGAN: My Lords, in reply to the first Question of my noble Friend—namely, whether Sir Henry Bulwer and Colonel Lanyon have been recalled or superseded—I have to say that they have been neither recalled nor superseded, but are retained in their present positions as Lieutenant Governor of Natal and Administrator of the Transvaal, but under Sir Garnet Wolseley, who, by his commission, becomes Governor of the two Provinces. I think this arrangement will carry out the views of my noble Friend. His second Question is, whether the Colony of Natal and the Province of the Transvaal will be administered as a single Colony? No; those two Colonies will remain in their present state. In reply to his third Question—whether Sir Bartle Frere's Commission has been cancelled for the purpose of being re-issued in an amended form—I have to say that Sir Bartle Frere's commission has not been cancelled. It will be kept in full force, except in those districts over which by his commission Sir Garnet Wolseley would have jurisdiction. All this, and further information, will be found in the Papers which I laid on the Table yesterday, and which, I trust, will be in the hands of your Lordships within a day or two.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: May I ask the noble Earl, Whether the Papers to which he alludes will contain the Instructions to Sir Garnet Wolseley?

EARL CADOGAN: No; the Instructions given to Sir Garnet Wolseley are not included in these Papers for a reason stated in "another place" by the Secretary of State—namely, it was thought that if those Instructions were made public, either in this or in the other House of Parliament, they would be telegraphed to the Cape, and would reach the Cape before the officer who is to carry them out would have arrived at the Colony.

WEST DONEGAL RAILWAY BILL. [H.L.]
COMMITTEE.

Order of the Day for the House to be put into Committee, read.

Moved, "That the House do now resolve itself into Committee."

THE EARL OF REDESDALE (CHAIRMAN of COMMITTEES) said, he thought it would be convenient if he explained why he had adopted the course of referring this unopposed Bill to a Committee of the Whole House. Their Lordships would, no doubt, remember that the Bill stood in a very peculiar situation for some time. It was an unopposed Bill, and as such had come before the Committee over which he presided, and had also been made the subject of a Resolution of their Lordships' House with regard to the adoption of the narrow-gauge principle in Ireland. The Resolution which had been come to by the House was that they should have a Report from the Board of Trade on the subject of the Bill. There had, accordingly, been a Report made by the Board of Trade; but he was sorry to say that the Report of the Board of Trade appeared to him to be exceedingly unsatisfactory. The engineer of the company had been examined, and, of course, gave strong evidence in favour of the Bill, and gave some reasons why the line should be constructed on the narrow gauge. But the Board of Trade had not inquired into some matters which appeared to him (the Earl of Redesdale) to be of very great importance in coming to the conclusion to sanction a railway on a less than the standard gauge. For instance, the engineer said in his evidence that dangerous gradients ought to be avoided; but no questions were put to him as to where the gradients might not be modified. He considered this matter was an extremely important element in such an application. Then, again, it was an extremely important matter to inquire whether a company applying for power to construct a narrow-gauge line should not be compelled to take sufficient land to construct the line on the standard gauge, if it was afterwards found desirable; but no such questions had been put to the engineer. Their Lordships must bear in mind that in Ireland a great deal of evil had arisen from the construction of very small railways; but the evil had been greatly reduced by the amalgamation of the smaller lines into the larger ones. With regard to the present Bill, the existing railway of 12½ miles was constructed on the broad gauge, and it was proposed to make 15 miles, or thereabouts, on a different gauge. If that were sanctioned, it must necessarily interfere with any proposals of amalgamation with another line. All these matters were really very serious; and it was also important to point out that this railway did not, as it had been stated, receive very general approval throughout the country. He had looked at the Returns; and he found that out of the owners five assented, one dissented, five were neutral—and one of those, who was the most important, as the line went through a very large extent of his property, had since expressed to him his dissent—and nine gave no answer at all. Of the lessees, seven assented, eight dissented, one was neutral, and three sent no answer at all. Of the occupiers, 28 assented, 27 dissented, 33 were neutral, and 12 gave no answer at all. That was the state of feeling in the district through which the railway was to pass. As, however, the Report of the Board of Trade recommended that the line proposed should be made, he did not wish to offer any opposition to the Bill, especially after the Resolution of their Lordships to which he had referred; but he, nevertheless, still continued to think that such lines were not advisable. In this case, there had been no examination made on the spot by any officer of the Board of Trade; and, therefore, he had thought it his duty, in all the circumstances, to refer the Bill to a Committee of the Whole House. He desired to say a few words with regard to another Bill which came before him as Chairman of the Committee on Unopposed Bills, and with regard to which he believed that the course he had adopted had been misunderstood. The Letterkenny Bill did not stand in the same position. That railway had been granted on the standard gauge, and it was proposed to be converted into a narrow gauge. There was no difficulty in constructing it on the standard gauge, for which almost all the land required was already purchased, and as the promoters had got an Act last year for an extension of time, without asking for more capital or change of gauge, they must then have thought it would be remunerative if so constructed, and, therefore, he did not feel justified in passing the Bill.

Earl Cadogan

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, he was glad that his noble Friend (the Chairman of Committees) had taken the course of referring the Bill to a Committee of the Whole House; because, as he understood his noble Friend's view, if he had not done so, it must have shared the fate of the Letterkenny Railway Bill. His noble Friend had referred to the Letterkenny Railway Bill, and their Lordships would remember that on a former occasion his noble Friend had reported that, in his opinion, or, rather, that in the opinion of the Committee over which his noble Friend presided, that Bill should not be proceeded with. The House on that occasion arrived at the conclusion that it was desirable that the authority of his noble Friend as guardian of the Private Business should be maintained; and he was bound to say, as his noble Friend still seemed to wish to convert their Lordships to his opinion, that he had heard nothing to convince him that his noble Friend's decision was wrong. On the contrary, he believed the decision that had been arrived at was a right decision. The proposal which their Lordships determined was that narrow-gauge railways ought to be sanctioned where railways on the national gauge would either be impossible in construction, or unremunerative. With regard to the Letterkenny Railway, his noble Friend said it was not impossible to construct it on the national gauge, because they had the land taken, and that there was no difficulty about the levels. That was quite true, and, therefore, that part of the case failed. But what about the other case? Would it have been remunerative? His noble Friend thought it would, because the Company had the power to raise an amount of capital which would have been sufficient to make a broad gauge. But there was one statement in Colonel Yolland's Report which his noble Friend had entirely overlooked, and which he (the Lord Chancellor) took to be the key of the whole Report to the Board of Trade. Colonel Yolland said the question referred to the Board of Trade seemed to be—should there or should there not be a railway? And from the evidence placed before them, Colonel Yolland concluded that there was no prospect of raising the money for making the line on the standard gauge; and, therefore, under the circumstances, Colonel Yolland concluded that the construction of a narrow-gauge railway would be beneficial to the district. That really seemed to be the key to the whole matter. No doubt, it would be much better to have a railway on the standard gauge, if it were possible, and their Lordships had affirmed that principle by a Resolution of the House; but when it was not possible it was better to have a narrow-gauge railway than no railway at all. With regard to the present Bill, his noble Friend had spoken with regard to the Report of the Board of Trade, and had said that there had been no investigation on the spot. That was not what could be expected, seeing that the officers of the Board had the surveys before them, and upon that point he did not see that any exception should have been taken by his noble Friend. He trusted that their Lordships would have no difficulty in coming to a conclusion on the matter.

LORD WAVENEY supported the Bill; but, at the same time, he thought it very desirable that the investigations should be made in Ireland, where the truth as to any point could be more easily ascertained.

THE EARL OF REDESDALE (CHAIRMAN of COMMITTEES) said, in the Letterkenny case the money powers of the Company were ample. There had been £80,000 expended on the line already, and of the £100,000 they had at command to complete it, the first £50,000 was to have a preferential dividend, and the next £35,000 was guaranteed.

Motion agreed to.

House in Committee accordingly.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY said, in the Board of Trade Report, Colonel Yolland stated that the speed should be limited to 25 miles an hour. He asked whether the noble Viscount (Viscount Lifford) would insert some Amendment in the Bill to that effect?

VISCOUNT LIFFORD said, he did not intend to propose any Amendment.

Amendments made: the Report thereof to be received on Thursday next.

PROSECUTION OF OFFENCES BILL.

(The Lord Chancellor.)

(NO. 74.) SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR, in moving that the Bill be now read a second time, said, it had already received the sanction of the other House of Parliament. Its object was to give effect to the recommendation of a Commission appointed last year to consider the subject, and to establish a Public Prosecutor. It was the opinion of those most conversant with the subject that in the administration of our Criminal Law there was no necessity for a general and thorough change; but some of the most eminent of the witnesses—including the Lord Chief Justice and others—examined by the Commission thought that some change was required; and that, although the system worked generally well, there were frequently cases in which offenders escaped justice owing to the disinclination of individuals to take up the prosecution. The object of this Bill was to meet those exceptional cases—such as large commercial frauds, in which private persons could not be expected to undertake the expense of prosecutions. In order to effect that, the Bill proposed that the Secretary of State should appoint an officer who would be called the Director of Public Prosecutions, and who would have the status of a permanent Under Secretary of State. It would be the duty of the latter, under the Secretary of State and the Attorney General, to carry out prosecutions undertaken by the Government. It was proposed that the Metropolis should be under his direct control, and that the Provinces should be mapped out into certain districts, each having an officer under the Director in London. The proposals of the Bill were rather intended to meet exceptional cases than to disturb the general system at present prevailing; and regulations would be made by the Attorney General, with the approval of the Secretary of State, as to the exceptional cases in which prosecutions would be undertaken, and as to the mode in which the Director of Public Prosecutions would give advice. Solicitors would be appointed for the Assizes, and there would be a staff in the Director's Department, the number of which would depend on the work to be done. It would not be large at first. For the first time, the Law Officers would have an Office in London, and there would be a continuity of rules in their Department. The noble and learned Earl concluded by moving the second reading.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^d."
—(The Lord Chancellor.)

LORD ABERDARE said, though the Bill fell far short of what had long been called for by those who were in favour of a Public Prosecutor, he approved of it, as he thought it would be useful in its operation by having a tendency to prevent the scandals which now occasionally arose. During the time he was responsible for the discharge of the duties of Home Secretary, he found by his official experience that there were many defects in the existing system of criminal administration; but there was no part of it with which there was so much dissatisfaction as the very large powers exercised by the Home Secretary. A large part of these cases arose from the imperfect inquiry as to the antecedents of the prisoner, with respect to whom, after his trial and conviction, facts often transpired which ought to have been known to the Judge and Jury at the time of the trial. From Scotland, where such inquiries were carefully made, there was not only a larger proportion of convictions to prosecutions than in England, but a far smaller relative number of appeals to the interference of the Home Secretary. The necessity of careful examination when the case was in progress was proved when, after sentence, the Secretary of State was called on to make fresh inquiries. If every case were, in the first instance, fully investigated, there would be less necessity than now for the exercise of the power vested in the Home Secretary; but its exercise was at times necessary because of the discovery of important evidence after the trial. In his own experience, a man killed another apparently without cause. He was found lying by the side of the murdered man, whom he had not robbed. He was tried, convicted, and sentenced to death, and it was only after his sentence that, local inquiries having been made, it was discovered that he suffered from epileptic fits, and that when labouring under them he was dangerous to those who approached him, so much so, that his fellow-colliers had pressed the manager of the mine in which he was employed not to allow him to work with them. In Scotland, in such a case, all the antecedents of the prisoner would have been fully inquired into before the trial, and the Home Secretary would not have been obliged to have recourse to irregular means to discover what the facts of the case were. The Bill, in his opinion, would bring about a change which would be acceptable to the country.

The Lord Chancellor

LORD STANLEY OF ALDERLEY disapproved of the principle of the Bill, and said, that it was admitted that the present system worked well in criminal prosecutions. At present, the reputation of the Attorney General, or of other lawyers instructed by the Solicitor for the Treasury, was as much founded on defences as on prosecutions, and they could afford to be fair, and not to stretch points unduly; but the reputation of these new Public Prosecutors would entirely depend upon the number of convictions they obtained, and it was impossible that they should not be biassed by that.

Motion agreed to; Bill read 2^d accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Friday next.

DISQUALIFICATION BY MEDICAL RELIEF BILL.—(No. 6.)

(The Lord Aberdare.)

COMMITTEE.

Order of the Day for the House to be put into Committee, read.

House in Committee accordingly.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND AND GORDON said, that by the Bill, as it originally stood, no one would be disqualified by the receipt of parochial relief in certain cases from exercising the franchise. The question had been considered, and it appeared that the only relaxation of the Poor Law of 1835 was that by the Statute 25 & 26 Vict. c. 83, s. 6, an Act applying solely to Ireland. This provision he proposed to adopt in the Bill. Under the Act in question a person who had obtained medical relief in a Union fever hospital could ask to re-pay the Guardians the cost of that relief, and, if he did so, the fact of his having received it did not deprive him of electoral rights. The noble Duke concluded by moving the Amendment of which he had given Notice, as follows:—

In Clause 1, page 1, line 9, after ("family") leave out to the end of the clause and insert ("has before or after the passing of this Act received relief and medical treatment as an in-patient of any hospital or infirmary maintained under the laws for the relief of the poor in consequence of such patient suffering from any dangerous disease, provided such person shall have repaid or tendered to the authority of such hospital or infirmary the cost of the in-maintenance therein of himself and any member of his family as aforesaid, such cost to be determined according to the average of the cost of in-maintenance in such hospital or infirmary during the half-year preceding the admission of the patient.

"The expression 'cost of in-maintenance' in this section shall be deemed to include the expense in and about the maintenance, treatment, and relief of the in-patients of the hospital or infirmary, exclusive of the repairs and furniture thereof, and the salaries, remuneration, and rations of the officers and servants, but inclusive of the necessary expenses incurred in the warming, cleaning, and lighting of the building, and otherwise keeping it fit for use.")

LORD ABERDARE said, that he had a sincere desire that there should be no improper exercise of the franchise where persons received poor relief. But this was a different matter. It was of the greatest importance for the purpose of preventing the spreading of infectious diseases that persons should not be deterred from accepting the benefits of hospital relief through the fear of losing their electoral privileges. Persons had been, upon the authority of medical officers, persuaded to enter hospitals where they had been maintained under the Poor Law, and, as a consequence, they had been disqualified from voting. That had occurred in several cases, and this Bill was intended to prevent disqualification in future where medical relief only was given. The Bill, as it came from the other House, was defective, and ought not to have been passed in its present shape without some notice from the Government. At present there were two forms of public hospitals, both maintained out of the public rates, one under the sanitary authority, and the other under the Poor Law Guardians. The acceptance of medical relief under the former did not disqualify, but under the other it did; and that was very inconsistent, there being really no substantial distinction in the relief given, nor in the fund out of which that relief was paid for. What he proposed was, that the matter should be left in the hands of the Guardians, and if they found that a man who accepted the benefits of a Poor Law hospital could not pay for his maintenance, he should not be disenfranchised. With that view, he should propose the insertion, in line 7, after "infirmary," of the words "on demand," in the proposed Amendment.

The Duke of Richmond and Gordon

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND AND GORDON said, that if the Amendment were agreed to, and the words "on demand" were inserted, Boards of Guardians would be brought into connection with political questions for the first time since 1832. To his mind, that appeared to be very undesirable; and as he could not find out that there was any great demand from the public for the proposal of the noble Lord he should, therefore, oppose it.

EARL FORTESCUE said, that he quite agreed that if persons sought relief in hospitals they should pay for their maintenance during their illness, or be disqualified from voting. By agreeing to such legislation as had been proposed, they were more and more in danger of pauperizing the population. The Bill was to exempt persons from being paupers, while, in fact, they were receiving relief from the rates. He felt grateful to the noble Duke the Lord President for having made a stand against this Bill, and agreed with him that there would be great danger if they introduced this new element of politics into the Boards of Guardians.

EARL STANHOPE would remind the Committee that all fever hospitals in the Metropolis were under the Poor Laws. If the exception proposed by the Bill were adopted, it would be impossible to draw a line between those who were, or were not, actual paupers. The Amendment of the noble Duke would, however, make a great difference between medical relief and ordinary Poor Law relief, and would maintain the existing principle of the Poor Law. He hoped that the Amendment proposed by the Lord President of the Council would be accepted.

LORD ABERDARE said, he would withdraw his Amendment.

Amendment (The Lord Aberdare) (by leave of the Committee) withdrawn.

LORD DENMAN ventured to think that neither proposed Amendment would be an improvement of the Bill.

Amendment (The Lord President of Council) agreed to.

Other Amendments made: The Report thereof to be received on Thursday next.

THE ADMINISTRATOR OF THE STRAITS SETTLEMENTS—THE SULTAN OF JOHOR.

OBSERVATIONS. QUESTIONS.

MOTION FOR PAPERS.

LORD STANLEY OF ALDERLEY rose to call the attention of the House to the action of the Administrator of the Straits Settlements with respect to Muar, and to ask Her Majesty's Government not to uphold this action; and to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether the Maharaja of Johor continues to make his accustomed payment to the heir of Sultan Aly, late Sultan of Johor? and to move for Papers. The noble Lord said: Although this case is one of the blackest of those which have occurred in the Malay Peninsula, I shall not detain your Lordships long, because I have nothing to complain of in the conduct either of the late or of the present Secretary of State for the Colonies, and because all the details of this affair are stated in a pamphlet published at Singapore, under the title of Punic Faith, which requires an answer from the noble Earl the Under Secretary of State much more than my speech. Muar is a small State which belongs to the Sultan of Johor. The Sultans of Johor had become indolent and had allowed their power to fall into the hands of their Ministers, and the late Sultan, Sultan Aly, had, besides, fallen into pecuniary difficulties, and in 1855 he made a Treaty with his Minister, the Tumonggong, by which he made over to him the Rulership of Johor for a sum of $5,000 and a monthly payment for ever of $500, reserving only for himself the Sovereignty of Muar. This Treaty was negotiated, arranged, and drawn up by British Government officials, and it was attested by the Governor. Sultan Aly was also in the receipt of a small pension from the British Government. In June, 1877, he died, and his son, Tunku Alum, announced his death to the Administrator of the Straits Government and expected to succeed his father. A younger brother of his, however, put in a claim to succeed, on the plea of having been designated by his father as successor, as asserted by this young man's mother. It is not clear that the Straits Government had any right to meddle between claimants, whose claims were rightfully to be settled by the inhabitants of Muar; but the Straits Government suggested to the Maharaja of Johor, who is the son of the Tumonggong with whom the late Sultan Aly made his arrangement in 1855, that he should assume the guardianship of the Muar State, although it was known that he was claiming to become its Ruler in spite of the Treaty of 1855, which our authorities were pledged to uphold from the active part which they had taken in its negotiation. The Maharaja, thus encouraged by the Straits Government Administrator, proceeded to insure his election by kidnapping several of the Muar headmen and detaining them in Johor; other headmen were canvassed, and pressure put upon them by the Straits officials, both at Malacca and Singapore. I abstain from troubling your Lordships with many details which aggravate this case, because they are stated in the pamphlet Punic Faith, and because the case is sufficiently stated and set forth in the despatches of the late Secretary of State for the Colonies. The late Secretary of State wrote on the 3rd of September, 1877, to the officer administering the Government as follows:—

"I do not object to the course which I understand you have taken in requesting the Maharaja of Johor, as a temporary measure and pending the settlement of the succession, to undertake the guardianship of this small State, as I gather that some such control is necessary; but the nature of the arrangement should be distinctly understood by all parties, and, above all, there should be no ground for misapprehension on the part of the Chiefs and Native population. The good services of the Maharaja of Johor have been frequently experienced and recognized by Her Majesty's Government; but I am not prepared, with the information I at present possess, to express any opinion respecting this disputed succession; but in making choice of one of the claimants, due attention should be paid to the custom of the country and the wishes of the people, as it would manifestly be impossible, in order to reward political services, however meritorious they may have been, to impose any Ruler upon the inhabitants of this territory against their wishes. When the choice has been ultimately made and agreed to, the new Sultan should be informed that the recognition he will receive from Her Majesty's Government will depend upon his personal merits and the character of his administration, and that as long as he governs his people properly that recognition will be maintained."

I would observe that this last paragraph goes beyond the powers belonging to the British Government. In another despatch, the late Secretary of State wrote—

Re-
sday

"(4.) If these letters express their real wishes, the fact is important. But I observe that they were summoned to Government House at Singapore, and it must, therefore, be borne in mind that it would be in accordance with Malay character, in their circumstances, if they merely put their signatures to a document which at the moment would be agreeable to, and in accordance with, the wishes of the Colonial Government, by whom they had been summoned to discuss the question. (5.) It is stated in a Colonial newspaper that the Tumonggong had been forcibly arrested and taken to Johor. I presume, however, that this is not true. . . . (8.) These are the points that, as far as I understand this case, seem to call for the most serious consideration, and I trust that they will not have escaped your attention; but the whole question is one in which care and watchfulness are necessary, and where any ill-advised step on the part of the Colonial Government might easily lead to grave difficulties. (9.) I am fully alive to the fact that a good settled Government in Muar is greatly to be desired, and I presume that, for administrative and general ability, no Native Ruler can compare with the Maharaja of Johor; but these advantages must not be purchased at the expense of setting aside whosoever may be the rightful heir and the Ruler acceptable to the people."

Reference is here made to the political services of the Maharaja of Johor, and it would not weaken the arguments of the noble Earl nor my own case, if these had been of the most honourable character. But, as a matter of fact, they consisted in treacherously entrapping Maharaja Lela, and handing him over to execution by the Straits Government, in violation of his word and of the duties of hospitality. They were services that would have been more fitly recompensed by giving him 30 pieces of silver out of the Treasury. It may be said, in excuse for the Maharaja of Johor, that he did not anticipate his handing over Maharaja Lela to the Straits Government would lead to his death, although the temper of the Colonists at that time was so bloodthirsty that they were clamouring for the execution of Sultan Ismail, the de jure Ruler of Perak; and Sultan Ismail might have perished had not the noble Earl interposed by recommending more just and moderate counsels to Sir William Jervois. It is only doing justice to the noble Earl to say that the country is under great obligation to him for saving it from what would have been a great blot and a crime if Sultan Ismail had been put to death. I cannot give your Lordships the reference to the Blue Book; but my noble Friend will no doubt recollect writing these words to Sir William Jervois—

Lord Stanley of Alderley

"Forbear, dear friend, we will not shed more blood, Enough, more than enough, of woe is wrought;
And sad the harvest which our hands must reap."

I have already said that I am entirely satisfied with the view of this case taken by my noble Friend the late Secretary of State; but, as on two occasions my noble Friend has informed the House that I have taken exception to everything he has done, I feel that I should be disappointing him if I did not now take some exception to the letter whilst approving the spirit of these despatches; and I must regret that they are not worded in more precise and decided language. The amiable unwillingness of my noble Friend to risk hurting the feelings of Colonial officials leads him to give them hints which they do not follow, instead of reprimanding them when necessary to prevent them from entering crooked paths, such as they have now followed; and though the present Secretary of State (Sir Michael Hicks-Beach) has expressed himself more strongly than my noble Friend, yet he also failed to convey his meaning and his sense of right to the Colonial officials. Sir Michael Hicks-Beach wrote to the Governor of the Straits on April 20, 1878—

"After reading your despatch, I cannot but observe that the candidature of the Maharajah of Johor had the appearance of being favoured from the commencement by the Straits Government, while under the acting administration of the Lieutenant Governor; and I am disposed to think that it would have been better not to have invited the Chiefs to Government House at Singapore to discuss the subject, as I should have preferred the observance of complete neutrality in the smallest detail; and for the same reason, if practicable, it would have been better if the regency of the little State had been placed, pending the election, in other hands than those of the powerful candidate for the right of succession."

Further on, Sir Michael Hicks-Beach says—

"He has no option 'but to acquiesce in what I trust is the true choice of the people of Muar.'"

Thus showing that he doubted where he ought to have been certain. This doubt, however, must have been dispelled by the recent arrival at Singapore of crowds of Muar men to do homage to Sultan Alum as their rightful Lord, and by the Muar men obeying the notice of Sultan Alum not to pay the tithes levied upon them by the Maharaja of Johor. It is difficult to catch that fleeting and evanescent moment at which representations may be made to Government; when they are not said to be premature, or when they are not treated as too late, as the affair has become a matter of history. Last year, I might have been told that the election was the true expression of the wishes of the people of Muar; but, quite lately, this has been shown not to be the fact. It is only in February of this year that the Straits Government has published in its Gazette a proclamation by the Minister of the Maharaja of Johor, stating that he has been elected Ruler of Muar, and that the election has been acquiesced in and recognized by the Queen of Great Britain and Empress of India; so that the Colonial authorities have implicated England in this affair and in its consequences, should troubles and bloodshed result from it. Looking, therefore, at the circumstances that the people of Muar did not acquiesce in the rule of the Maharaja of Johor, and to the hesitating and unconvinced language of the Secretary of State for the Colonies (Sir Michael Hicks-Beach); and considering that two Members of the Legislative Council of Singapore moved a Vote of Censure against the Straits Government, which was only evaded by the Governor stating that the matter was in the hands of the Secretary of State; considering that all the local Straits Press has blamed the action of the Straits Government, and that the same line has been taken by The London and China Telegraph, the London organ of the merchants in China and the Straits—there is not time now to read to your Lordships what it says, but it urges that the British Empire is powerful enough to acknowledge a mistake—I ask the Government not to uphold and confirm the action of the Straits Government in this matter. In other cases where injustice has been done, there were motives of interest, commercial or others, to explain them. Here there is no such case; the giving Muar to Johor would not benefit English trade in any way. I now have to ask the Question of which I have given Notice, and to ask, Whether, in addition to what may be called the public wrong done by the Maharaja of Johor and the Straits Government to the people of Muar and to their rightful Sovereign, a private wrong has been done by the Maharaja of Johor ceasing to make his monthly payment of $500, under the Treaty of 1855, to Tunku Alum, the heir and successor of Sultan Aly? Because the pamphlet which I have before referred to contains hints that the Maharaja of Johor contemplated escaping from this obligation on the plea that he had become the heir and successor of the late Sultan Aly. Such a scheme on the part of the Maharaja is too iniquitous to be thought possible, nor should I think it necessary to ask a Question about it were it not for the Maharaja of Johor's own words in a letter to the Administrator of the Straits Government. I conclude by moving for the Treaty of 1855 and the Correspondence respecting the Muar State since the death of Sultan Aly.

Moved, "That an humble address be presented to Her Majesty for, Copy of the Treaty of 1855 between the Sultan of Johor and his Tumonggong, and for the correspondence respecting Muar since the death of the late Sultan of Johor."—(The Lord Stanley of Alderley.)

EARL CADOGAN said, he would answer the remarks of the noble Lord (Lord Stanley of Alderley) from the official information at his disposal. It was quite true, as the noble Lord had stated, that Colonel Anson suggested that the Maharaja of Johor should become temporary Governor of Muar on the death of the late Sultan of Johor. The late Sultan died without having nominated a successor in the customary manner. The Throne was left by will to the son of his favourite wife—a boy 11 years old. The will, however, appeared to be invalid, as the boy had not been properly adopted before the Chiefs, and that circumstance appeared to have added to the elements of dissension and general dissatisfaction that existed in the little State. Upon this, Colonel Anson felt it his duty, in order to preserve peace, to institute the Maharaja of Johor as temporary Governor until the succession should be arranged. The Leaders of the State, it was true, were then invited to Singapore, not with any view to intimidation, but in order that proceedings should be taken for the election of the Sovereign. These Leaders were told that the election should be made in accordance with the custom of the country, and that no pressure was to be put upon them in their selection of a candidate. The result of the election was that the Maharaja of Johor was unanimously chosen. The noble Lord had asked that that action should not be upheld; but he (Earl Cadogan) would point out to the noble Lord that, the election having taken place, and having been made under conditions of perfect freedom, and without the exertion of any undue pressure, it would be very difficult, if not impossible, for the Government to say that it should be upset, and that some other person should be elected. The Government had no wish to interfere further than was absolutely necessary in the internal affairs of this small State. All they wished to do was to see that peace was preserved; and as they had selected their Sovereign, who, so far as it was known, was a very good and intelligent man, the Government had no intention to take any steps to alter the election. It was quite true that, under the Treaty of 1855, the Maharaja of Johor, in consideration of the government which was vested in him, was to pay down $5,000 and $500 a-month afterwards, and, at the suggestion of Sir William Robinson, who went out in 1877, and felt that the family of the late Sultan might consider themselves ill-used by the turn affairs had taken, the Maharaja of Johor decided upon a second monthly payment of $725; but the family of the late Sultan declined to receive this, and the money was, therefore, paid into the Treasury at Singapore, where it would remain until the family should come to a more sensible determination. There was not the least objection to the production of the Papers for which the noble Lord asked.

THE EARL OF CARNARVON said, that he did not see how, under the circumstances, it was possible to recall the recognition that had been given by the Colonial Office to the election of the present Maharaja of Johor. He, therefore, fully approved of what had been said by his noble Friend (Earl Cadogan). By the will left by Sultan Aly, the son of his favourite wife was designated as his heir. That, however, was an invalid proceeding, as the Sultan should have called together a Council of the Chiefs and declared his pleasure with regard to his successor before them. As the Sultan did not take that course, his youthful son, by Malay custom, possessed no rightful claim to the Throne.

Earl Cadogan

Hearing that matters were in a very precarious, if not a dangerous state at Muar, the Administrator of the Straits Settlement (Colonel Anson) thought it his duty to apply to the Maharaja of Johor to take temporary charge of that little Province. That determination was reported home, and after some considerable consideration agreed to by himself (the Earl of Carnarvon), who at that time directed the Colonial affairs of the country. He agreed to that course mainly for two reasons—first, because he thought it would be dangerous to reverse the decision of Colonel Anson; and secondly, because he felt that the great danger which he had to guard against at that time was any intervention which would result in the annexation of the Province in question. Many of their Lordships were aware how very hard a fight was waged at that time in order to prevent the annexation of a very large part of the Peninsula itself. The local feeling was very strong, and the Governor had unfortunately committed himself to a policy of annexation. It was for these reasons that he had sanctioned the arrangement of Colonel Anson. But anyone who would refer to his (the Earl of Carnarvon's) despatches of that time would see that he agreed to it only as a temporary and provisional measure, which was to have no effect until the feeling of the country had been ascertained. The despatch containing these views was written in September, 1877, and in 1878 he resigned the Seals of Office. Two or three months then elapsed in which no action was taken by the present Colonial Secretary, and in this interval an election was made which, he apprehended, was a proper and regular one. The Chiefs were summoned and unanimously agreed that the Maharaja of Johor should be confirmed in the Sovereignty of the Province. The whole question turned upon the spontaneity of this expression of opinion by the Chiefs, and, as far as he could understand, there could be no doubt whatever that the Chiefs who voted were those who ought to have been consulted, and that they came to the decision which he had mentioned with perfect unanimity. The election was held after the most distinct orders had been issued by him that there should not be any interference whatever with the free opinion of the Chiefs and people. Assurances were also given subsequently by the Administrator that no sort of tampering had taken place. Under all those circumstances, although Sir Michael Hicks-Beach seemed for some time to be doubtful on the subject, he had now recognized the Maharaja of Johor. There was, therefore, no reason why the Papers should not be given. He desired to add that the Maharaja had great claims on the British Government, for he was one of those rare and remarkable examples which were sometimes found in Oriental life of a Native Prince, accepting Western civilization and throwing himself actively into the work of civilizing his country. His administrative ability was very great; he possessed the means and the will of developing the resources of the country, and had justified his position by a remarkable degree of success. Beyond that, the Chiefs had plainly signified their approval of his retention of his present position. The noble Lord who brought forward the subject (Lord Stanley of Alderley) asked the Government to do what appeared to be simply impossible—namely, that they should recall their recognition of the Maharaja in favour of a man avowedly and confessedly his inferior in administrative ability who would certainly govern the country after the fashion of the thousand and one Native Princes who had misruled in its past history, and to recall it on a mere doubt, because the evidence was, in his opinion, strongly in favour of the Prince who had been elected. He did not think it possible to recall that recognition, and by refusing to do so they would be doing substantial justice, and that which was most for the interest of the little country in question.

LORD STANLEY OF ALDERLEY, in reply, said, he thanked the noble Earl the Under Secretary of State (Earl Cadogan) for the Papers, and for his reply as to the payments of the Maharaja, which was more favourable than he had expected. He must be allowed to contradict what had been said by the noble Earl (the Earl of Carnarvon) of the inferior birth of Tunku Alum; there was a confusion in the noble Earl's mind on that subject with regard to another son. There was no such thing as inferior birth; but, if so, the Maharaja was not of Royal blood at all. The noble Earl, by what he had just said of his struggle with Sir William Jervois against annexation, confirmed the complaint which was generally made against him by the country, that he argued with his Colonial Governors instead of giving them instructions; and he would describe the consequences of such hesitation in the noble Earl's own words—

“ So spake he with a wavering mind,
But when he once had bowed to fate,
Came o'er his soul like change of wind,
A spirit base and insensate.”

Motion agreed to.

THE ADMIRALTY—THE NAVAL DEPARTMENT.

QUESTION. OBSERVATIONS.

THE EARL OF CAMPERDOWN rose to call attention to the condition of the Naval Department of the Admiralty, and to ask, When it was intended to undertake the re-organization of that office? Their Lordships would doubtless understand that by the Naval Department of the Admiralty was meant the Secretary's Office. In that Department all the important business of the Admiralty was transacted. The policy of the Admiralty, the whole administration of the Navy, all the communications with the Fleet, were maintained through this Office. It was, therefore, of the first importance that it should be maintained in a state of the highest efficiency. Many years since it was recognized that considerable changes were required as well in the personnel, as in the constitution of the Office, and the distribution of the various duties carried on in it. The first step towards those changes was taken in 1866, when entries were stopped in the Department; but since then nothing further had been done in the direction of the re-organization of the Office, and, consequently, the junior clerks had served more than 13 years. Since the year to which he had referred every other Department of the Admiralty had undergone considerable changes, and the present Government last Session made provision for dealing with the Secretary's Office under the Admiralty Offices Re-organization Act. The re-organization of the Office had not been carried out, and some immediate action must be taken, the Act in question having only one year to run. The number of clerks in the Office had been reduced from 60 to about 30, some of whom had served over 40 years, and a very small further reduction would be necessary. He had read a statement made in "another place" that the Board of Admiralty were in correspondence with the Treasury on the subject; but all who had experience of correspondence in the Treasury would know that it might last for weeks, or for years, or even for a life-time; and he was anxious to know whether anything in the shape of re-organization was likely soon to take place? He ventured to hope that there would be no delay in this instance, and that he would receive a favourable answer to his Question. He should be content to learn that it was in contemplation to appoint a Committee of Inquiry.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND AND GORDON said, that he was happy to be able to give his noble Friend (the Earl of Camperdown) the assurance that the correspondence to which he referred would not occupy the lengthened space which he seemed to apprehend. The First Lord of the Admiralty and the Board were perfectly alive to the necessity of re-organizing the Naval Department—the only Department which had not been re-organized of recent years; and the result of their correspondence with the Treasury was that the appointment of a Committee to inquire into that subject had been agreed upon, and it would, without delay, proceed upon the work in question.

House adjourned at a quarter past Seven o'clock, to Thursday next, Eleven o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Tuesday, 27th May, 1879.

MINUTES.]—SUPPLY—considered in Committee—Resolutions [May 26] reported—CIVIL SERVICES, Classes I. to VII., and REVENUE DEPARTMENTS.

PRIVATE BILLS (by Order)—Third Reading—Birkenhead Tramways*; British Fisheries Society (Pulteney Harbour, &c.); Downham and Stoke Ferry Railway; London, Chatham, and Dover Railway (Sevenoaks Railway Purchase); London Street Tramways; Stourbridge Gas*; Walton-on-the-Naze and Frinton Improvement*; West Lancashire Railway*, and passed.

The Earl of Camperdown

PUBLIC BILLS—Resolution [May 26] reported—Ordered—East India Loan [Consolidated Fund].

Second Reading—Local Government (Highways) Provisional Orders (Dorset, &c.)* [186]; Local Government (Highways) Provisional Orders (Gloucester and Hereford)* [185]; Tramways Orders Confirmation* [187].

Committee—Report—Metropolis (Little Coram Street, Bloomsbury, Wells Street, Poplar, and Great Peter Street, Westminster) Improvement Provisional Orders Confirmation [175]; Local Government Provisional Orders (Castleton by Rochdale, &c.)* [160]; Local Government (Ireland) Provisional Orders (Killarney, &c.)* [178]; Elementary Education Provisional Orders Confirmation (Brighton and Preston, &c.)* [177]; Elementary Education Provisional Order Confirmation (London)* [176].

Considered as amended—Hypothec Abolition (Scotland) [119], debate adjourned.

Third Reading—Local Government (Ireland) Provisional Orders (Clonmel, &c.)* [166]; Local Government Provisional Order (Artizans' and Labourers' Dwellings)* [159]; Gas and Water Provisional Orders Confirmation* [136]; Local Government Provisional Order (Abergavenny)* [137]; Local Government Provisional Orders (Ayagarth Union, &c.)* [142], and passed.

The House met at Two of the clock.

QUESTIONS.

SALMON DISEASE (ENGLAND AND SCOTLAND).—QUESTION.

CAPTAIN MILNE-HOME asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, If his attention has been drawn to a destructive disease extensively prevalent during this and last year among the salmon of certain rivers in England and Scotland; and, what steps, if any, he proposes to take to inquire into the nature and origin of the disease with the view of, if possible, checking its recurrence?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS: There is no doubt that this is a very serious matter, and I have had a specimen of one of these diseased salmon placed in the Library for the inspection of hon. Members by one of the Inspectors of Fisheries who has directed his attention specially to the subject, and I shall order an inquiry to be made into the matter with the objects indicated in the Question.

SOUTH AFRICA—THE ZULU WAR—RETURNS OF KILLED, &c.

QUESTION.

SIR WILFRID LAWSON asked the Secretary of State for War, If he is now able to state the total number of officers, non-commissioned officers, and men respectively of the Imperial Forces and of the Native Contingent who have died in South Africa from the date of the declaration of war against Cetewayo up to the present time?

COLONEL STANLEY: All I can say, in answer to the Question of the hon. Baronet, is that up to the 20th instant Lord Chelmsford reported the number of killed as 1,186, and the number of deaths by disease as 86. I have not felt quite reconciled to the figures, and I give them for what they are worth. However, these are the figures we have got, and until more detailed Returns have been received I cannot give an accurate statement as to numbers.

THAMES RIVER TRAFFIC COMMITTEE
—THE REPORT.—QUESTIONS.

CAPTAIN PIM asked the Secretary to the Board of Trade, When the Report of the Thames Traffic Committee will be laid upon the Table of the House?

MR. J. G. TALBOT: The Thames Traffic Committee have almost reached the end of their labours, and we hope to be able to lay their Report upon the Table shortly after Whitsuntide.

LORD FRANCIS HERVEY asked, Whether the Committee would report on the danger to the navigation of the upper Thames which arose from small boats and steam launches?

MR. J. G. TALBOT: I fear I cannot give my noble Friend as much information as I should have desired, having only just had Notice of his Question; but I can state generally that I feel sure the Thames Traffic Committee have given their fullest attention to all matters connected with the traffic on the river, and I will take care that this particular subject shall be brought to their special attention.

THE "PRINCESS ALICE" CALAMITY—PROCEEDINGS AT THE INQUEST.
QUESTION.

CAPTAIN PIM asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, When the Return of the proceedings at the "Princess Alice" inquest will be laid upon the Table of the House?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS: I have had a communication from the Coroner, informing me that the Return of the proceedings will be one of great length—probably 5,000 folios; and he wants to know who is to bear the cost of making it. I have no means of paying that expense; but I have written to him again to say that the Order of the House must be obeyed.

CYPRUS—ADMINISTRATION OF THE GOVERNMENT.—QUESTIONS.

SIR JULIAN GOLDSMID asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, What arrangements have been made for the government of the island of Cyprus, now that Sir Garnet Wolseley has been appointed to a command in South Africa?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER, in reply, said, that Colonel Greaves was now Acting Governor of Cyprus, and he would continue to be so for the present.

SIR JULIAN GOLDSMID: As locum tenens or as successor to Sir Garnet Wolseley?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER replied, that when Sir Garnet Wolseley came home it had been found necessary to appoint some one to conduct the administration of the affairs of the Island in his stead, and that Colonel Greaves had been appointed with that object and remained in that position.

Afterwards—

SIR JULIAN GOLDSMID said, the answer of the Chancellor of the Exchequer with respect to the government of Cyprus was not clearly understood by several hon. Members, and he therefore wished to put a further Question on the subject. They were informed that Sir Garnet Wolseley had been appointed High Commissioner and Commander-in-Chief in the Transvaal; and they wished to know whether, at the same time, he remained Governor of Cyprus, and whether Colonel Greaves was only his locum tenens?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I thought I had made my Answer clear. Sir Garnet Wolseley came home from Cyprus a short time ago for purposes of a Departmental character. Since he has been in this country an arrangement has been perfected by which he is to go out as Governor of the Transvaal and Natal. That arrangement has been quite recently made. The affairs of Cyprus were left under the administration of Colonel Greaves. They still remain under his administration; but no decision has been at present arrived at as to what will be done hereafter.

SIR JULIAN GOLDSMID: Is Sir Garnet Wolseley to be Governor of Cyprus as well as of the Transvaal and Natal?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I think the hon. Gentleman really must see what the state of the case is. I do not quite see what is the motive of his question. Sir Garnet Wolseley, being Governor and High Commissioner of Cyprus, came over here on leave for purposes of a Departmental character. Within the last two days, in fact, he has received an appointment to another post. The matter is one which, of course, has occupied a great deal of the attention of the Government. Colonel Greaves is left in charge of Cyprus; but what arrangements are to be made at Cyprus is a matter at present under the consideration of the Government. It is impossible for me to say more than that.

SIR JULIAN GOLDSMID: The right hon. Gentleman says he does not understand the motive of the Question. My motive is simply to know in what hands the government of Cyprus is going to be placed, and to know whether Colonel Greaves merely represents Sir Garnet Wolseley during his absence, and whether Sir Garnet Wolseley holds two appointments at the same time? It is not my purpose to find any fault with the Government, inasmuch as I cordially approve of their appointment of Sir Garnet Wolseley.

CRIMINAL LAW—CASE OF EDMUND GALLEY.—QUESTION.

MR. HOPWOOD asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether he has been able to give further consideration to the case of the convict Edmund Galley, reprieved from sentence of death in 1836; whether (as it has been stated in a weekly journal) he has had the assistance of the Law Officers of his department in considering the evidence; and, what is the result at which he and they have arrived as to the innocence of the man?

The Chancellor of the Exchequer

MR. ASSHETON CROSS: I have nothing more to say on this case at present than what I have already stated. The matter is to be brought before the House, as I understand, by the hon. Member for South Warwickshire (Sir Eardley Wilmot); and I must reserve any remarks further until he introduces the subject. I think it will then be seen that due attention has been paid to the matter.

POOR LAW—DUDLEY, &c.—THE TRUCK SYSTEM.—QUESTION.

MR. H. B. SHERIDAN asked the President of the Local Government Board, Whether he is aware that the men who are engaged to work in the parishes of Dudley, Tipton, Sedgley, and Rowley, are paid by such parishes partly in wages and partly in "truck" as it is called; whether he is aware that great complaints are made by the men as to this mode of payment; and, whether he can take any steps to provide against a continuance of this system?

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH, in reply, said, the out-door paupers relieved by the Guardians of the parishes referred to had the labour test applied to them—a system which he thought very conducive to the interests of the poor and the rights of the labouring classes.

RIBBONISM (IRELAND)—TYRONE. QUESTION.

MR. CALLAN asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland, Whether he will have any objection to place upon the Table of the House the Reports from the constabulary authorities or resident magistrates of the county of Tyrone, if any such exist, for the years 1878 and 1879, which tend to show that certain districts in and about Holyhill are infected with ribbonism and infected with illicit distillation?

MR. J. LOWTHER: Sir, I am afraid I cannot lay these Papers upon the Table, as they are always treated as highly confidential, and their production would be attended with inconvenience.

NATIONAL SCHOOL TEACHERS (IRELAND)—LEGISLATION.—QUESTION.

SIR JOSEPH M'KENNA (for Mr. MELDON) asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland, When he proposes to introduce the Bill relating to the Salaries and Pensions for Irish National School Teachers; and, whether, having regard to the delay which has occurred, and the anxiety felt by the teachers, he will state what course the Government are prepared to adopt?

MR. J. LOWTHER: Mr. Speaker, if the hon. Gentleman will take a glance at the Order Book, he will, I think, be disposed to concur with me in the opinion that in its present condition it does not hold out much encouragement to the Government to introduce more Bills. I hope, however, that the progress of Public Business will be such that it may be in my power to bring in a Bill upon this subject before very long.

SOUTH AFRICA—INSTRUCTIONS OF SIR GARNET WOLSELEY.—QUESTION.

MR. SULLIVAN: A typographical error appears in the printed Paper of my Question, the word "terms" being printed instead of "tenour." I wish to ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether he can state to the House the tenour of the instructions agreed upon by Her Majesty's Government for the guidance of Sir Garnet Wolseley in South Africa in reference to terms of peace?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Sir, there is a considerable difference between the Question as it now stands on the Paper and the Question as put by the hon. and learned Member last evening. As I stated in the course of the discussion yesterday, I could not undertake to state precisely the terms of Sir Garnet Wolseley's instructions, but as to the tenour of those instructions we have no difficulty; and that tenour was indicated by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Colonies last night. The object of Her Majesty's Government, and the tenour of their instructions to Sir Garnet Wolseley, is to bring this war as speedily as possible to an honourable termination, consistently with the safety of the Colonies; and it will be an instruction to Sir Garnet Wolseley that he should examine and carefully consider any bond fide overtures of peace that may be received from the Zulu King. It is not the object of Her Majesty's Government, as has been more than once stated, to encourage any annexation or extension of territory; but to bring about a satisfactory peace, consistently, as I have just said, with the safety of the Colonies.

POOR LAW (IRELAND)—MONAGHAN BOARD OF GUARDIANS.—QUESTIONS.

MR. CALLAN asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland, Whether his attention has been called to certain proceedings at the Monaghan Board of Guardians on the 30th of April, May 7th and 21st, and the correspondence between Mr. MacAleese, the proprietor of the "People's Advocate," and the Local Government Board, Ireland, with reference to the exclusion of the reporter of that journal from the board room of the Monaghan Board of Guardians, whilst the other local Tory journals are admitted to report the proceedings thereat, and the refusal of a Mr. Jesse Lloyd to receive the following notice of motion:—

"I beg to give notice, that I will move on this day month, that the resolution passed by this Board on the 1st May 1878, excluding the representative of the 'People's Advocate' from the meetings, while the reporters of the other local papers are admitted, be rescinded, as unworthy of this or any other Board of Guardians in Ireland;"

whether it is in the power of a Board of Guardians, where meetings are open to the Press, nevertheless to admit only certain journals advocating Tory politics, and to exclude the representatives of a Liberal journal; if a chairman of a Board of Guardians can of himself refuse to receive a notice of motion admittedly legal, and within the rights of any individual guardian to propose, and so prevent the matter from being formally brought before the Board; and whether a clerk of the peace, who is the clerk to the magistrates, and from the nature of his office incapable of acting as a magistrate, is nevertheless legally qualified to act as an ex-officio Poor Law Guardian?

MR. NEWDEGATE: Before the right hon. Gentleman replies, I wish to put a Question, of which I have given private Notice, to the Chief Secretary. It is, Whether it is customary in Ireland that the Chief Secretary should decide whether the proceedings of each Board of Guardians shall be reported; and if so, whether it is customary that the Chief Secretary should decide whether the representatives of particular papers should be allowed facilities for doing so?

MR. CALLAN: I have put the Question to the right hon. Gentleman not as Chief Secretary for Ireland, but as ex-officio Chairman of the Local Government Board.

MR. J. LOWTHER: The hon. Member for Dundalk is, no doubt, quite correct in saying that his Question is addressed to me, not as Chief Secretary, but in the capacity of President of the Local Government Board. I had rather, however, not undertake at present to say how far I may be the proper authority in either capacity. As I only saw the Question this morning, perhaps the hon. Gentleman will kindly postpone it till a future day.

MR. CALLAN: I beg to give Notice that I will repeat my Question after the holidays.

THE ADMIRALTY—THE DIRECTOR OF NAVAL CONSTRUCTION.

QUESTION.

MR. D. JENKINS asked the First Lord of the Admiralty, If it is true, as stated in the "Pall Mall Gazette" of Friday last, that the Director of Naval Construction and a large portion of his staff are actually engaged within the walls of the Admiralty at Whitehall in designing plans for the construction of a powerful ironclad ship for the Argentine Confederation; and, if so, whether, considering the strained relations now existing between that republic and a neighbouring belligerent, such a proceeding is, if not a breach of neutrality, an unfriendly act towards a State with which we are on terms of amity?

LORD FRANCIS HERVEY: I rise to Order. This Question involves matter of argument which ought not to be introduced, and particularly as that argument bears prejudicially on the affairs of a State with whom we are on terms of friendship; and still more, especially as far as I am aware, there is not the slightest foundation for the statement involved.

MR. SPEAKER: I see no ground for interposing.

MR. W. H. SMITH: There is no truth in the story at all. It was contradicted by The Pall Mall Gazette itself yesterday or the day before.

Mr. Newdegate

CYPRUS—ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE—THE ORDINANCES.

QUESTION.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether he will lay upon the Table the Cyprus Ordinance of the present year, which enables the government of Cyprus to exile without trial any persons whatever?

MR. BOURKE: I stated a few days ago that all the Ordinances passed by the Government of Cyprus would be placed in the Library, and I shall be glad to carry out the promise in a short time. We have not got them all yet, and I do not think there is any necessity for making an exception in the case of the Ordinance alluded to by my hon. Friend. I cannot quite accept the description given by the hon. Baronet of the particular Ordinance to which he refers as one allowing the Government of Cyprus to "exile without trial any persons whatever." It gives power to the High Commissioner, with the consent of the Legislative Council, to pass a resolution stating that any person whose presence in that Island is likely, in their opinion, to be prejudicial to the good order or safety of the Island should not be allowed to reside there. That is the purport of the Ordinance in question, and it will, I hope, be in the Library in a few days.

GREECE—CYPRUS—FURTHER PAPERS.

QUESTIONS.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, On what day the Greek Papers will be in the hands of Members?

MR. BOURKE said, in the case of the Greek Papers, it had been found necessary to send some to Athens, others to Constantinople. It would also be necessary to send others to Paris, Vienna, and Rome, before they could be published. He hoped, however, they would be in the hands of hon. Members before long. He did not like to make any promise, but he hoped they would be distributed after the holidays. In regard to the further Papers relating to Cyprus, he had formally presented these that day, and they would be in the hands of hon. Members in a few days.

MR. MONK asked, Whether the Greek Papers would contain any despatches in reference to Crete, or whether any Papers relating to Crete might be expected?

MR. BOURKE replied that the Greek Papers did not contain any despatches relating to Crete. That subject had been treated by itself, and Papers were being prepared with regard to it. A Blue Book had already been published relating to Crete, and it was proposed to continue to keep the despatches respecting Crete separate from the Greek Papers.

EGYPT—THE FRENCH AND ENGLISH GOVERNMENTS.—QUESTION.

MR. OTWAY: I wish to ask the hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs a Question of which I have given him private Notice, Whether any communication has been received by Her Majesty's Government relating to the tone of an influential portion of the French Press, and especially of the newspapers intimately connected with the present Administration in France, towards Her Majesty's Government on account of their policy and proceedings in Egypt; and, whether there is anything in the present relations of the two Governments which justifies the hostile tone of those French journals, which are usually most friendly towards this country?

MR. BOURKE: I am sure my hon. Friend and the House will be glad to hear that there is nothing in the communications which have passed between the Government of France and the Government of England that can give grounds for the allegation that there is any difference whatever in the policy of the two Governments with respect to Egypt. We really know nothing of any of the alleged disagreements which have taken place.

MR. OTWAY: The hon. Gentleman has only answered a portion of my Question. He has left unanswered that part which asks whether any communications have been received by Her Majesty's Government relating to this matter?

MR. BOURKE: The hon. Gentleman is usually so fair in the Questions which he puts in regard to foreign affairs, that I should be very willing to give him all the information in my power. If, however, he alludes to communications which have been passing between Her Majesty's Government and our Ambassador at Paris, I am sure he will see that it would be impossible for me to give even the faintest idea of what those communications are about, as they are, of course, confidential. Therefore, in the present state of affairs, I do not think I can give him any more information than I have already given—namely, that there is no ground for the allegation that there is any substantial difference in the policy of the two Governments.

WELLINGTON COLLEGE—THE COMMISSION.—QUESTION.

In reply to Mr. J. R. YORKE,

MR. ASSHETON CROSS said, the Government were willing that the Commission which had been asked for by the House should be issued at once. The names were very nearly settled; but they had not yet been submitted to Her Majesty. There would be no further delay, and he hoped that immediately after the Recess the Commission would begin its labours.

TURKEY—CONSUL BLUNT'S REPORT. QUESTION.

LORD ELCHO asked, When Consul Blunt's long-promised Report would be laid on the Table of the House?

MR. BOURKE: The House is well aware that this Report has been prepared for many months, and is quite ready for presentation to Parliament; but that for reasons which it is not necessary I should enter into it has not been presented. Her Majesty's Government have no objection to present it; and I hope I shall be able after the holidays to tell my noble Friend that the Government have come to a decision on the subject.

PARLIAMENT—RULES AND PRACTICE OF THE HOUSE—THE CROSS BENCHES AND THE GALLERY.

QUESTION.

MR. C. BECKETT-DENISON rose to a point of Order, and said he would be glad if Mr. Speaker would settle a point affecting the convenience of a number of hon. Members who frequently sat on the cross-benches below the Bar. A few evenings ago, Mr. Speaker had ruled an hon. Member to be out of Order in attempting to address the House from those seats, on the ground that they were outside the House. He had it on the authority of some Members who had sat in the House for a great number of years that in former days there was one hon. Member who was in the habit of addressing the House from those seats, and that it was in the power of any hon. Member, if so minded, to address the House from any portion of the Gallery. He thought it would be for the convenience of the House generally if Mr. Speaker would state why those seats were debarred from privileges which belonged to other seats in the House?

MR. SPEAKER: I am unable to give any reason for the practice to which I referred the other day; but it has been the practice, so far as I am informed, that Members without the Bar—that is to say, on the other side of the Bar that passes across the House from one side to the other—cannot address the House from the seats referred to. It is open to Members to address the House from all other seats exclusively appropriated to the use of Members, including those in the Gallery.

SOUTH AFRICA—THE ZULU WAR— THE TRANSVAAL.—QUESTION.

MR. O'DONNELL: I wish to put a Question to the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Colonies of which I have given him private Notice. I desire to ask him, Whether he has received any official corroboration of the statement in the "Standard" of yesterday, that the Zulus have burned the grass in their country, thus rendering the advance of the Cavalry impossible. Also, if he has received any official corroboration of a statement in the correspondence of the "Times," that a portion of the Cavalry—the Dragoons—has been sent into the Transvaal for the purpose of overawing the Boers.

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH: A moment ago, I received from the door-keeper the Notice of the hon. Member's Question. I submit that that is not a sufficient Notice of a Question to be asked in this House. I have not seen the statements in the morning newspapers to which the hon. Member refers. I had other business to attend to which prevented me from reading the papers. My right hon. and gallant Friend the Secretary of State for War informs me that he believes Dragoons have been sent to Standerton, but I do not know for what reason. As to the other matter to which the hon. Member refers, I cannot give any information.

PARLIAMENT—PUBLIC BUSINESS— DOGS REGULATION (IRELAND) BILL.

QUESTION.

MAJOR NOLAN asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland, When the second reading of the Dogs Regulation (Ireland) Bill would be taken?

MR. J. LOWTHER: The hon. and gallant Gentleman appears very anxious to know when this Bill is to be proceeded with; but I am afraid I cannot tell him, because, of course, that will depend on the state of Business. I shall be glad to give him notice before the day is fixed.

SOUTH AFRICA—SIR BARTLE FRERE.

QUESTION.

MR. COURTNEY: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Colonies a Question of which I have given him no Notice whatever; but, perhaps, he may be able to answer it. I wish to know, Whether he can give us any information now as to the authenticity of a despatch of Sir Bartle Frere which was published more than a week ago in the "Standard;" and, if the despatch is in his possession, whether he will lay it on the Table?

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH: I have not yet received that despatch.

MOTION.

THE WHITSUNTIDE RECESS.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That this House, at its rising, do adjourn until Monday 9th June." — (Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer.)

SOUTH AFRICA—THE ZULU WAR.

OBSERVATIONS.

MR. SULLIVAN said, that as he wished to avoid the practice of conducting anything like a cross-examination of a Minister of the Crown at Question time, he did not follow up his Question, though the right hon. Gentleman, he must admit, had made an answer which, in a great degree, was satisfactory. But he rose now, as they were about to adjourn, to ask the Government to follow up—as he hoped the Government would—the exceedingly grateful and welcome announcement which was made near the close of their proceedings on the day before by the right hon. Baronet the Secretary of State for the Colonies, and which had been confirmed so far by the Chancellor of the Exchequer. The latter right hon. Gentleman dealt, however, with only these two points—that no annexation of territory was to be attempted in South Africa, and that there was a benevolent intention to end the war if Cetewayo made overtures for peace. He had no doubt in the world of that intention on the part of the Government. He did not believe that the Government were anxious to prolong this war for one day longer than they, in their policy, thought necessary; and it was to their policy that his Question had been directed. The real pith and substance of the Question had been put to the Government on the previous night by the right hon. Baronet the Member for Tamworth (Sir Robert Peel). Would the terms of peace imposed, or sought to be imposed, upon Cetewayo be such as to cause the war to be a protracted and bitter one, or a short war with a happy ending? They knew the terms of peace offered to Cetewayo before the invasion; and they now desired to know whether the circumstances of the moment warranted the Government in desiring to conclude peace on terms less exigent or more exigent than those that were put into Sir Bartle Frere's Ultimatum to Cetewayo? The Government must know the terms of peace which Sir Garnet Wolseley would be empowered to offer. Were they to be less or more severe than those which Cetewayo from first to last had from us? It was no use to say that they were ready to receive proposals for peace; that was merely a civil phrase, and amounted to nothing. What the country desired to know was whether the Government intended to put upon Cetewayo the same rude terms that drove him into the war; or would they give him a chance of coming in upon terms more nearly reflecting the spirit of that noble despatch which the Secretary of State for the Colonies wrote to Sir Bartle Frere condemnatory of his policy? If the papers were to be trusted, and if they could believe all they heard, it was almost too late, for Zululand had been again invaded by the Imperial Forces, who had waited and waited until they had a powerful and overwhelming strength at their command. During all these weeks the Zulu King seemed to have avoided retaliatory measures upon their Colonial Possessions. If he were animated by such bloodthirsty designs as would warrant the Government in that which was now about to be done, he had his opportunity of giving effect to them, but he had not availed himself of it. No; in his own rude, barbaric way, the man had been silently making an appeal to their chivalry and generosity, and there was that about to happen which would prevent him from suing for peace. Unless something was done they would be in the midst of scenes of carnage and bloodshed and the havoc of war, and they would find Cetewayo, if he were the brave man he took him to be, sealing his own lips and saying he would make no further offer to us. He urged the Government to make every effort to bring about a speedy peace, and not allow Cetewayo to say that when we were weak he allowed us to wait without attacking us, but when we were strong we invaded his country once more. The Government should not wait for the advent of Sir Garnet Wolseley in South Africa before they made an attempt to conclude peace, if that was their object. He made that appeal in no embittered spirit; but he would say that at the outset of the war it was intensely unjust, and now the time had arrived when the Government should terminate the struggle, and not bring disgrace upon the British flag by prolonging the war.

MR. KNATCHBULL-HÜGENSEN did not yield to anyone in the desire that such terms should be offered to the Zulu King as might lead to the termination of the war, on conditions consistent with the safety of our Colonists and compatible with that humanity which was as creditable to a great country as was the utmost display of bravery. At the same time, however, he was sensible of the great responsibility which rested upon anyone who spoke on that (the Opposition) side at the present moment. So far as Gentlemen on that side were concerned, they had reason to congratulate themselves on the outcome of recent events; because, a few months ago, they earnestly advocated the supersession of Sir Bartle Frere, and now the Government had superseded him. ["No!"] That was, they had deprived him of the power of doing what many feared he was about to do—namely, to carry on a war for objects which they did not believe to be legitimate objects. They ought, therefore, to be satisfied with that. It was now admitted that the policy which was sought to be pressed upon Cetewayo at first was not the policy which they were disposed to insist upon at present. The sending out of Sir Garnet Wolseley was, in his opinion, an event of very happy augury; and the Government would be worse than blind if they did not see that the country desired an end of the present state of things, so long as it could be brought about in a way compatible with the honour of the country, and less than that it would be impossible to accept. It was their policy and their wisdom to let the Government see what they desired to be done, and leave it to them to carry it out. And what was it they now wanted to gain? They desired that measures should be taken to secure as speedy and satisfactory a termination of the war as possible; and he was not sure that this object would be best secured by pressing the Government too much on the subject at the present moment. There were many occasions on which it was legitimate and right, as well as absolutely necessary, for the Opposition to press the Government; but, at a moment when the Government appeared to have come round to the Opposition policy, though only doing now what they ought to have done two months ago, it was rather for the Opposition to encourage them, and show a desire to afford them as much support as they legitimately could in carrying out that policy. He (Mr. Knatchbull-Hugessen) made it his principal complaint against the present Government, that although they were often right, they were generally right about two months too late. Just so it was with regard to the presentation of Papers on all these important subjects; the Government presented ample Papers, but they were almost always about two months too late to be serviceable for debates. The Opposition might argue that the step which the Government had now taken was as much as to say that they admitted that the conditions which were attempted to be imposed upon Cetewayo at the commencement of the war were not the conditions which they were disposed to insist upon now in sending out Sir Garnet Wolseley. For his own part, he should not have discountenanced the continuance of any discussion by which practical good was likely to be obtained; but, Members of the Opposition having already fully expressed their sentiments, it was now their policy and their wisdom to let the Government see that they desired to encourage them in carrying out the policy which they seemed now to have adopted, in the hope that under Sir Garnet Wolseley the past might in some measure be retrieved, and that we might soon see a speedy termination of the unhappy war in South Africa—a war which was begun without necessity, and in the conclusion of which the principles of magnanimity, generosity, and humanity ought to be allowed to have full weight.

SIR JULIAN GOLDSMID wished to explain, that in questioning the Government on this subject he did not desire in any way to find fault with the appointment of Sir Garnet Wolseley. On the contrary, he thought the only point was whether the Government ought not to have adopted that course many weeks ago. He desired, however, to ask again, though in a different form, the Question he put yesterday—whether Sir Garnet Wolseley, in accepting the office of High Commissioner and Commander-in-Chief in South Africa, would still remain High Commissioner of Cyprus; whether, in fact, he was to hold the two appointments simultaneously; or whether he was to be succeeded in Cyprus by Colonel Greaves? As Sir Bartle Frere also held the office of High Commissioner in South Africa, he wished to know what steps were being taken to prevent a conflict of authority between him and Sir Garnet Wolseley? Another point he desired to refer to. There was a wide-spread feeling that there had been much unnecessary discomfort, not to say unnecessary illness, amongst the troops who had already arrived in South Africa.

Mr. Knatchbull-Hugessen

It had been reported that 25 per cent of the men who had recently gone out there were laid up by disease; and if the Government were in a position to give the House any information on that subject, it would be gratefully received. If there was any truth in the statement, he trusted the Government would take prompt measures to supply the existing want both of doctors and medicines at the seat of war. He trusted also that Sir Garnet Wolseley would have authority to exercise his discretion in taking advantage of any opportunity for speedily terminating a war which could do us no honour, and which must bring grief and woe to many homes in England.

LORD ELCHO said, he thought the right hon. Member who formerly held the office of Under Secretary of State for the Colonies (Mr. Knatchbull-Hugessen) had rightly asked the House not to press the Government for details as to what it might be necessary to do at the Cape. Indeed, he thought it was unusual for an Executive possessed of the confidence of the country to be pressed to the extent to which Her Majesty's Government had been; and he (Lord Elcho) had noticed with satisfaction that his noble Friend the Leader of the Opposition was very careful when he spoke yesterday to avoid this fault, remarking that he only spoke upon the subject at all after the Government had themselves done so. Now, there could not be a doubt that this appointment of Sir Garnet Wolseley was a great change, and it had been received by the House and the country and the Press as a happy augury. He trusted that it might prove to be so. Sir Garnet Wolseley was a man of great administrative ability, with a sound military knowledge of strategy and tactics; and he (Lord Elcho) had no doubt that what ability, intelligence, and also kindliness of disposition could do to bring this war to a satisfactory termination would be done by that distinguished gentleman. He had the pleasure of Sir Garnet Wolseley's acquaintance—indeed, enjoyed his friendship, and he looked with great satisfaction upon his appointment. But he could not but couple this feeling of satisfaction with the feeling which naturally arose from the fact that this war had shown us that, without calling out our Reserves, we had, practically, no Army; and the appointment of Sir Garnet Wolseley looked very much as if, in the opinion of the authorities who were responsible for the safety of the State, we had but one General. He need not dwell on that further than to express a hope that what the nation expected from this appointment would be realized, and that there would be soon in South Africa a satisfactory and permanent settlement of the present unhappy state of affairs. But, while thus speaking, and while anxious to do justice to Sir Garnet Wolseley, he felt that but scant justice had been done to Sir Bartle Frere in speeches which had been made in that House, and in this matter he could not even except Her Majesty's Government. He had not the pleasure of Sir Bartle Frere's acquaintance—he had, indeed, only seen him once in his life—and, therefore, spoke entirely without any personal feeling, but solely according to the dictates of conscience. He thought that in the speeches made and the course taken with reference to Sir Bartle Frere, hon. Members did not sufficiently put themselves in the position of that gentleman when he was sent out to South Africa with the high powers which were conferred upon him by his commission—powers, be it remembered, of peace and war—powers which were not granted to an ordinary Colonial Governor, but which were given to him as High Commissioner. Hon. Members did not sufficiently put themselves in the position of a man who, well known for his humanity and for his negrophilism, if he might say so, in other parts of the world, found himself suddenly confronted with what, acting to the best of his judgment, he believed to be imminent danger to the Colonies for whose safety he was responsible. If we had had difficulties to contend with in that army of organized Zulus, what did that show? It showed how great the danger was; and the greater our difficulties the greater was the danger shown to be. That much was clear from the course of the war. They had heard a great deal of the extraordinary gallantry of that savage race. No one could speak of it too highly. He did not believe that our nation ever in its history encountered so physically brave a people as the Zulus. Indeed, if he could prophesy, he could confidently predict that the day would come—as certainly as this country would prosper and progress as a great Imperial Power —when the Zulu troops in the British Service would occupy the same position towards us in South Africa as the Sikhs and Goorkhas now did in India. Therefore, let it not be thought in anything he said about the Zulu Chief and his Army that he failed to appreciate their most remarkable physical qualities. But what was the character of King Cetewayo, who was in this House held up to their admiration? While listening to a speech lately made in “another place,” he happened to find himself standing by the side of a member of the Austrian Embassy, and said to him—“Why, they talk of this Zulu King, who is, practically, a gorilla, armed with guns and assegais, instead of fighting with his tail and claws, as if he were the Emperor of Austria.” [“Oh, oh!” “Withdraw!”] He (Lord Elcho) had nothing to be ashamed of, and he had nothing to withdraw, but he had a good deal to prove, or rather, wherewith to prove his statements. What had they on record? Why, that King Cetewayo was as cruel as he believed he was crafty; that he murdered, having first what he called smelt them out as guilty of witchcraft, all persons whose property he wished to get possession of; that he flayed men alive, covered them with honey, and, while they were still alive, planted them in ants’ nests. They had it from his hon. Friend opposite the Member for Chelsea (Sir Charles W. Dilke), that he killed his prisoners; and why? Because he had no prisons. His prison discipline, therefore, was of the simplest, and so was his poor law, for they read that the aged and infirm were buried alive. And now as to his troops. He said this with great reluctance; but he thought the time for plain speaking on that question had come. He gave the Zulus credit for their gallantry; but he had seen a letter which showed them the type of man they had to deal with in that country. He had seen a letter of which sheets and sheets were written in pencil after the battle of Isandlana, and the writer said that every soldier who fell was disembowelled; that the hands, feet, and heads of many were cut off; and that drummer boys were found with their hands tied behind their backs and hung up on meat hooks. This was the sort of King they had to deal with, such were his soldiers. Now, he ventured to think that our Colonists were entitled to be considered in this matter, and that Sir Bartle Frere, defending a long frontier with a fordable river adjoining a great Colony, ought not to have had such hard measure dealt out to him as he had received at some hands on account of the steps which he had found it necessary to take under a heavy weight of responsibility. Whenever he heard speeches in that House strongly taking the Zulu side and ignoring that of our Colonists, who were in danger from that sword of Damocles which was hanging over them, he was led to reflect thus—If for the Tugela, they read the Thames, and for Natal they read Chelsea; if for Zululand, they read Surrey, and if that condition of things existed on the other side of the Thames in the wilds of Wimbledon and the forests of Coombe Wood, which existed in Zululand, they would not have had such Motions made in the House as had been made by the hon. Member for Chelsea (Sir Charles W. Dilke); and the inhabitants of this side of the Thames would be only too thankful to any man of courage who took upon himself the responsibility of grappling with the danger and securing their safety. Passing, however, from that point, he would observe that they had heard from the Government what, generally speaking, the policy now to be pursued in South Africa was to be. [“No!”] He had said “generally speaking.” He had gathered from the reply of the Chancellor of the Exchequer that day that what the Government looked to, and what Sir Garnet Wolseley was supposed to be the most efficient instrument they could find for obtaining, was an honourable termination, consistently with the safety of the Colony, of the present war; that they were ready to receive any overtures from Cetewayo; and that they did not look to any addition of territory. All that he trusted was that Sir Garnet Wolseley would not go out too much fettered, either in his civil or military capacity, as to the measures which he might think it necessary to take to attain those objects—the safety of the Colony and a permanent peace. Annexation was a word which seemed to shock hon. Gentlemen; but he asked them for a moment to look at the map. He repeated, what he had often said, that if they could speak in the House as counsel upstairs did before a Committee on a

Lord Elcho

Railway Bill with maps before them, many things would not be said which were said on questions under discussion. He now held in his hand a map of South Africa. All the parts marked red were British territory, while a little yellow patch, not more than one-twentieth of the whole, was not British. Now, looking to the course of the world and of history, looking to what went on in America and the rest of the globe, did they believe it was physically possible that, sooner or later—he did not say now—the country so situated would not be annexed? [“Hear, hear!” from the Opposition.] He was glad to find that the strength of his argument was so readily admitted. As had happened in America, wherever a civilized Power came in contact with a barbarian Power, especially with one so dangerous and so armed and organized as this, the result must be, sooner or later, for the sake of peace and of humanity, the uncivilized Power must be absorbed by its civilized neighbour. He, for one, should not be surprised if it turned out, sooner or later, that in order to obtain the object which they all contemplated by the appointment of Sir Garnet Wolseley, it might be necessary even to annex the Zulu country. On the other hand, he had heard objections raised to what was called the establishment of fortified posts in that country. He happened at dinner lately to be seated by a French officer, who was one of the most intelligent and able men whom it had been his fortune to meet in the course of his life. The conversation naturally turned on what was uppermost in every man’s thoughts.

“It seems to me,” said this officer, “that your position in South Africa is very similar to what ours was in North Africa—in Algeria. We had Colonists there whom we were bound to defend, and they were constantly liable to inroads and fights with the Natives who, when beaten, retired. This went on for years and years, until the appointment of Marshal Randon, who said—‘If I am empowered to carry on this war and to make the Colony secure in the way which I believe to be the best, I engage that peace shall be maintained, and that the Tribes shall be no longer dangerous to our Colonists.’”

Well, the Marshal proceeded by making roads, and establishing fortified posts as he went on. He hoped that as far as these fortified posts were concerned, the hands of Sir Garnet Wolseley would not be tied, and that it would be open to him to take such military steps as might be necessary to secure the safety of the Colonists. He had no more to say than this. [“Hear, hear!” from the Opposition side below the Gangway.] Of course, he did not suppose that his views would meet the approval of a section of the Party opposite; but he had deemed it right, in justice to Sir Bartle Frere and in the interests of his country, to make the few observations he had done, and which, if no one had led the way, he would not have ventured to utter. He hoped we might see a permanent and satisfactory peace established. Hon. Gentlemen opposite, though they might dispute his argument and differ from him, would, he trusted, give him credit, at least, for this—that he was at heart not less humane than themselves. Equally with them he hated unnecessary war, and he could assure them that those who had suffered from war knew the sorrows and the miseries it produced. But he believed it to be essential, not only for the sake of humanity, but for the sake of civilization—for the sake of the Colonies, aye, and for the sake of the gallant savages who were now fighting against us—that the war which, sooner or later, was inevitable should be settled finally and in a permanent way. He also thought that, looking to the future and to the further organization and arming of these savages which, sooner or later, would have taken place, it was well for all concerned—for them, for us, and for our Colonists—that this war had come upon us sooner rather than later.

MR. GLADSTONE: I cannot allow the speech of my noble Friend to pass without remark. It appears to me that it is a speech which does not express the views entertained by the House in general or by hon. Members on the other side. I do not now at all complain of the words of kindness and consideration and honour in which my noble Friend spoke of Sir Bartle Frere. I think Sir Bartle Frere has been placed in a position of the greatest difficulty, and has the strongest claims upon our sympathy, as well as our generous regard. He was sent out to Africa at a time when, I fear, the seeds of this difficulty had already been sown by prior proceedings for which he was not responsible. He has had a task of the most arduous character to conduct; and certainly I, for one, have not been able to concur in all the opinions which he has formed upon a complicated state of facts; but I am confident that when Sir Bartle Frere returns to this country, or in whatever position of life he may be found, he will continue to draw to himself the admiration and regard of his fellow-countrymen. ["No, no!"] I must, at the same time, draw a distinction between my dissent from the particular opinions which he may have formed in a particular combination of affairs, and the views which I think we are bound to entertain towards a man who, in a long course of years, has occupied so honourable and distinguished a name in the service of the Crown. I must say that I hope hon. Members will not be disposed to widen unnecessarily the field of this debate. An appeal has been made by my right hon. Friend the Member for Sandwich (Mr. Knatchbull-Hugessen) to the House to refrain from pressing the Government for any particular declaration; and the hon. and learned Member for Louth, who commenced this debate, and with whose general views I, for one, very much concur, showed at once his sense that it was necessary that something should be said, and his desire to reduce to the lowest point compatible with his conscientious convictions any demand he made upon Her Majesty's Government for information. It is in the interest of the opinions of the hon. and learned Member for Louth that we should not press for information at this moment. Her Majesty's Government, whatever I or anyone else may think of their former proceedings, have to deal at present with a case of very great difficulty. They have made an important approximation towards the views generally entertained on this side of the House by the declaration they have made of their desire, at least, with regard to the annexation of Zululand. It may be—and I trust it will be—that in other respects they will find themselves nearer to the views of those who have disapproved of Sir Bartle Frere's policy than might at one time have been supposed. They have before them other questions than the question of annexation. They have before them the various subjects that were raised in the terms of the Ultimatum. They have before them those demands which what is called the public opinion of the Colony make—in my view of this question a most fallacious guide—that may be influenced either by mortification from the disaster they have sustained, or by exultation with the successes which followed. They have to consider, likewise, the difficulties in which they are placed in respect of the relations subsisting in the Transvaal territory; and, upon the whole, I do not feel I should discharge my duty to the country by pressing upon them for any declaration whatever, after the steps they have taken. What I hope is, that the speech of my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Louth, and that the general tone of this discussion, and the general tone of the House upon the whole subject, may incline them both to a course of mercy and of moderation. It is not necessary for us to follow my noble Friend who spoke last in discussing the character and proceedings of Cetewayo; but I think there are two observations which may be fairly made—that for cruelty, and for the aggravation of cruel customs existing in savage lands, no apology is to be made; but that, on the other hand, our main duty is to regard the conduct of this man in his relations with ourselves. If they have, on the whole, been such as to present a hopeful character, if his proceedings towards us admit of a fair and charitable construction, then, I think, we should hope that the savagery of his proceedings at home which, I am afraid, is in many particulars undoubted, may be mitigated hereafter by friendly intercourse with a Christian and a better instructed people; for I have little hope, I confess, of conquering evils of that kind by the infliction on his nation of the horrors of war. If it were a question of dealing with him individually, and punishing his crime upon his own person, then, indeed, I could understand the argument we have heard. The argument is, that the barbarous character and manners of this man have exhibited themselves in cruelty to the aged and infirm, and in the oppression—the bloody oppression—of his own subjects. If that be true, and, possibly, to some extent it may be true—it is surely an unfortunate inference that those subjects are to be made to bear all the cruel inflictions that war may bring upon them. I hope Her Majesty's Government will make note of this discussion as tending to confirm the tendency on their part that, while we would do nothing that would injure the safety of our Colonies, yet when that safety is secured, the more moderate and more merciful their views, the better they will meet the convictions and desires of their country. My belief is that we shall do a greater service to the cause of humanity by leaving this matter, than we possibly could by calling upon the Government now to make declarations which I feel it would be difficult for them to make, and by challenging them to promises that they will do things which they may well be inclined to do if they are reasonable, but in regard to which it may also be a fact that their declaration of that intention may be the greatest obstacle to carrying it out. For my part, I decline to put any pressure upon the indisposition of the Government to declare their views. My hopes and desires run earnestly and strongly in one direction, and I believe that to be the direction of the general opinion of the country; but I would not ask for an express declaration from Ministers at a time when I feel it is difficult for them, consistently with their duty, to lay such declarations before us.

Mr. Gladstone

MR. BAILLIE COCHRANE thought that his noble Friend, in saying things that would irritate the mind of the country at the time when Sir Garnet Wolseley had received his new appointment, had chosen an unfortunate moment for uttering his sentiments. From the brilliant abilities and great military character of Sir Garnet Wolseley, they might be perfectly confident that whatever military operations he would undertake would be carried on satisfactorily, and to the honour and glory of this country. He still thought it was the duty of the Government, at the earliest opportunity, to make peace; and he hoped that they would give no encouragement to any desire of revenge that some persons might feel with reference to the cruelties which had been inflicted on our men.

MR. CHAMBERLAIN said, that after what had fallen from the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Gladstone), he did not propose to continue the discussion any further. It would be in the recollection of the House that on Friday last he gave Notice of a Resolution which bore on the subject before the House, and he thought it would be convenient that, under the circumstances, he should state that, in his opinion, the terms of the Resolution had now become inapplicable to the situation, and he, therefore, proposed to remove it from the Order Book. He was glad to think that the greater part of the suggestions contained in that Resolution had been practically conceded by the Government. They had, in the strongest language, deprecated a war for revenge, or a war for the increase of territory, and had declared their intention to instruct Sir Garnet Wolseley, not merely to receive, but to entertain, any proposals that might be made for peace. There was only one point upon which the Government had not up to the present expressed their opinion. He did not press for an explanation; but he wished to point out to the Government that if they did not take care that Sir Garnet Wolseley was instructed not to insist on the full terms which were demanded by Sir Bartle Frere, then, most certainly, this country, against the wishes of the Government, against the wishes of Parliament, and against the wishes of the majority of the people of this country, would be drifted into that annexation against which they all so much protested. He trusted that care would be taken to prevent such a thing occurring.

SIR ROBERT PEEL said, he entirely agreed with what the hon. Member had just said; and he thought that after the declaration of the Government, which was of a character which must be satisfactory to the House and to the country, it would be idle to pursue the discussion any further. He thought the hon. and learned Member for Louth (Mr. Sullivan) ought to be satisfied with the conversation which had taken place, and with what had been said by the Government. As he stated yesterday, he rejoiced that the Government had taken the course they had done, and he thought it was an augury of a satisfactory solution of the question; but he must protest against one expression which fell from the right hon. Gentleman opposite with regard to Sir Bartle Frere. No doubt, he was a man of great social position and of great ability, and one who had done great services to the country; but, then, they must remember that in South Africa he had been a signal failure; and he was sure that if the Government had acted earlier in the matter, as they were wanted to do, and as they were now doing, a great deal of trouble and difficulty would have been obviated. The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Knatchbull-Hugessen) was always very ready to give credit to those who sat near him when anything good was done. But it was from below the Gangway, and not from the front Opposition Bench, that the question had been given in the present case; and when he heard hon. Gentlemen say they were glad to find that the Government had at length come round to their "views," he said that was not a fair way to look at the position. If hon. Gentlemen had read the Papers, as he and many others had read them, they would have seen that the policy of the Government from the beginning was contrary to that which Sir Bartle Frere had pressed upon them. Although he had been as vigorous as others in opposing the policy which had been pursued in South Africa, he had always maintained that it was a policy which was forced on the Government contrary to their wishes and their intentions, as indicated in the Blue Books in their hands. He would only add the further observation, that he most earnestly hoped that in sending out Sir Garnet Wolseley to South Africa, he was sent there with a message of peace. They read only that day that arrangements were made for sending 23,000 men into Zululand. God forbid that that should be done! When the right hon. Gentleman said he wanted to see the honour of the country maintained, he replied, so did they who had agitated on the question. The honour of the country was as dear to those who had resisted the aggression as to any hon. Gentleman on that Bench. But what they did want to see, where there was an enemy, with whom we had quarrelled, who sought our friendship, and who sought mercy at our hands, was, that now we should not refuse to him that mercy, but make with him those terms of peace which he was anxious to obtain—

"The quality of mercy is not strained;
It droppeth, as the gentle rain from heaven,
Upon the place beneath: it is twice blessed;
It blesseth him that gives, and him that takes."

He hoped that would be the principle which would guide Her Majesty's Government in dealing with the question. He hoped that with all the power of this country they would endeavour to make peace, and to show mercy to an enemy who had resisted, but against whom there was now such a formidable Force in the field; and he must warn the Government that if, in sending out Sir Garnet Wolseley to the Cape they intended to promote a system of aggression, the country would be as dissatisfied with Sir Garnet Wolseley as they had been with Sir Bartle Frere. He believed the intentions of the Government were other than those; and with that hope, and in that expectation, he looked forward to the prospect of an early peace and a satisfactory settlement of that grave and serious question.

MR. KNATCHBULL-HUGESSEN explained that what he had said was that the Government had come round to the policy of those who wished Sir Bartle Frere to be superseded, and he himself had spoken in the late debate to that effect, so that he had assumed nothing but what was, as regarded himself, strictly true.

MR. COURTNEY wished the Government to make some statement with regard to their intentions in respect to the Transvaal. Sir Garnet Wolseley was to go out to South Africa not merely as Governor of Natal, but also as Governor of the Transvaal, and was to supersede both Sir Henry Bulwer and Colonel Lanyon; and he thought it would be satisfactory to the House, if some statement was made with regard to the instructions which were to be given to the High Commissioner with respect to the Transvaal. He thought the conduct of the Boers had been worthy of respect and consideration. A good deal had been made out of the camp at Pretoria; but really the camp at Pretoria was nothing more than an unmistakable demonstration against the annexation of their territory, and the Boers had carefully refrained from adding to our embarrassments when we were at war with the Zulus. He complained that notwithstanding this action on the part of the Boers, and their friendly reception of Sir Bartle Frere, the moment his back was turned a battery was sent into their territory to overawe them. It would be extremely satisfactory if the Chancellor of the Exchequer would give the House some assurance of a general character that the attitude of the Government towards them was not one of determination to retain, against all resistance, any power of supremacy which had been obtained, in the first place, through fraud, and which had since been maintained by force.

Sir Robert Peel

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Sir, with reference to what has fallen from the hon. Member for Liskeard (Mr. Courtney), I can only say that, at the present time, we are waiting for, and expecting, a communication from Sir Bartle Frere, which will give us fuller information as to the proceedings that took place at Pretoria. We have, to a certain extent, that information, having received it in a telegraphic form; but we shall receive fuller information from the Memorial which we understand has been drawn up and given to the High Commissioner to forward. With regard to the stories which have appeared in the newspapers as to a Force having been sent into the Transvaal for the purpose of overawing the Boers, we are only informed that a party of Dragoons has been ordered into that part of the Colony, but for what purpose is not stated, and it would, therefore, be premature to express any opinion as to the rumours which are floating about. Whenever a communication is received—which, I have no doubt, will be very shortly—Her Majesty's Government will take it very fairly and fully into consideration, and will give the necessary instructions to Sir Garnet Wolseley with regard to it. I do not think this is a convenient opportunity for raising a discussion on that large question. With regard to the conversation which has taken place to-day, though there have been expressions used and opinions stated which I regret, yet I am not disposed to take exception to the general tone of the discussion. But I hope I may be excused from entering, on the part of the Government, as largely and freely into this question as some hon. Members have felt themselves able to do; because it must be borne in mind that the Government are, in this matter, under very heavy and serious responsibility. What we may say is one thing; but we have to consider both the effect of what we may say and the effect of what we may do, not only in this country, but in the Colonies and in the large regions for which we are responsible. And bearing in mind how very complicated the circumstances of the case are, and how many considerations must be taken into account, I feel that the tone of the House generally has been the true and right

one. But whilst hon. Members are anxious to express their opinions, and to put before the Government the considerations which they think ought to weigh with us, they would not desire to force us into declarations which may be embarrassing from their minuteness, or which may impede, possibly, the very objects which we all desire to bring about. I have noticed a certain inclination in different parts of the House to credit the Government with a new policy. I am bound to say that I do not admit the justice of the observations which have been made, nor that any step which the Government have resolved upon taking offers any concession whatever, or any departure whatever, from the line of policy which we have hitherto pursued. Under the circumstances of the case, as they at present present themselves, we have thought it right to take a particular step, which we believe to be a right and wise step, and the motives for which we have explained in the few words which I addressed to the House yesterday, when I stated that it was necessary to concentrate the civil and military powers of the different authorities in a single hand, and it was important and desirable to take the opportunity of Sir Garnet Wolseley going out to South Africa to give him full and confidential, and fresh instructions as to the policy which Her Majesty's Government desired to pursue. What is that policy? We have explained from the beginning it is not one of annexation; neither is it one of what might be called revenge.

Message to attend the Lords Commissioners;—

The House went;—and being returned;—

Mr. SPEAKER reported the Royal Assent to several Bills.

THE WHITSUNTIDE RECESS.

Question again proposed, "That this House, at its rising, do adjourn until Monday 9th June."

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I have but a very few words with which to detain the House. What I was saying was this—that the policy of Her Majesty's Government with regard to South Africa had neither been a policy of annexation, nor certainly a policy of anything that could be called revenge. It was a policy the main object of which was directed to the establishment of secure and satisfactory relations for Her Majesty's Colonies in that part of the world. We have to consider the position of those who occupy the territories under the Sovereignty of the Queen. We have to consider what arrangements ought to be made in order to promote the welfare of those Colonists, and preserving peace between them and their neighbours. Now, it is quite obvious that for that purpose it is important we should be — and should appear to be — strong and powerful ourselves, so as to maintain satisfactory relations with our Native neighbours. These are the relations we desire to promote, and we earnestly hope we shall be successful in their establishment. I do not think it would be at all likely to promote that object that we should attempt too tightly to tie the hands of a man like Sir Garnet Wolseley, who goes out with all his experience of the country, with a thorough knowledge of the spirit which animates the Government, who possesses sympathy with that spirit, and who has an earnest desire to do all that he can not only to bring the war to any early conclusion, but to bring about a satisfactory settlement which may be of an enduring character. We are anxious in every possible way to promote that; and I trust the result of the step we take will be an end of the war, and that the Colonies will enter upon a state of peace, of which they have had but little experience.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE thought that if the House was quite satisfied that the reasons given by the Government for their change of front in their Zulu policy were the exact opposite of their real reasons, they would be very well contented with what had been done. When he had brought forward his Motion, some time since, he pointed out that the Government having censured Sir Bartle Frere ought to remove him from his post, which they at that time refused to do, and stated that he continued to have their confidence. But now they had taken a step which was tantamount to removing him, and the reason they gave was that it was necessary to concentrate the command. But, as a matter of fact, there would be no concentration of command at all; for just as Sir Bartle Frere was High Commissioner, so Sir Garnet Wolseley would be High Commissioner now, in a portion, but not the whole of South Africa, and Sir Garnet Wolseley would hold the supreme command in that part just the same as Sir Bartle Frere did before. It would now be necessary to cancel the commission which was given to Sir Bartle Frere, because the powers given by that commission were obviously the powers that would in future be exercised by Sir Garnet Wolseley. They must, therefore, accept the action of the Government as a change of front in policy, whatever reasons they might put forward for the change. With regard to the speech made by the noble Lord (Lord Elcho) he was very sorry, indeed, to hear such statements made, which, he feared, were calculated to stir up an ill feeling in the country, and to prevent that peace which all so much desired. He also wished to state that the stories which he gave to the House with regard to Cetewayo—and notably that in which he was stated to have covered his prisoners with honey and put them in an ant's nest—had no foundation, and there was not the slightest scrap of evidence to support them. He strongly deprecated such statements being made.

MR. RYLANDS said, he could not help feeling that the House and the country should know on what grounds the Government were going to act, or what they were doing. It was quite evident to hon. Gentlemen in the House that the sending of Sir Garnet Wolseley into South Africa was not simply to concentrate the command—that was put forward as a specious reason. They knew there was a much graver and more pressing reason on the minds of the Government, and the point which he wished to press on the Secretary of State for the Colonies was this. Was it intended that the powers conferred on Sir Bartle Frere by his commission should continue so as to overlap and conflict with those given to Sir Garnet Wolseley? [The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER: No.] He was glad to hear that, and therefore he presumed the House would be justified in assuming that the powers given to Sir Garnet Wolseley would be supreme, and would reduce those given to Sir Bartle Frere; but he should like an explicit statement on the question.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer

GENERAL SIR GEORGE BALFOUR said, he rose to speak in defence of an absent man. In his opinion, he was a most ill-used man. He had been sent out to act in circumstances of considerable difficulty, and when he had done his best in those circumstances he was visited with censure. He called upon the hon. Baronet the Member for Chelsea to say whether there were in the instructions given to Sir Bartle Frere nothing to vindicate his action in Africa? He thought he had been treated most unjustly. The Government, whose policy was distinctly annexational in the time of the Earl of Carnarvon, had given him very large instructions, and though Sir Bartle Frere had not exceeded those instructions, the Government had now left him in the lurch. His conduct being disapproved of by the Government, it would have been merciful, kindly, yea only honest, to have recalled him at first, instead of throwing him overboard in the way they were doing now into the humbler position of mere Governor of the Cape.

MR. PARNELL gave Notice that in consequence of the withdrawal of the Motion of the hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Chamberlain), he would use all the Forms of the House against any further Votes of Supply for the Zulu War until the Government had submitted to the House the terms on which Cetewayo would be admitted to peace.

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH : I should not have thought of detaining the House for a moment if it had not been for the remarks which fell from the hon. and gallant Member opposite (Sir George Balfour). He appears to me to be under an entire misconception as to the action of the Government with reference to Sir Bartle Frere. He spoke of him having been thrown over and dismissed with disgrace. Nothing whatever of the sort has occurred, or is intended. The whole course of this debate and that of yesterday shows, I venture to say, the great disadvantage of attempting to discuss a question without the Papers relating to that question. Had the hon. Member for Burnley (Mr. Rylands) only waited till he had seen the terms of the commissions which are drawn up, and will be issued at once, he would have seen that the functions of Sir Bartle Frere and Sir Garnet Wolseley are distinctly defined, those of Sir

Bartle Frere having to do with one district of the country and those of Sir Garnet Wolseley with another, and that neither will interfere with the conduct of affairs by the other. I was glad—and I am sure the House also was glad—to hear the expressions of sympathy which fell from the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich with reference to Sir Bartle Frere. He has borne eloquent testimony—such testimony as, perhaps, he alone could bear—to the abilities and character of Sir Bartle Frere and to his conduct amid difficulties which were almost unprecedented in the history of any Colonial Government. But I will venture to say for myself that neither in this House nor out of it have I ever for a moment hesitated to bear similar testimony to the utmost of my power. It has been asked what the position of Sir Bartle Frere will be on the arrival of Sir Garnet Wolseley in South Africa? His position will be similar to that occupied by previous Governors and High Commissioners of the highest standing. It is further asked, Why is it necessary to make this change? It is very easy for hon. Members opposite to assume certain reasons, which exist only in their own imaginations, and not to credit the Government with a belief in the reasons they themselves put forward; but the real reason for the change is precisely what was announced to the House in the course of yesterday's discussion by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and no other. The reason is this—that it is necessary, under the present circumstances, to unite in the hands of a single person the functions of civil and military administration in that district of South Africa which is in the neighbourhood of the seat of war; and that is utterly impossible for anyone holding the position of High Commissioner in South Africa at the present crisis to conduct affairs in the district, and, at the same time, to deal with the important matters with which he must deal at Cape Town. It is very well known to the House that for months past Sir Bartle Frere has been absent from the scene of his ordinary labours at Cape Town. During that time questions have arisen connected with the Cape Colony and its borders of the very gravest importance to this country and the Colony. I may refer to one—the settlement of the question now pending between the Government of Cape Colony and this country as to the expenses of the late war. I may refer to another—the position of the Province of Griqualand West in relation to the Cape Colony. Again, there is the question how the valuable Acts passed by the Cape Parliament for the defence of the Colony in the last Session can best be carried out. In connection with all these measures the co-operation, and even the direction, of Sir Bartle Frere are absolutely required by the Ministers of the Cape Colony. But beyond and above all this is the great question of the Confederation or Union of the several Colonies or Territories in South Africa that Sir Bartle Frere was specially sent to endeavour to promote, to which he has devoted singular and special attention, and which he will be instructed at once to bring before the Cape Parliament when it commences its Session next month. These are all matters of the gravest and highest importance to the interests of South Africa and this country, and are amply sufficient to tax the energies of any one man, even though he possess the abilities of Sir Bartle Frere; and I will venture to add that if hon. Members will consult their maps, as they have been advised to do by the noble Lord (Lord Elcho), and bear in mind that Cape Town is 1,000 miles from the seat of war, the extreme difficulty and delay of any postal communication, the impossibility of conducting serious affairs solely by electric telegraph, and the great distance even of the nearest point of the telegraph from the seat of war, they will see that it has become absolutely necessary for a time to divide this great office, and give that portion of it covering the seat of war to a new head, and into the hands of a single person. These are the reasons for the course taken by Her Majesty's Government, and they will be still more fully expressed in the Papers, which I hope will be in the hands of hon. Members on Thursday or Friday morning. The terms of the commissions will be included in those Papers; and if any further question or discussion should arise on them the Government will be prepared to meet it.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: I must say that there is not one single reason among those which the right hon. Gentleman has now stated for the course the Government has taken which did not exist in full force two months ago, when the hon. Baronet the Member for Chelsea brought his Motion forward. The right hon. Gentleman says that Cape Town is 1,000 miles from the seat of war. Why, it was 1,000 miles away two months ago. He says the telegraph is not adequate to carry on detailed communications; but the telegraph communication is not less adequate now than it was then. You knew that you had to send out reinforcements; that you were going to enter on a campaign; that Sir Bartle Frere must meet his Parliament at the Cape, and conduct all these transactions with reference to Confederation; and really for the Secretary of State for the Colonies to get up gravely now, and tell us these things—every single one of which was in their minds and in full force two months ago, when we had the debate on the hon. Baronet the Member for Chelsea's Motion, when the Secretary of State himself told us that no man except Sir Bartle Frere, from his knowledge of the circumstances, whatever errors he might have committed, could conduct these affairs successfully—is, I think, presuming too much on the patience of this House. It is also, I think, calculated to have a prejudicial effect on the public mind, which the Government should deplore. I venture to say that the reason why both sides of the House and the country outside approve of the course the Government have taken is for a totally different reason from any of those stated by the Secretary of State for the Colonies. The reason why the House and the country approve of that course is because they believe and hope that Sir Garnet Wolseley will carry out the policy of Her Majesty's Government in a very different spirit from that in which it was carried out by Sir Bartle Frere. It is the real cause of the satisfaction with the change; and what possible object the Secretary of State for the Colonies can have in destroying that expectation, that hope, and that conviction in the public mind, by putting the reason for the course they have pursued on a totally different basis, I cannot understand. If the country has really to take his account of the matter, they would derive small satisfaction from it. It is because they thought that the alleged reasons were not true—that the true reasons were totally different—that the course taken by the Government has given satisfaction. Therefore, I do regret that the Secretary of State for the Colonies should have thought it right to give such reasons. It may be all very well to set up this theory for their action, for the sake of Lord Chelmsford or Sir Bartle Frere; but it is not from that point of view that the change is regarded with satisfaction, but because the people believed that Sir Bartle Frere was pursuing—honourably and conscientiously no doubt—a policy which the Government did not desire, and which the country did not desire. That is the reason they are glad to see it placed in different hands; and to tell us that it is merely a matter of concentration of power is unsatisfactory. I think it a great pity, when the Government come forward to announce a determination of this character, that they should not have had all the Papers ready and delivered them to the House at the time. We see that continuous Cabinet meetings have been held, and I cannot see why they should not have had these important Papers ready to deliver. All I can add is, that I hope the real reasons actuating the Government in making this change in the affairs at the Cape are not the reasons which they have alleged; because if they are, I believe they will have destroyed the whole satisfaction which the country has felt.

Sir Michael Hicks-Beach

[The subject then dropped.]

AGRICULTURAL DEPRESSION IN IRELAND.—OBSERVATIONS.

MR. O'DONNELL said, he was pleased with the frank but tardy conduct of the front Opposition Benches, in at length acting upon the policy so long since advocated by the seven Irish Home Rule Members. If the Government could not, within the ordinary time available for Public Business, give an opportunity for the discussion of urgent Irish subjects, they should reduce the Whitsuntide Holidays in order to afford the necessary time for that purpose. Much of the time of the House had been taken up by discussions provoked by the innumerable blunders of the Government. He rose for the purpose of calling attention to the deplorable and unendurable condition of the landed interest in Ireland. It was impossible that agriculture could be developed in Ireland—that Irish tenants could put that labour, skill, and capital into the land upon which the flourishing state of agriculture depended, so long as insecurity of tenure hung over the head of the tenant. The present system was a premium in favour of sloth and negligence, and an obstacle to diligence and the advance of every kind of prosperity. Two hundred and ninety landlords owned one-third of the Island, and 744 owned about half; and the question was, was the prosperity, or the chance of a livelihood, of 1,000,000 homesteads to depend upon a small battalion of 750 persons, monopolizing half the land—750, with their sisters, and their cousins, and their aunts, in comparison with the entire population of Ireland? The Land Bill of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich (Mr. Gladstone) was a monument of the good intentions of the right hon. Gentleman rather than of the capacity of English Parties to deal with Irish questions. If Irish tenants were to continue to be subject to the evils of capricious eviction, to the screwing up of rents beyond the point of endurance, to confiscation of improvements—if that was to continue much longer, Parliament would have to solve a greater problem than that which startled them a few years ago, when the whisper of liberty reached Ireland from the other side of the Atlantic. He should move an Amendment to the Motion for adjournment to the effect that the adjournment be only till June 2nd, instead of till June 9th. He did not know whether those who were devoted to Irish legislation would present such attractions to English Members as to induce them to give up the enjoyments of the country in order to take part in Irish discussions; but he was sure that the majority of the popular Irish Members would be quite prepared to take full advantage of any extra time that might be given to them for the consideration of Irish Business. If the English Members absented themselves, it would only be carrying out the policy they generally pursued. They usually absented themselves from the discussion of Irish Business, and presented themselves only when it was necessary to vote down Irish demands. If during the extra week, which he proposed to give for the discussion of indispensable Irish Business, the English Members absented themselves from the Divisions, as well as the discussions, he was not sure that it would not be hailed as a long-desired improvement. If the Government were not prepared to grant them the House next week, he hoped they would grant them time for the discussion of two or three of the most pressing Irish grievances which demanded a remedy. By attempting to postpone the redress of Irish grievances—particularly the unendurable evils of the Irish tenant system—they would not succeed in avoiding or evading the energetic prosecution of those questions by the Irish Representatives in Parliament. He concluded by moving his Amendment.

MR. JUSTIN MCCARTHY, in seconding the Amendment, said, he had not the slightest desire to interfere with the holidays of hon. Members; but he thought it would not be right that the House should separate for the Whitsuntide Recess without some words being spoken as to the question which was most important to the Irish people. They had been occupied three hours in discussing the foreign policy of the Government. Not a moment of that time was wasted. It was most properly given up to that great subject. He only regretted that it had not been possible to extract more clearly the genuine intentions of the Government with regard to South Africa. But that time having been occupied fairly, it was not too much to ask the House to give a few minutes' consideration to a question of the greatest importance to Ireland. Think of how little importance to Ireland, except for the loss it entailed in men and money, was this war with its doubtful glory! Let them, therefore, turn their attention to the Land Question in Ireland. He knew there was a theory that when war was going on the attention of the Government was absorbed in it, and that it was almost impossible to withdraw their attention to matters of domestic interest. But even if they accepted that ancient theory with regard to the great Leaders of the Government, it could not be held that the heads of the various Departments were equally absorbed. He could not imagine that the Chief Secretary for Ireland was passing anxious days and feverish nights turning over the maps of South Africa to find a policy for his Chief. He had very little doubt that were the Chief Secretary provided with a mission to South Africa, he might with his blandishments tempt Cetewayo over very soon to good terms of peace; but he had no such mission, and it was not too much to expect that even amid the clash of arms the right hon. Gentleman should be able to give a little of his attention to Ireland. The Chief Secretary had an able Colleague in the Irish Attorney General, who was officially free to take only an historic interest in these great wars, and who might find some time to bestow on the Irish Land Question. He was perfectly certain that the distress in Ireland had become so great as to render an attempt by Parliament to deal with the question imperative and unavoidable. They heard from farmers, priests, and peasants alike, that the crisis was imminent, urgent, even perilous. He was speaking the other day with an Irish landlord on the Conservative side of the House, who assured him that he had never known a season so bad for many of the Irish tenants. He told him that he had written to his agent only to press for rents from the men who really could pay, and to be lenient with those who could not, and that the agent wrote back to say that none were able to pay, and that they were all sufferers alike. That was a condition of things representative of the Land Question in at least one or two counties in Ireland, and surely it was one which ought to attract attention from the House of Commons. One or two Motions had been introduced during the Session which seemed to point to some promise. There was the debate on the Motion of the hon. Member for Reading (Mr. Shaw Lefevre) on the "Bright Clauses" of the Land Act. They had a flat denial of assistance from the Chief Secretary for Ireland, and then a liberal promise from the Chancellor of the Exchequer. Now, the Irish Members would like to know before the House separated whether anything was going to be done—whether any efforts were to be made to improve the condition of the tenantry of Ireland; or whether the only contribution the Chief Secretary was about to offer was his piece of legislation for the regulation of dogs in Ireland? That Bill rather reminded him of an amusing passage in the pleasant story of Alice in Wonderland, where some one of the mysterious personages found Alice weary, and tired, and gasping with thirst, and said to her—"Oh, you poor little girl, I know exactly what you want—you want a dry biscuit." That was the kind of contribution which the Chief Secretary had made to the settlement of the Irish Land Question. He appealed to the House not to go away for the Holidays until the Government had made some promise and given some assurance with regard to the Irish Land Question. He hoped he would not be met with the stereotyped excuse that such an appeal was interfering with the Business of the House. Nothing could be more legitimately or more urgently the Business of the House than that the Government should give some assurance to the Irish peasantry which might send them a gleam of hope, and let them know even when Parliament was not sitting there, yet that some thought would be taken of their condition, and that some effort was about to be made to improve their future.

Mr. O'Donnell

Amendment proposed, to leave out "9th," in order to insert "2nd,"—(Mr. O'Donnell,)—instead thereof.

Question proposed, "That '9th' stand part of the Question."

MR. O'CONNOR POWER supported the Amendment, and expressed a hope that some Member of the Government would answer the two able speeches that had just been delivered. When a majority of the Representatives of a nation came solemnly before the Legislature to make a proposal, it was their duty to urge the proposal in and out of season, at convenient and inconvenient times, and to select especially those occasions on which they were likely to attract the attention of the country. This was the position of the Irish Members in that House with regard to the Land Question. He complained that there had been a want of candour on the part of the Government in appointing a Committee on the subject of the Irish Land Laws the Session before last. After that Committee had been at the trouble of investigating the subject, and coming down to the House with distinct recommendations, the Government had taken no pains whatever to carry out those recommendations. They had even failed to give any satisfactory promise that they intended to carry them out. Again, when a private Irish Member had this Session presented a Bill to secure fixity of tenure, it had been received with but scant courtesy from the Government. How long did they think the Irish people would submit to have their grievances postponed for the convenience of the Government? The patience of the Irish people was well nigh exhausted; and if Parliament did not come forward within a reasonable time with some measure of legislation calculated to relieve the depression of the present state of agriculture in Ireland, scenes would arise in Ireland that would be far more dangerous to the rights of property and to the order and tranquillity which should prevail in that country than any that Ireland had been afflicted with in her long struggle with the ignorance, if not the incompetence, of the English Parliament. If these warnings were unheeded, and Parliament should plead for further delay, the consequences must be fixed on their own shoulders.

MR. SULLIVAN said, there could be no doubt that there was alarming distress amidst the agricultural interests not only of Ireland but of Great Britain, and was sure that when the case was fairly and reasonably presented to hon. Members they would feel that, however serious might be the state of matters in Afghanistan and South Africa, they ought to turn from those places to the interests of Great Britain and Ireland. An hypothetical advantage might be gained from this country making another sweep of territory in South Africa, a territory which they could not colonize, but precious land at their own door was at that moment being thrown upon the hands of landlords, because tenants were not able to cultivate it. He would neither express, nor join in expressing, any wholesale indictment against the landlords of Ireland. They fell, in his opinion, far short in many respects; but he had never failed to admit that in their errors and shortcomings they might be the creation and the creatures of circumstances, and that they possessed a great many excellent qualities which were not always remembered. When he looked at the English newspapers, what was the story which he read on every hand? It was a story of farms, untenanted and arable, to be let; but, at the same time, and more important in its significance, and certainly very commendable to the English landlords, it was a story of reductions of rents on the part of those gentlemen. It was with extreme pleasure he observed that amongst the first of the English landlords who had adopted this kindly, humane, and just course of procedure, was the first Commoner of England, who had the proud privilege of presiding over the deliberations of the House of Commons. But let them cross the Channel to Ireland, and did they there see a similar line of conduct to that of the English landlords as a palliative to the fast prevailing distress? He was bound to say that he saw nothing like it. There might be a solitary instance or two where the example had been followed; but there was no attempt on the part of the body of Irish landlords to imitate the English landlords in this particular matter. It was not from any intention to play the part of Shylock that this state of matters arose; but an evil tradition prevailed in Ireland, whereas a kindly custom prevailed in England. The tradition, as regarded Ireland, was that the distress was all pretended; and in England the landlord felt that the tenant was part of himself. He entered quickly into his sympathies, and he provided for him when the necessity arose. In the depth of the Irish Famine, when it was already eight or ten months old, that Famine in which 1,000,000 souls were lost, the hon. Member for North Warwickshire (Mr. Newdegate), who was not a hard-hearted gentleman by any means, absolutely declared at a farmers' dinner in England that the cry of famine in Ireland in 1847 was a pretence of agitators. The hon. Member laughed at it. He scoffed at it, and there was a considerable misleading of public opinion on the subject. There was yet sufficient time on the part of the Legislature to take preventative measures and to grapple with the evil. He maintained that the House owed a great deal to the Irish agricultural interests, and that Great Britain had never repaid in money, or in money's worth, what was due by it upon a fair balance to Ireland when England adopted Free Trade. England adopted Free Trade because the manufacturing element was predominant in her councils; and the agricultural interests of Ireland were sacrificed to what was rightly believed to be the general interest of the time. England was a manufacturing country, and it was her right to have Free Trade; but the agricultural Ireland was destroyed for the moment by that measure, which meant the sweeping away of thousands of acres, and which involved the destruction of thousands of Irish farmers, and the enforced emigration of thousands of the Irish peasantry. At the period of which he spoke it would only have been a just act on the part of England to have compensated Ireland with, at least, £20,000,000, £30,000,000, £40,000,000, or £50,000,000. Parliament would be forced to deal with the question of what was to become of the agricultural interests of the country. He recollected the present Prime Minister achieving one of his greatest triumphs by moving a Resolution as to the necessity of considering distress which prevailed amongst those interests; and he hoped that on the present occasion the country Gentlemen in the House would, irrespective of Party, agree to unite in impressing upon the Government the desirability of affording an assurance that, on the re-assembling of the House after the Holidays, an opportunity would be given for considering the position of the Irish and the British farmer—in other words, that an hour would be taken from the Antipodes to consider the exigencies of our position at home.

Mr. CHAPLIN said, he had listened with respectful attention to the Notice of Motion given by the hon. Member for Meath (Mr. Parnell), because the condition of agriculture, both in this country as well as in Ireland, was that of the gravest depression, and there was no doubt they were justified in saying that the depression was of such a character that it deserved the attention of the Government. What, however, he wished to point out was that he did not think any practical result could be found by pressing the Motion on that occasion; because he had placed a Motion on the Paper to inquire into the condition of agricultural affairs in the whole of the United Kingdom and Ireland. After the Motion for the adjournment of the House was carried, a ballot would take place, and he hoped to be successful, and secure a day after the Whitsuntide Recess; but if he did not, he fully intended to ask the Government if it would not be in their power to afford him facilities for bringing forward a subject of such vital importance to a large portion of the population, not only of England and Scotland, but also of Ireland?

Mr. Sullivan

MR. PARNELL said, he knew from experience that great agricultural distress prevailed in Ireland. He was talking the other day with a collector of the cess tax, who told him that he had never had such great difficulty since 1847 in getting money from the farmers. Owing to the great depression, and to the competition of the American market in corn, meal, and butter, the profits of the farmer had gone down considerably, and he knew that both the graziers and the small farmers experienced the greatest difficulty in making both ends meet. He believed that even on fairly-rented properties, it was a necessity for the tenant to have such security of tenure as would develop to the fullest the capabilities of the soil. Ireland at present was not more than one-third cultivated as it ought to be, and even its cultivated lands ought to produce three times as much as they did. It was necessary for the House to consider how best to devise a measure for the protection of the industry and exertions of the tenant—a measure of protection for the value which he added to the land; and he had no hesitation in saying that they must be prepared to adopt an exceptional measure of land reform for Ireland, as compared with England. He would not prolong the discussion on that occasion; but, unless the Government were ready to afford some opportunities for the consideration of this subject after Whitsuntide, and unless they intended, at all events, to do something in the direction of the recommendations of the Select Committee that sat upon the matter last Session, under the Presidency of the hon. Member for Reading (Mr. Shaw Lefevre), the question was one which would have to be taken up by the Irish Members in a firm and determined fashion. It was one which deeply affected their constituencies; and even if they were disposed to hang back a little on the subject, the constituencies would not allow them.

MR. MITCHELL HENRY thought the Irish Representatives were entitled to know whether Her Majesty's Government were prepared to adhere to the declaration which was made by the Chief Secretary during the last debate on this subject—That any proposal calculated to give the Irish tenant security in his holding was a measure which might be called a measure of confiscation and of Communism? He had listened to a great many debates on the Land Question in that House. He had heard a great many unfavourable replies from Governments on both sides; but he had never listened to language which had produced a greater sense and feeling alike of consternation and of anger throughout Ireland than that of the right hon. Gentleman. It was only natural that his hon. Friend (Mr. O'Donnell) should ask for some declaration on the subject before the House adjourned for the Holidays. He was glad to find that the Motion of which the hon. Member for Mid-Lincolnshire (Mr. Chaplin) had given Notice would include the case of Irish agricultural depression; but he warned the Government against the way in which they appeared to be treating the question. Did Her Majesty's Ministers suppose that the interests of good government in this country, or the Business of the House of Commons, would be promoted by their obstinately preserving a contemptuous silence on the matter? The Irish Members were in earnest on the question. They knew their own minds upon it; and they were backed by 5,000,000 of people across the water. They were determined to vindicate their rights, by quiet and orderly means if possible; but they were prepared, if need be, to resort to all the means which the House had put into their hands in order to bring before the Legislature and the country the great interests which they were sent there to represent.

MR. J. LOWTHER said, the hon. Gentleman had complained that Her Majesty's Government viewed with non-chalance the distress which existed among the agricultural classes in Ireland. If the sentiments evoked in the breasts of the Government were those of non-chalance, it, at any rate showed that they were not too thin-skinned with respect to expressions which hon. Members made use of about their individuality. He did not complain of the plain-speaking in which the hon. Gentleman had indulged, and must claim a similar privilege himself, and say that he must adhere to anything that he had said standing in that place on former occasions; but that in nothing which he or any of his Colleagues had said had they ever expressed any want of sympathy with the depression which he admitted to exist in the agriculture of Ireland. He was glad, however, to think that that depression, although undoubted, was neither so prevalent nor so acute as the depression at present existing in other parts of the United Kingdom. He thought that the hon. Member for Mid-Lincolnshire (Mr. Chaplin) had done good service in drawing the attention of the House to the fact that the Motion which he proposed to bring forward would deal not merely with an isolated branch of a great subject, but would deal with the entire question in all its bearings. That Motion would afford a legitimate opportunity for the expression of opinion on the part of hon. Members representing all sections of the United Kingdom. In the course of the debate, allusion had been made to the landlords of Ireland as not having been so generous as the landlords of England in regard to agricultural depression; but it was the fact that great personal sacrifices had been made by many of them in their efforts to relieve the present distress. In justice to the landlords of Ireland, he had thought it right to say so much. He trusted the House would not disperse for the Recess in the spirit of the hon. Member for Galway, or with any idea in their minds that the landed distress in Ireland was viewed with unconcern by Her Majesty's Government, who had every desire to see what could be done to remedy it.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

Resolved, That this House, at its rising, do adjourn until Monday 9th June.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

EAST INDIA LOAN [CONSOLIDATED FUND].—REPORT.

Resolution [May 26] reported.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL remarked, that the first stage of this Resolution was taken very late last night, and was passed pro forma on the understanding that the subject should be discussed at a later stage, and that the present stage should be taken at a reasonable hour. There were many Members who exceedingly objected to the course which the Government proposed to take in the matter; and, therefore, if the present stage was to be also regarded as only a matter of form, he hoped that a full opportunity for discussion would be given at a later stage.

Mr. J. Lowther

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, a full opportunity would be given; but it was desired to take that stage in order that the Bill might be printed. The hon. Member for Hackney (Mr. Fawcett) had just given Notice of an Amendment on the second reading, which would, no doubt, raise a discussion.

MR. FAWCETT regarded the present stage as purely formal.

Resolution agreed to.

Bill ordered to be brought in by Mr. RAIKES, Mr. EDWARD STANHOPE, and Mr. CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER.

METROPOLIS (LITTLE CORAM STREET, BLOOMSBURY, WELLS STREET, POPULAR, AND GREAT PETER STREET, WESTMINSTER) IMPROVEMENT PROVISIONAL ORDERS CONFIRMATION BILL [Lords].—[BILL 176.]

Bill considered in Committee and reported, with an Amendment.

On Motion, "That the Bill, as amended, be considered upon Tuesday 10th June, at Two of the clock."

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE objected that this was the first intimation which the Government had given of their intention to take a Morning Sitting on that day.

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON said, that the Morning Sittings had been taken at as early an hour in former Sessions, and the Government only followed their usual precedent.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL said, that considering the great difficulty in getting through the Business of the House, he was in favour of really setting to work in the mornings. As at present arranged, when so-called Morning Sittings were taken, the House did not sit longer than otherwise—they sat 2 to 7 instead of 4 to 9—the only effect being to steal, as it were, the evenings given to Private Members, and to enable hon. Members to go to dinner who did not come back again, and so very frequently the time after 9 was also lost to private Members. He proposed that the Bills mentioned be considered at 11 o'clock on Tuesday, 10th June.

MR. SPEAKER: It is not competent for the hon. Member to move an Amendment of that character.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE withdrew his opposition to the Morning Sitting in question, on the understanding that the Morning Sittings would be regular, and would thus put an end to the present uncertainty.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, it was proposed to take Morning Sittings on Tuesdays after Whitsuntide, and it would also be then convenient to commence Business at a quarter-past 4, instead of half-past.

Motion agreed to.

HYPOTHEC ABOLITION (SCOTLAND) BILL.—[BILL 119.]

(Mr. Vans Agnew, Mr. Baillie Hamilton, Sir George Douglas, Colonel Alexander.)

CONSIDERATION.

Order for Consideration, as amended, read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill, as amended, be now taken into Consideration."—(Mr. Vans Agnew.)

MR. BAILLIE COCHRANE opposed the Motion, remarking that he was sorry to offer any opposition to the majority of the Scotch Members; but his action was certainly not in opposition to the majority of the Scotch tenants. He had hoped that the Scotch Members would have thought better of it, and would not have persevered with a measure which affected the whole rights of property. He would not waste the time of the House by repeating the arguments which were manifestly against the Bill. His hon. Friend (Mr. Vans Agnew) said that the law, as it at present stood, gave the landlord greater protection than all the other creditors. Of course it did. The land during the lease was, in point of fact, made over to the tenant to do very much as he liked with, and the landlord ought to have prior claim for his rent over the tradesman who supplied the farmer with manure or with food and clothing. He much regretted that the Government had given their support to this Bill, and he trusted that even at that stage it would not be pressed.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL also thought it very undesirable that a Bill of this kind should be hurried through the House without that full discussion which hitherto it had not received. Hitherto he had taken a somewhat neutral position on this question; but he must protest against the assertion that there was a universal feeling in Scotland in favour of this Bill. His doubts were not in the interest of landlords, and in that he did not share the feeling of the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Baillie Cochrane); but he thought the opinions of the Scottish people were not so unanimous as had been represented. The fact was, that although there had been, doubtless, a considerable agitation and a very strong feeling on the part of an influential class of large farmers in support of the Bill, the remainder of the population were inactive, not understanding the nature, effect, or scope of the Bill, and thus not actually opposed to it. The constituency he represented was, of course, an urban constituency; but although they had been told that the passing of this Bill would be favourable to those who traded with farmers, he had failed to discover any enthusiasm in that constituency on the subject. He felt that those who had a practical knowledge of the matter would be more likely to understand it than he who had spent great part of his life away from Scotland; and if he had believed that any strong feeling existed in favour of the Bill, he might support it in deference to that feeling. Personally, as a matter of principle—and he had occasion to consider the matter narrowly—he did see great objection to the Bill as it now stood. He believed that if the measure passed in its present unqualified shape, it would render it exceedingly difficult to conduct necessary contracts between landlords and tenants, and especially in the case of the smaller tenants; and it was in the interest of the latter class that he asked that full consideration should be given to the subject. It must naturally result from the passing of this Bill that not only the larger rural hypothec, but the smaller hypothec and the urban hypothec, and also the Law of Distress in England, must be abolished. He was convinced that it was necessary to cut the Law of Hypothec down to the narrowest limits; but if it were totally abolished, it would be illogical to retain the principle in any other form in any part of the Kingdom. It seemed to him, as the noble Lord (Lord Elcho) stated on a former occasion, that the conduct of the Government in the matter was open to the gravest suspicion, and that it was clearly the result of the prospect of the contest in Mid-Lothian. The Government could not honestly support the Bill, unless they were also prepared to support the proposition to abolish the Law of Distress in England and Ireland, and to abolish urban hypothec. He had consulted one of his constituents—a large grain merchant—who was likely to be well informed on the subject. That gentleman said to him—"You ought to support the Hypothec Bill." He replied—"That's all very well; but which is the Bill you would like me to support, because I could not approve of the abolition of hypothec without any restriction whatever?" The grain merchant said—"You are perfectly right; and he would be a fool who would propose simply to abolish the present hypothec, without something to take its place." That principle was universal in old countries, and also prevailed in new ones—America, for instance, and he doubted whether they could get rid of it.

MR. VANS AGNEW thought it unnecessary that he should now meet arguments which had been already used and discussed. Those arguments had, in fact, been thoroughly thrashed out, not only this Session, but in previous Sessions; but in reply to the hon. Members for the Isle of Wight and Kirkcaldy, who said there was not a consensus of opinion on this point in Scotland, he would remind them of the Division which took place four years ago, when, out of 45 Scotch Members, 42 were in favour of the abolition of hypothec. Again, the second reading of the present Bill was carried by a majority of 127, and out of 49 Scotch Members who voted, 47 were in favour of the second reading. He thought that was a complete answer to those who said it was not the wish of the Scotch constituencies that this Bill should pass; and he was very sorry that a Bill which was so thoroughly wished for in Scotland should be opposed by hon. Members who either represented or came from Scotland.

MR. J. W. BARCLAY said, he could not understand the views of the hon. Member for Kirkcaldy (Sir George Campbell), and must express his regret that the hon. Member had been so long out of the country, and had not had the benefit of the discussion on hypothec which had been going on for the last 20 years. He hoped the hon. Gentleman would not require another 20 years to convert him on the question. As regarded the views of the smaller farmers, the hon. Member might safely leave that matter to the representatives of small farmers. The whole of the county Members, with one exception, had agreed that in the interest of the smaller farmers, as well as in that of the larger, hypothec ought to be abolished. With regard to the consideration of the question in the meantime, he hoped the Government, or their legal Representative in Scotland, would put Amendments on the Paper which would really deal with the somewhat difficult legal questions involved in this Bill. When the measure was in Committee he thought it went rather quickly through, and that the House had not proper time to consider it; for he doubted whether the legal Representative of the Government had, at the time, fully realized the effect of the Bill as it then passed. He thought even the hon. Member (Mr. Vans Agnew), who had charge of the Bill, did not at that time fully comprehend what would be the effect of his measure. He hoped, and thought, the House had a right to expect on such a question the legal Representative of the Government should become responsible for the amendment of the existing law, in order to carry out the intention of the House, without the risk of involving the country in great legal difficulties after the Bill became law. If the right hon. and learned Gentleman was prepared to become responsible for the Amendments which appeared on the Paper, he had no objection to the Bill going through after admission on the question, whether Clause 2 stood part of the Bill, upon which he felt compelled to take the opinion of the House.

Sir George Campbell

MR. ERNEST NOEL moved the adjournment of the debate. It was impossible at that hour to go into all the considerations imported into the Bill by the Amendments which had been put down. They did not know how the Government were going to deal with these Amendments; and until they knew that, it would be quite impossible for them to consider the Bill properly.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Debate be now adjourned."
—(Mr. Ernest Noel.)

MR. CHARLEY considered that after the principle of the Bill had been settled on the second reading, and the details of it in Committee, it was very hard, indeed, upon those in charge of the Bill that it should be stopped in this manner.

MR. GREGORY expressed an opinion that the Bill would place the tenant in a worse position than before. Instead of giving the landlord a remedy by distress, it gave him a remedy by ejectment; and it was, practically, an invitation to the landlord to put this extreme remedy in force.

SIR JOSEPH M'KENNA was urging that the alterations which had been made in the Bill had rendered it as much a measure of pains and penalties as a measure of relief, when—

It being 10 minutes before Seven of the clock, the Debate stood adjourned till this day.

House adjourned at Five minutes before Seven o'clock, till Monday the 9th of June.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Thursday, 29th May, 1879.

MINUTES.]—PUBLIC BILLS—First Reading—Metropolitan Public Carriage Act Amendment * (105).

Second Reading—Supply of Drink on Credit * (84).

Committee—Children's Dangerous Performances (64).

Committee—Report—Parliamentary Burghs (Scotland) * (90).

Report—Disqualification by Medical Relief * (6).
Third Reading—Habitual Drunkards * (93); Statute Law Revision (Ireland) * (80), and passed.

CONTAGIOUS DISEASES (ANIMALS) ACT, 1878—AMERICAN PIGS.

QUESTION.

THE EARL OF BELMORE asked the noble Duke the Lord President of the Council, Whether it is true that swine landed in this country from America have been found to be affected with trichinosis; and, if so, whether the Government intend to take any precautions against the introduction of the disease?

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND AND GORDON: In answer to my noble Friend, I have to state that in consequence of reports which I received from abroad, a certain portion of swine landed from America in this country were subjected, by my order, to examination by the proper officers of the Veterinary Department, and I regret to say that the result has been the discovery of trichinosis in some of the animals. The investigations are being continued, and therefore I am unable to state what steps, if any, it may be necessary to take in the matter. I would remind my noble Friend that swine coming from America are killed at the port of landing. I am glad that my noble Friend has put the Question, because it enables me to caution the public in the matter, and to mention that the best precaution against the spread of this complaint—so dire in its effects upon the human species—is that all portions of the swine—ham, pork, and bacon—should be thoroughly well cooked before they are made use of.

OMNIBUS REGULATION BILL—(No. 41.)

(The Earl of Redesdale.)

COMMITTEE ON RE-COMMITMENT POST- PONED.

THE EARL OF REDESDALE (CHAIRMAN of COMMITTEES) stated that he proposed to postpone the Committee on the Bill till after the Holidays.

LORD ABERDARE suggested that, instead of embracing a great number of regulations in a Bill, it would be better to give the local authorities power to make rules for the regulation of omnibus traffic.

EARL BEAUCHAMP said, that would involve the consideration of a number of local Acts. The Bill now before them dealt with the Metropolis, and the question was whether the Home Secretary could not embody certain regulations in those which at present existed, to effect the object of the Bill? He had himself brought in a Bill dealing with the omnibus traffic in the Metropolis.

Committee put off to Tuesday the 17th of June next.

CHILDREN'S DANGEROUS PERFORMANCES BILL [H.L.]—(No. 64.)

(The Earl De La Warr.)

COMMITTEE POSTPONED.

House in Committee (according to Order).

LORD ABERDARE said, that he had no objection to the main principle of the Bill; but he wished to point out that all legislation of this sort which interfered with labour had been preceded by careful inquiry into the conditions under which that labour was carried on. After that inquiry, they could legislate with a full knowledge of the facts. He should have preferred that that had been done in this case. He was not, however, prepared to object to the future progress of the Bill; but he would suggest that though the House had, perhaps, sufficient materials for legislation on the subject, the Government ought to so far take charge of the Bill as to put such Amendments on the Paper as would change the Bill to the form it ought to assume.

EARL BEAUCHAMP said, that it would be throwing great responsibility upon the Government if they were required to take charge of and amend every Bill introduced by a noble Lord. He did not approve of the proposed legislation; but as the House had manifested a strong disposition in favour of it, he had offered no opposition to the second reading of the Bill on the part of the Government. At the same time, he stated that if it were to pass it must be considerably amended in Committee. He did not, however, think it was fair to put upon the Government the responsibility of introducing Amendments which would make this a satisfactory Bill. The evils attendant upon children being engaged in performances of this kind against their will were admitted, although the Bill might not thoroughly deal with all the matters relating to the subject.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY thought that in making a Bill of that kind what it ought to be, the Government ought to guide the House. The Government ought to take one of two courses—if the Bill, in their opinion, was not capable of improvement, they ought to move its rejection; if it was, on the other hand, capable of being amended, they ought to propose the necessary Amendments.

Earl Beauchamp

EARL DE LA WARR said, as the Government had accepted the principle of the Bill, he should be glad to consider any Amendments proposed by them.

THE EARL OF BEACONSFIELD suggested that his noble Friend who had charge of the Bill (Earl De La Warr) would do well to postpone further proceeding with the Bill till after the Holidays; and, in the meanwhile, his noble Friend could be well occupied in revising the measure and framing in it such Amendments as he might think desirable.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY had a personal interest in hoping that the noble Earl (Earl De La Warr) would carefully consider Amendments. The Bill, as it stood, put very considerable penalties and severe responsibilities upon the owner of a circus. Now, every Easter Monday a great number of people came into his neighbourhood, and a circus was erected in one of his fields; and, therefore, he was the owner of that circus, though he must venture to decline to be either responsible for the age of the children employed in the circus, or the performances in which they were engaged.

EARL DE LA WARR said, he would accept the suggestion of the noble Earl at the head of the Government.

THE EARL OF SHAFTESBURY said, that the Bill did not touch some of the worst cruelty practised on young athletes and acrobats—namely, that which they underwent during their training.

House resumed.

To be again in Committee on Tuesday the 17th of June next.

TURKEY—CRETE—REPORTED DISTURBANCES.

QUESTION. OBSERVATIONS.

LORD COLCHESTER asked the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, If Her Majesty's Government have any information as to the truth of the reported disturbances in the Island of Crete? Since he gave Notice of his Question, he had seen, by the usual sources of information, that Papers had been promised in "another place" relative to the affairs of Crete, since the termination of the Correspondence now before Parliament. In asking at that moment what foundation existed for the statements in some of the public journals concerning a serious, if partial, insurrection against the order of things now established in Crete, an order of things which that Correspondence gave some hope would be at length accepted by the people of that long-distracted Island, he trusted that the noble Marquess (the Marquess of Salisbury) might be able to state that they were either wholly or in a great measure incorrect, and had no other foundation than those partial disorders which, perhaps, could not at once be expected to disappear. He hoped that it might be so, not only for the sake of the tranquillity of Crete, or of the importance which it derived from its geographical position with regard to the interests of the Powers of Europe in the Mediterranean; but because it was the ground on which the first essay was being carried on of the reformed organization proposed to be carried out in other Provinces of European Turkey, and its success or failure in Crete could hardly fail to be taken as an augury of the prospects of similar reform elsewhere. Those of their Lordships who had at all followed this subject would remember that the Constitution established after the revolt and civil war of 1867-8, though offering many of the elements of good government, failed to command confidence and produce contentment—partly, perhaps, because it was not fully carried out, partly because it gave a share in the General Assembly to the Christian majority which, though far from insignificant, fell short of that to which they thought that their numbers entitled them, and which was requisite to protect their interests. Then, it appeared from the Papers before their Lordships that after that conflict and bloodshed of which the Island was the scene during the last year, the indefatigable exertions of the British Agents, and particularly of Consul Sandwith, seemed to have brought about the acceptance on both parts of a reformed organization, securing the essential liberties of both creeds and racés, and giving a decided predominance to the Christian majority in the representation of the Island, while insuring a full and generous recognition to the Mussulman minority, a recognition important not only for their due protection, but because an organization that overlooked the rights of the most warlike and hitherto dominant part of the population could hardly be lasting in itself, nor be accepted by the Porte in good faith. The Native Mussulmans, indeed, seemed, as it were, not altogether satisfied. Consul Sandwith, who stated that, observed in the same letter (November 4, 1878) that the great bulk of the Christians were well contented with the present arrangement, provided it were guaranteed by Her Majesty's Government that it should henceforth be a more difficult task for Greek committees to stir up the Island to a fresh revolt, and that if time were allowed for the growth of material prosperity, the motives impelling to revolution would gradually cease. Unfortunately, some discontent appeared to have arisen from the change of intention relative to the appointment of a Governor. The Christians had desired that Costaki Pasha, who had previously discharged his functions to the satisfaction of all parties, might be allowed to remain as the first Vali under the new system; but they were well contented by the appointment of Caratheodori Pasha. This appointment, however, was suddenly cancelled, and the substitution of Photiades Pasha, who ultimately was appointed to the office, seemed to have caused much distrust and dissatisfaction. It was evident that any person intrusted by the Turkish Government with the working of the new organization must have a difficult task, seeing that not only the reality, but the appearance, of any injustice or want of fidelity in executing what had been promised might have disastrous consequences; and it was to be hoped that no such imprudence would mar the prospect of better things which seemed at last secured to the Cretan people. Some of their Lordships might have noticed that the supposed seat of disorder was said to be the district of Sphakia, a report which, if true, was in one sense a hopeful sign, as the position of that district was altogether peculiar. Claiming certain special privileges, it stood to the rest of Crete somewhat as Crete had stood to the rest of the Empire, unwilling to be absorbed in a general organization as the Cretans were to accept for themselves a share in the Constitution set up by Midhat Pasha. He hoped they might hear from the noble Marquess that the tranquillity of the Island under its organic statute was not seriously menaced, though the smouldering fires of antagonism and animosity engendered by long years, partly of mis-rule and partly of anarchy, could not altogether be extinguished in a moment even by a reform so full of promise for the future as the one now granted appeared to be.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: My Lords, I received yesterday a despatch from Consul Sandwith, whom my noble Friend (Lord Colchester) has mentioned in terms of just commendation, and there was nothing in the language he used to lead me to believe that any disturbances were going on in Crete. My information does not confirm the statement of my noble Friend that there is any want of confidence felt in the new Governor, Photiades Pasha. There is no doubt the people were at first a little disappointed at the sudden change, when Caratheodori Pasha was summoned to be Foreign Minister at Constantinople; but they have not shown any want of trust in the present Governor, who is a man of distinction, has served in high diplomatic posts, and is very highly valued by his Christian fellow-subjects. There have been some differences of opinion. My noble Friend has alluded to the discontent of the people at Sphakia. Their discontent is a species of Home Rule feeling; they want the capital to be in their district, and the capital is really somewhere else; and that was a grievance which at one time they were much inclined to make a subject of armed resistance, but happily they were influenced by better counsels. There has also been some difference of opinion with the Porte upon a subject which I am sorry to say gives a great deal of perplexity and trouble to the Porte at the present moment—I mean the subject of finance. There was a promise on the part of the Porte that certain customs and revenues should be paid to the people of Crete, and orders arrived from Constantinople that the accumulated result of those revenues should be duly paid over; but when they came to examine into the matter, somehow it turned out there was no accumulation at all, and no one exactly knows what has become of the money. That circumstance produced a little embarrassment and discontent. The real truth is that this is a very warlike population, amongst whom there have been disturbances for many years. There are causes of deep-seated animosity, owing to the long contest between Mussulmans and Christians, and what is wanted in the Island is a very strong and effective gendarmerie to keep order. Unfortunately, this strong and effective gendarmerie requires money for its sustenance. It is true the Albanians have refused to serve, or give their valuable assistance, and the result is that undoubtedly there are some occasional crimes of violence committed which may be very easily exaggerated and treated as popular disorders; but anything indicating discontent on the part of the people with the Constitution recently granted, as far as my information goes, does not exist.

CRIMINAL LAW — EXECUTION OF CATHERINE CHURCHILL AT TAUNTON—ADMISSION OF THE PRESS.

QUESTION. OBSERVATIONS.

LORD HOUGHTON asked, Whether permission to be present at the intramural execution of Catherine Churchill in Taunton Prison on Monday the 26th of May was refused to all reporters and other persons than the officials of the prison? In doing so, he would ask their Lordships to remember that though the removal of the place of execution from Tyburn Gate to the outside of Newgate was effected solely by the authority of the Secretary of State, yet when he suggested many years ago to Sir James Graham that executions should take place inside the walls of the gaols, that distinguished statesman said that it was a matter of such importance as to seriously affect the question of punishment by death, and he would not meddle with it except under the authority of an Act of Parliament. The public mind became similarly impressed, and an Act was passed authorizing intramural executions in 1868; but, at the same time, precautions were taken that there should be an element of publicity about them for the purpose of properly bringing so awful an occurrence fully before the public mind, and a promise was given by its promoters that though, if it passed, executions would no longer occur in public places, they would be public in the best sense of the word. Now, he submitted that that promise ought to be invariably fulfilled, so that the public should know that the solemn act of the law had been properly carried out. He thought that executions thus regulated had been very successful and productive of great moral results, and it would appear that the people were contented with the alteration in the law, the scenes of violence and confusion which once existed having been abolished. Therefore, he was very anxious that nothing should be done to cause any bad feeling against the change which had taken place; but, at the same time, he feared that a most obnoxious effect would be produced on the public mind if the practice were continued of excluding persons from witnessing the manner in which an execution had been carried out, as had taken place in the case under notice. He had read statements of bad management on the part of some persons at executions; and, therefore, he thought that everything should be public, so that the people might know what had taken place within the walls. Besides, during the last year or two, prisons had been transferred to the jurisdiction of the Home Office; and it was possible that less attention would be paid to these matters, now that the authority of the Visiting Justices had been reduced. No doubt, executions were carried out under the jurisdiction of the High Sheriff of the county or the Sheriff of the town, as the case might be. In the present case the power of exclusion was exercised by the High Sheriff himself, and, therefore, the Home Office, as such, could not be considered as responsible for any malfeasance or fault in the matter; but still it raised the important question as to the transference of the whole of the authority of the Visiting Justices to the Home Office; and it might be well that at all executions a public reporter should be present, because, in the event of any horrible mishap occurring, the facts would be sure to come out even if they were not present, and might appear in an exaggerated form, and a great deal of injury might result. Another point to be considered in connection with this question was, that a Commission in France had reported in favour of public executions being conducted in accordance with the present English system; and, no doubt, attention in France would be drawn to this subject, and any scandal occurring here with regard to intramural executions might extend beyond the Channel. His wish was that nothing should be done or said to damage the law which was at present in force, and under which there had been great success through its admirable working.

Lord Colchester

EARL BEAUCHAMP said, he was not in a position to answer the Question precisely; but he could give the noble Lord some general information with respect to the subject. The Act of Parliament now in force received the Royal Assent 11 years ago that day; but the noble Lord did not seem to be fully aware of the provisions of it. It provided that executions should be within the walls of a prison, and that the Sheriff, chaplain, gaoler, surgeon, and other officers of the prison should be present. Those persons were compelled by the law to be the official witnesses of the execution; and their presence, therefore, was an adequate guarantee of the judgment of the law being carried out. The Act also provided that the Justices of the Peace within whose jurisdiction an execution took place, should be permitted to be present, and power was given to the Sheriff to, admit such other persons as he might think proper to be present. Under the Act of 1868 the whole of the responsibility in this respect was, therefore, thrown on the High Sheriff and the Visiting Justices. By the new Prisons Act the powers of the Visiting Justices were transferred to the Home Secretary; but as the local authorities must have better means of knowing what was advisable in particular cases, the Home Secretary had thought fit not to make any regulations in respect of admissions to executions, but to leave the matter in the hands of the High Sheriff. Therefore, when the Prisons Act was passed, it was thought desirable to make the High Sheriff responsible. Due publication was given to the carrying out of the law by the holding of the Coroner's inquest, and careful provision was made in that regard by the Act of 1868, so that he thought that ample facilities existed for securing publicity to the fact that the judgment of the law had been solemnly executed. He had no information as to the particular case referred to by the noble Lord, but assumed that the High Sheriff had exercised his discretion in a proper manner.

EARL FORTESCUE said, that it was generally understood that the object of making executions private was that the public might be spared disgusting and sensational details in connection with them, and that object would be defeated if reporters were allowed to be present at them. His understanding was that the publicity requisite for establishing the fact that the execution had been properly carried out was already provided for by the presence of a certain number of prison officials, and a Coroner's inquest to be held afterwards on the body; and he could not help thinking that in the case of the Taunton execution the High Sheriff of Somersetshire had exercised a wise discretion in excluding reporters, and he hoped that the example would be followed by other High Sheriffs. He would remind their Lordships that, owing to the reading of a very graphic description of an execution—that of Peace—a party of children had actually in play recently hanged one of their own playfellows. Looking at the precautions adopted for the carrying out of the sentences, the more private, therefore, the executions were, the better.

LORD HOUGHTON said, he still remained in the opinion that it was of the utmost importance that there should be persons present at these executions other than the mere prison officials. While executions might be private, they ought not to be secret, and his belief was there was a danger of their becoming so.

METROPOLITAN PUBLIC CARRIAGE ACT AMENDMENT BILL [H.L.]

A Bill to amend the Metropolitan Public Carriage Act, 1869—Was presented by The LORD STEWARD; read 1^a. (No. 105.)

House adjourned at Six o'clock, till
To-morrow, Eleven o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Friday, 30th May, 1879.

MINUTES.]—PUBLIC BILLS—Second Reading—Hares (Ireland) (89); Local Government (Ireland) Provisional Orders (Waterford, &c.)*

Earl Beauchamp

(91); Public Health (Scotland) Provisional Order (Bothwell)* (92); West India Loans* (85); Convention (Ireland) Act Repeal (77). Third Reading—Disqualification by Medical Relief* (6), and passed.

ARMY — ARMY ORGANIZATION — THE COMMITTEE.

QUESTION. OBSERVATIONS.

LORD TRURO, in rising to put a Question to the Government of which he had given private Notice, said, that the recent military embarrassments, which had been succeeded by severe Parliamentary criticism, had led the Government to deem it expedient to consent to appoint a Committee to inquire into the constitution of the Army. There were various opinions as to this step, and what had given rise to it. There were those who thought that this arose from carrying out the resolution or arrangements of the noble Viscount (Viscount Cardwell), and that the course pursued by him had in some degree led to the passing of so many young soldiers into the Reserve. What was the Reserve? It was the reservoir to receive the overflow of the Royal Army; but the noble Viscount had placed his overflow pipe at the bottom instead of the top. But what he (Lord Truro) wanted to address himself to was the constitution of this Committee, a matter which was not at all unimportant. He should like to know whether it was to be so composed as to hold out not the hope only, but the assurance of success? Would the constitution of this military Committee give that guarantee? Those who had read the names of the noble and gallant Generals who had been selected to serve on that Committee would recognize their claims to respect; but at this time it required something more than military minds to deal with this question. From early training, and from long-continued habit and associations, military men were unable to free themselves from prejudice; and it would, therefore, be difficult for them to examine into the present system without civilian aid. If the Committee failed to fulfil the purpose for which it was appointed, and left the Army in its present condition, he could not help thinking that the country would blame the Government for not introducing a civilian element into the Committee.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR: My Lords, I was unwilling to interrupt the noble Lord; but I must remind him that he has been guilty of a gross irregularity. A Committee which had been appointed had framed certain Resolutions, which some time ago received the sanction of your Lordships' House; and one of those Resolutions was that although a Question of which private Notice only was given might be asked if the subject were not one that would lead to discussion, yet that if it were likely to lead to discussion Notice of the Question should be put on the Paper. The object of that, no doubt, was that all noble Lords who took an interest in the subject might have an opportunity of hearing what was said, and of taking part in the discussion. The noble Lord has introduced a topic, in the form of a Question, which, perhaps, of all others, is calculated to interest a large number of the Members of your Lordships' House, and lead to discussion; and I, therefore, trust that your Lordships will allow me to enter my protest against the irregularity.

LORD TRURO said, he must plead frankly guilty of the error for which the noble and learned Earl had reprimanded him. He was not aware, however, when he rose, that he was transgressing any of their Lordships' Rules.

HARES (IRELAND) BILL.

(The Viscount Massereene.)

(NO. 89.) SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

VISCOUNT MASSEREENE, in moving that the Bill be now read a second time, said, that during the last three years the number of hares had greatly increased in Ireland, and the object of the Bill was to allow Justices of the Peace to inflict penalties for keeping hares in large numbers. He would move the second reading.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^d."
—(The Viscount Massereene.)

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY said, the title of the Bill ought to be "An Act to prevent the eating of Leverets in Ireland." He certainly did not see why penalties should be inflicted in Ireland for doing what was done to a very large extent in England.

Motion agreed to; Bill read 2^d accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Monday the 16th of June next.

ARMY — THE CONDITION OF THE ARMY AND THE SHORT-SERVICE SYSTEM.

ADDRESS FOR PAPERS.

LORD STRATHNAIRN, in rising to move that an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty for the following Returns and Papers:—

"1. The Instructions given by the Secretary of State for War in 1872 to the Committee on Organization:

"2. The number and their rank of officers of battalions on foreign service or on first appointment on the Linked Battalion system who since the 1st of April 1876 have served at Brigade Depôts, and how long; also the number of rank and file and of non-commissioned officers, being the respective strength of the companies forming the Brigade Depôts, including non-effectives, and their employment; and also the average monthly strength of a Brigade Depôt:

"3. The number since the 1st of April 1876 of Brigade Depôt parades and drills, stating what drills, or movements under the colonel commandant of the four Depôt Companies, including the Auxiliary Forces, Militia, &c.:

"4. The annual expense of the colonels commandant, the officers, non-commissioned officers, and men of the Brigade Depôts actually and practically formed together, with the expense of concentration of troops, if any, travelling, officers mess, and other miscellaneous expenses attendant on the Brigade Depôt system:

"5. The armed force, whether line, brigade depôt, first class army reserve, militia, yeomanry, volunteers, or pensioners whom the colonel commandant is authorised to inspect or call out for drill purposes in his sub-district, or for aid, if necessary, to the civil power:

"6. The armed force and of what description in a sub-district under the orders of its colonel commandant:

"7. Whether the first class army reserve men are concentrated in a sub-district at the Brigade Depôt stations for their seven days annual instruction, and, if not, where and by whom drilled, and in what drill:

"8. Number of recruits since 1871 tried for fraudulent enlistment, that is for having sworn, although under age, in their attestation papers that they were of the proper age; and what steps have been taken to prevent the award of 'bringing money' for fraudulent enlistments:

"9. Any battalion, which on account of the Linked Battalion system and of the necessity of its being at home in order to relieve its linked or other battalion at the termination of its foreign service, or on account of any other cause, has been ordered home in breach of the rules of the Regulation Foreign Service Roster before the completion of its foreign service:

"10. Number of recruits under eight months service who have been sent out on foreign service; to what battalion in the Linked Battalion system; and where, since the 1st of April 1876:

"11. Number of short service men not allowed to go on foreign service on account of the near approach of their term of service, and sent to the Brigade Depot or elsewhere for the completion of their service, since the formation of the Brigade Depot system:

"12. A Return in continuation of a Return to an Address of the House of Lords, dated the 28th of February 1876;

"13. Return of Double or Linked Battalions at home being stationed in the district or sub-district of their Brigade Depot or Centre:

"14. Correspondence, if any, relating to the men of the First Class Army Reserve being sent to reinforce or fill up vacancies in regiments in South Africa:

"15. Any reports of the opinions of general officers commanding districts at home or in command of troops abroad of the disadvantages of the under age of the men under their command; also any report of the general officers or other officers commanding the troops, and of the principal medical officer, on the number of men who fell out of the ranks from fatigue on their march to and from the review at Windsor in 1874:

"16. A Return of the First Class Army Reserve men who have volunteered lately, specifying whether they were in civil employment or without it:

"17. Any Correspondence between the India Office, Her Majesty's Government, and the War Office relating to the unfavourable effects of the Short Service system on Indian finance or Indian interests:

"18. Any Return showing whether Major Bromhead of the 24th Regiment passed a successful examination or not for a first commission," said, that military opinion was uniform that the non-commissioned officers were the very back-bone of our Army; and short service had failed to produce them. That system had given the country boys for soldiers, and deprived the Army of the class of men from which non-commissioned officers were drawn. Some had said that short service would increase the military material that was in the country; but if this had been so we should have known about it by this time. Our best officers by no means approved of short service. In the Prussian Army, where short service prevailed, and which was, perhaps, the best organized Army in the world, such was the importance attached to having efficient non-commissioned officers that it had been ordered that all non-commissioned officers of nine years' service should receive Government employment. Young men under 20 years of age should not be taken into the Army, and that was the age at which the conscription commenced to apply in Germany. The recruiting age in this country was 18; but it was well-known that a number of men under that age enlisted in the Army. He wanted to know why the Government had not adopted the means at their disposal for punishing fraudulent enlistment? The 24th Regiment was composed of young men; but he believed that if its non-commissioned officers had been taken from tried and seasoned soldiers, instead of mere striplings, they would have steadied the men at Isandula, and have ordered the rear ranks to face round. If that had been done, and if a sustained and well-directed fire had been poured into the Zulu advance, the result would have been different.

VISCOUNT BURY said, he felt some difficulty in replying to the noble and gallant Lord, because he had moved for no fewer than 17 Returns. He did not think it would be convenient for him to go into the general question of short service; indeed, he was not prepared to enter into so large a subject at that moment. He was not aware, from the Notice which the noble and gallant Lord had given, that they would be asked to enter into such a discussion, or he might have taken the opportunity of consulting with the Secretary of State, or the illustrious Duke on the cross-benches (the Duke of Cambridge). The short-service system had been adopted after full consideration, and was now in full force; and although the noble and gallant Lord had stated many of its disadvantages, he had not suggested any alternative system. With regard to the Returns for which the noble and gallant Lord had moved, most of them had already been laid on the Table of their Lordships' House, and others had been presented to the other House.

THE EARL OF GALLOWAY considered the question of short service one of extreme urgency, and a discussion respecting it ought to be raised at the earliest possible period, in order that they might know what the real state of the Army was at the present time. There was such a difficulty in getting non-commissioned officers that, in a published letter, mention was made of an instance in which a man had been made a colour-sergeant after only 11 months' service. An important statement had recently been published to the effect that amid the hundreds of applicants at our hospitals, there were some of the failures of our modern military system—lads 20 years old, coming back from India damaged for life by premature and profitless service. He hoped the Committee, of which they had heard so much, was to have this subject under its notice as well as others. He should like to know, moreover, whether it was to be a Royal Commission, or a mere Departmental Committee of the War Office, and what instructions were to be given to it? The question was one of so much importance that, instead of having the same names upon these Committees, it would be desirable to expand them, so as to secure the advantage of the experience of commanding officers who had practical knowledge of the subject, and it would be satisfactory to hear that the noble and gallant Lord's (Lord Strathnairn's) opinion would be asked. In a recent despatch, Lord Chelmsford spoke in terms of praise of the good firing of the 57th Regiment in the late battles in Zululand. The explanation of it was this—the regiment was composed of many old soldiers who had served with it in Ceylon and in India. One of the great complaints against the present system was that under it we got only young lads as recruits.

Lord Strathnairn

LORD ELLENBOROUGH pointed out that the real injury to the Service commenced when the Ten Years' Act was passed, under which the soldier was deprived of pension, after devoting the best 10 years of his life to the Service. No soldier should be sent to India until upwards of 21 years from a medical point of view, and this was a cogent reason against the short service system, both costly and inefficient, more particularly expensive in reference to distant Colonies and our Empire in the East Indies.

LORD TRURO said, he was not sure whether the Rule of the House to which the noble and learned Earl on the Wool-sack had called attention at the commencement of the Sitting had not been, within the last few minutes, violated in a greater degree than it had been by him. He was then in Order, and would again express the hope that, as there was an anxious feeling even among military men upon the matter, the House would receive an assurance from the Government that the proposed Committee would be a mixed Committee of military men and civilians.

EARL FORTESCUE said, he had never concealed his opinion that the new system, both in respect to the appointment of officers and the manning, or rather "boying," of the Army was very defective. He trusted that the Committee which was about to be appointed would give particular attention to the Army Medical Reports, and the concurrence of testimony as to the unfitness of lads under 20—the majority of the new recruits being 16 or 17—either for exposure to a tropical climate, or the hardships and fatigues of actual warfare. The medical evidence on this point alone was so concurrent that he was sure it would be accepted as conclusive. When men were enlisted for 12 years, during nine of those years they were, on the average, old enough to be serviceable; but when they were only enlisted for six years, and often allowed to pass into the Reserve before the expiration of those, they were generally of serviceable age for only three years at most in the ranks. He trusted the Government would be induced to adopt some modifications of a system which, with a large Army on paper, practically left only a small proportion of it available in the field.

THE DUKE OF CAMBRIDGE thought that much inconvenience arose from these imperfect discussions of a technical subject, especially after the announcement by Her Majesty's Government that it was to be investigated by a military Committee. Not only in their Lordships' House and in the House of Commons, but in the country generally, was the opinion general that something should be done in the matter. The question was, what was it that should be done, and how was it to be done? The best way was to seek, in the first instance, what were the blots in the present system. The system would be fully inquired into by the Committee, the blots in it would be pointed out by competent witnesses, who would be examined by the Committee, and who would state their opinions frankly upon Army organization. We should then be able to see how matters really stood; and the Committee would state what, in their opinion, should be the alterations or amendments. The Committee would report fully to Her Majesty's Government, and Her Majesty's Government would then be in a position to decide whether large organic changes ought to be made, or whether it was only in small and minor points that alterations were required. His noble Friend (Earl Fortescue) said he was not satisfied with the way in which the present system had been carried out. He had the greatest respect for the noble Earl, who always said what he meant; but he was at a loss to know in what respect the noble Earl thought the system had not been carried out. Nobody would be more pleased than the Secretary of State and himself if they could fill their ranks with men over 20. If anyone could show how, without conscription, but by voluntary enlistment, we could get a sufficient number of recruits over 20 years old, a great difficulty would be got over. Unfortunately, many of these recruits were only 17 years old; but if they would wait until they were 20, the War Office authorities would be only too delighted. His noble Friend, however, would find some difficulty in arriving at such an arrangement. He felt quite sure of one thing—that unless they largely increased the pay of the soldier they could not expect older men to join the Service, and that was a subject which required grave consideration. There was no doubt that all those matters would be fully, fairly, and seriously inquired into by the Commission or Committee. The noble Earl (the Earl of Galloway) went into a number of details, on which he would have been quite prepared to meet him; but it was impossible to go into that sort of thing in their Lordships' House, and it would only be wearying to the House. In such an Assembly, details of military organization could be discussed in only a very superficial and unsatisfactory manner. He hoped that noble Lords who felt interested in these matters would be satisfied with the assurance of the Government that there would be a full inquiry into these and other grave points by a Committee competent to enter on such an investigation.

EARL FORTESCUE explained, that he did not wish to impute any fault to the War Office authorities, but only to the system.

VISCOUNT CARDWELL said, he felt bound to express his full concurrence with the illustrious Duke in thinking that, if there was to be an inquiry that should carry weight with it, the constant discussion in that House of details of military organization was not desirable; and, therefore, he should not say a word on the question raised by his noble and gallant Friend (Lord Strathnairn), who had brought the subject forward, further than that there ought to be a complete investigation, from beginning to end, into the subject; but in reference to what had been said by his noble Friend (Earl Fortescue) as to the ages at which soldiers were sent to India, he wished to read a passage from the Report of Lord Dalhousie's Commission, which sat in 1867, the golden days of long service. It was in these words—

"A return prepared for us of the ages and periods of service of men sent out as drafts to India during the last two years, between the 1st of January, 1864, and the 31st of December, 1865, shows that out of a total number of 5,622, no less than 2,093 were under 20 years of age, and 796 between 20 and 21 years. Thus there were more than one-half (2,889) under 21 years of age, and in some regiments the proportion was much greater. Out of these 5,622 recruits, 3,947 were of less than two years' service, while 2,038 of them were actually under one year's service. Of the Artillery drafts, one-half were under 21 years of age, and one-third under 20—nearly three-fourths under two years' service, and one-fifth actually under one year's service."

Now, as a rule, only matured men were sent to India. During the time of the late Government, there was an inquiry in reference to service in India, and on that Committee were the heads of the Medical and Recruiting Departments, and they provided rules in respect of the men who were to be sent out to India; and he believed those rules had been acted upon ever since, and they showed a striking contrast with the rules in force under what was called the golden times of long service. He wished to ask, whether it was correct, as had been stated, that there was a difficulty in accepting the services of men in the Reserve Force if they wished to volunteer? He could not understand that there was any difficulty; but if there was, he submitted that a strong Government could have brought in a measure to remove it; but as that had not been done, he thought the alleged difficulty must be imaginary. He supposed it was a mare's nest. It would be a great advantage to have the older men of the Reserve in the Army if they could be permitted to volunteer.

The Duke of Cambridge

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, there was a provision in a Bill now before the other House of Parliament—the Army Discipline and Regulation Bill—authorizing the Secretary of State to accept volunteers from the Reserve. As the law stood, there was nothing whatever to prevent the Secretary of State, under the Act of 1870, to permit volunteers from the Reserves joining the Regular Army, so long as the Regular Army was not increased beyond the maximum strength voted by Parliament.

THE EARL OF GALLOWAY, in explanation, said, he could assure the illustrious Duke that he quite appreciated his advice; but the other evening he was treating on a subject of great importance, and the only way of doing so was by entering into it fully.

LORD WAVENEY suggested that those Papers which had a special bearing on the subject and were most interesting should be prepared and presented to the House first.

VISCOUNT BURY asked the noble and gallant Lord (Lord Strathnairn), which of the Returns on the Motion Paper he moved for?

THE EARL OF LONGFORD said, in reference to the quotation from the Report of Lord Dalhousie's Commission as to the youth of soldiers at the time mentioned, it must be remembered that those young soldiers were received into regiments in which a large number of old soldiers were serving, and they became more efficient than in regiments composed principally of young men.

LORD STRATHNAIRN pointed out that he was desirous to obtain all Returns respecting the Army Reserve, the system of education, the brigade system, and the linking of battalions. He wished to observe, further, that he considered he was perfectly right to say in that House what he thought would be for the good of the Army. He would like to have all the Papers mentioned in his Notice of Motion, and which he had moved for.

VISCOUNT BURY explained that many of the Returns now asked for were already on the Table of their Lordships' House, and that some of the Papers, such as the Indian Correspondence, could not be granted.

THE DUKE OF CAMBRIDGE wished to explain that he had not the least wish to interfere with any noble Lord bringing forward any question of this kind.

What he meant was that no official Member of the Government could go into those details which might be necessary upon this occasion. If he went beyond that he did not wish to do so.

VISCOUNT HARDINGE wished to know whether he correctly understood the noble Viscount (Viscount Bury) to say that the Government declined to produce the Correspondence with the India Office relating to the effect of the short service system on Indian finance? He (Viscount Hardinge) had seen no reason why such a Correspondence should not be produced. He had asked what was the comparative statement of expenses as regards the Indian reliefs consequent on short service; but he had never been able to get a satisfactory answer. That was one of the matters which bore heavily on the finances of India, and he should like to know whether the Secretary of State for India had an objection to the production of the Correspondence?

VISCOUNT CRANBROOK said, there would be no objection to the production of the Correspondence when it was complete; but it was not complete, and that was the only reason why the Government objected to produce it at the present moment. The Correspondence was now going on between the two Departments, and if it were laid on the Table it would not tell its own tale. With regard to expenditure, there was an inquiry now proceeding with reference to Home charges. The conclusions arrived at would be submitted to the House, and then his noble Friend would have the opportunity of obtaining the information he desired.

Motion amended, and agreed to.

Resolved, That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty for,

1. The number and their rank of officers of battalions on foreign service or on first appointment on the Linked Battalion system who since the 1st of April 1876 have served at Brigade Depôts, and how long; also the number of rank and file and of non-commissioned officers, being the respective strength of the companies forming the Brigade Depôts, including non-effectives, and their employment; and also the average monthly strength of a Brigade Depôt:

2. The number since the 1st of April 1876 of Brigade Depôt parades and drills, stating what drills, or movements under the colonel commandant of the four Depôt Companies, including the Auxiliary Forces, Militia, &c.:

3. The annual expense of the colonels commandant, the officers, non-commissioned officers, and men of the Brigade Depôts actually and practically formed together, with the expense of concentration of troops, if any, travelling, officers mess, and other miscellaneous expenses attendant on the Brigade Depôt system :

4. The armed force, whether line, brigade depôt, first class army reserve, militia, yeomanry, volunteers, or pensioners whom the colonel commandant is authorised to inspect or call out for drill purposes in his sub-district, or for aid, if necessary, to the civil power :

5. The armed force and of what description in a sub-district under the orders of its colonel commandant :

6. Whether the first class army reserve men are concentrated in a sub-district at the Brigade Depôt stations for their seven days annual instruction, and, if not, where and by whom drilled, and in what drill :

7. Number of recruits since 1871 tried for fraudulent enlistment, that is for having sworn, although under age, in their attestation papers that they were of the proper age ; and what steps have been taken to prevent the award of "bringing money" for fraudulent enlistments :

8. Any battalion, which on account of the Linked Battalion system and of the necessity of its being at home in order to relieve its linked or other battalion at the termination of its foreign service, or on account of any other cause, has been ordered home in breach of the rules of the Regulation Foreign Service Roster before the completion of its foreign service :

9. Return in continuation of a Return to an Address of the House of Lords, dated the 28th of February 1876 :

10. Return of Double or Linked Battalions at home being stationed in the district or sub-district of their Brigade Depôt or Centre :

11. Any reports of the opinions of general officers commanding districts at home or in command of troops abroad of the disadvantages of the under age of the men under their command :

12. A Return of the First Class Army Reserve men who have volunteered lately, specifying whether they were in civil employment or without it.—(The Lord Strathnairn.)

CHURCH OF ENGLAND—GLEBE LANDS.

MOTION FOR A PAPER.

THE BISHOP OF PETERBOROUGH, in rising to move for—

"A Return from the Ecclesiastical Commissioners and from the Governors of Queen Anne's Bounty of all sales of lands belonging to or held in trust for parochial benefices or districts which have been effected or assented to by them respectively during the last ten years, specifying in each case the amount of land sold, the rental of the same, and the price obtained for it ; also the like particulars of all cases in which sales have been refused within the same period ; "

said, he was anxious to ascertain to what extent and under what conditions the Church of England of late years had been parting with her glebe lands, seeing that she was one of the largest landed proprietors in the country. It was a matter of importance to ascertain to what extent the clergy were being turned from landowners into fundholders, and he regretted to be obliged to add that the subject was one which had a deep and painful interest for many of the clergy at this moment. Owing to agricultural depression in the last two or three years, many of the clergy were placed in most embarrassing and distressing circumstances, and in a few instances there had been great distress. The subject had been under consideration in the Upper House of Convocation, and the Return he now asked for—and which could, he was informed, be produced without difficulty—would be of great value. He begged to move for the Return of which he had given Notice.

EARL STANHOPE, on the part of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, said, they had not the least objection to give the Return asked for.

Motion agreed to.

Return ordered to be laid before the House.

CONVENTION (IRELAND) ACT REPEAL BILL—(No. 77.)

(The Lord O'Hagan.)

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

LORD O'HAGAN, in moving that the Bill be now read a second time, said : My Lords, the position of this Bill relieves me from the necessity of offering argument in its favour to your Lordships. It aims to repeal an Act which is exceptional, affecting Ireland only, and in many of its provisions practically obsolete. Exceptional legislation can be justified only by the clearest necessity, which cannot be alleged in this case, and obsolete Acts should not be allowed to cumber the Statute Book. You are aware that the Convention Act was passed in 1793 by the Irish Parliament, at a time of great excitement, when the spirit of panic was abroad. The French Revolution had alarmed the world, and Ireland was disturbed by its influence. The Act was designed to encounter the dangers supposed to be then impending, and especially to prevent a particular Convention of delegates which was threatened at Athlone. It was represented by the Attorney General of the time as in principle only declaratory; but, in its operation, it was made to act more extensively in later days. Some of the best men in the Irish Legislature resisted it. The Duke of Leinster, Lord Charlemont, and Lord Arran placed a solemn Protest against it on the Roll of the Irish House of Lords. Mr. Grattan opposed it with all his strength; but it was carried, and still remains the law of the land. It has outlived the circumstances which gave it birth, and any justification for maintaining it which they afforded. Parliament no longer fears assumption of its powers or usurpation of its functions, and against any possible assault upon them the Common Law of the land gives ample security. In the first instance, this Bill was introduced into the other House to simply repeal the Convention Act. It was debated at length, and, as I am informed, the Chief Secretary of the Lord Lieutenant intimated that if it was withdrawn, and another substituted with a clause clearly affirming the principle which makes punishable such assumption or usurpation as I have described, the Government would offer no opposition to it. It was amended accordingly, and passed the House of Commons without opposition or objection. In that position of things, I have no need to detain your Lordships further, and you will have no difficulty in giving a second reading to the Bill.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^a."
—(The Lord O'Hagan.)

Motion agreed to; Bill read 2^a accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Monday the 16th of June next.

House adjourned at half past Six o'clock, to Friday the 13th of June next,
a quarter before Five o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Monday, 9th June, 1879.

MINUTES.]—NEW MEMBERS SWORN—The O'Gorman Mahon, for Clare County; Daniel FitzGerald Gabbett, esquire, for Limerick City.

SELECT COMMITTEE—Poor Removal, nominated.
SUPPLY—considered in Committee—CIVIL SERVICE ESTIMATES, Class III.—LAW AND JUSTICE; Class VI.—SUPERANNUATION AND RETIRED ALLOWANCES, AND GRATUITIES FOR CHARITABLE AND OTHER PURPOSES.

PUBLIC BILLS—Resolution in Committee—Ordered—First Reading—Linen and Hempen Manufactures (Ireland) * [202]; Spirits [203].

First Reading—East India Loan (Consolidated Fund) * [201].

Select Committee—Medical Act (1858) Amendment (No. 3) * [121], nominated.

Committee—Customs and Inland Revenue [150]—R.P.; Supreme Court of Judicature Acts Amendment [134]—R.P.; Common Law Procedure and Judicature Acts Amendment * [181].

Committee—Report—Local Government (Ireland) Provisional Orders Confirmation (Cashel, &c.) * [141]; Local Government (Ireland) Provisional Order Confirmation (Downpatrick) * [140]; Metropolis (Whitechapel and Limehouse) Improvement Scheme Amendment * [184]; Inclosure Provisional Order (Matterdale Common) * [171]; Inclosure Provisional Order (Redmoor and Golberdon Commons) * [172]; Inclosure Provisional Order (East Stainmore Common) * [174]; Local Government Provisional Orders (Aspull, &c.) * [161]; Volunteer Corps (Ireland) * [6-200].

QUESTIONS.

INDIA—RETURN OF ECCLESIASTICAL SALARIES.—QUESTION.

MR. BAXTER asked the Under Secretary of State for India, If he can explain why the Return relating to Ecclesiastical Salaries in India, ordered by this House so long ago as the 5th of July 1877, has not yet been presented, and if he can undertake to lay it upon the Table at the latest before the close of this Session?

MR. E. STANHOPE: I regret very much that so great a delay has occurred in the production of this Return. In accordance with the promise given in December last, I caused an inquiry to be addressed to India on the subject. The answer was that the Returns from the local Governments had been found to be unsatisfactory and wanting in uniformity, and that, therefore, fresh Returns had been called for. I presume that the mode of calculating the attendance of Government officials at Divine worship has given rise to some difference of opinion; but I hope that it will not be long before the Return can be presented.

TREATY OF BERLIN—THE 23RD ARTICLE—THE EUROPEAN PROVINCES OF TURKEY.—QUESTION.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether, since the renewed representations of Her Majesty's Government, any steps have been taken by the Porte to give effect to that part of the 23rd Article of the Treaty of Berlin, which provides that local institutions analogous to those of Crete (or as subsequently stated of Eastern Roumelia) shall be granted to the several Provinces of European Turkey for which separate provision is not made?

MR. BOURKE: Sir, in consequence of the representations which have been made by Her Majesty's Government on this subject, Sir Henry Layard has been informed that the Porte intends immediately to submit to a Local Commission the question of the organization of these Provinces, which under the Berlin Treaty are not specifically provided for. We have also reason to believe that at this moment an organic Statute has been passed for Eastern Roumelia which is at present under the consideration of the Porte with the view to making it applicable to those Provinces which have been alluded to by the hon. Member who asks the Question.

POOR LAW (IRELAND)—THE MONAGHAN BOARD OF GUARDIANS.
QUESTION.

MR. CALLAN asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland, Whether his attention has been called to certain proceedings at the Monaghan Board of Guardians on the 30th of April, May 7th and 21st, and the correspondence between Mr. MacAleese, the proprietor of the "People's Advocate," and the Local Government Board, Ireland, with reference to the exclusion of the reporter of that journal from the board room of the Monaghan Board of Guardians, whilst the other two local being Tory journals are admitted to report the proceedings thereat, and the refusal of a Mr. Jesse Lloyd, the chairman presiding on the 30th of April, to receive the following notice of motion:—

"I beg to give notice, that I will move on this day month, that the resolution passed by this Board on the 1st May 1878, excluding the representative of the 'People's Advocate' from the meetings, while the reporters of the other local papers are admitted, be rescinded, as unworthy of this or any other Board of Guardians in Ireland;"

whether it is in the power of a Board of Guardians, where meetings are open to the Press, nevertheless to admit only certain Tory journals, and exclude the representatives of a Liberal journal; if a chairman of a Board of Guardians can of himself refuse to receive a notice of motion admittedly legal, and within the rights of any individual guardian to propose, and so prevent any subject to which he may object from being formally brought before the Board; and, whether a clerk of the peace, who is clerk to the magistrates, and from the nature of his office incapable of acting as a magistrate, is nevertheless legally qualified to act as an ex officio Poor Law Guardian?

Sir George Campbell

MR. J. LOWTHER, in reply, said, his attention had been called to the matter, and he understood that the question of the admission or exclusion of any person, whether a representative of the Press or otherwise, rested entirely with the Board of Guardians itself, and was not in any way within the jurisdiction of the Local Government Board. As to the power of the Chairman of the Board of Guardians of himself to refuse to receive a notice of motion, he (Mr. J. Lowther) apprehended that he had no such power. However, he understood that a notice of motion identical in character with the one referred to in the Question was brought before a meeting of the Guardians specially summoned for the purpose, and it was rejected by a majority. As to the last part of the Question, that related to a legal point upon which he did not feel justified in expressing an opinion; but perhaps the hon. Gentleman would put the Question to his right hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General for Ireland.

MR. CALLAN: Sir, I beg to give Notice that to-morrow I shall ask Mr. Attorney General for Ireland, Whether a clerk of the peace who is clerk to the magistrates, and from the nature of his office incapable of acting as a magistrate, is nevertheless legally qualified to act as an ex officio Poor Law Guardian, referring specially to the 13th section of the County Officers (Ireland) Act of 1877?

SOUTH AFRICA—THE ZULU WAR—OVERTURES OF PEACE—DETENTION OF MESSENGERS.—QUESTION.

SIR WILFRID LAWSON: I wish to ask the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Colonies a Question of which I have not given him

Notice, but which, should he prefer it, I shall be happy to put again to-morrow. I should like to know, Whether the latest despatches from South Africa mention any fresh overtures for peace having been made by the Zulu King; and, if so, whether he will state to the House the result of the negotiations which have taken place?

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH: Hon Members may probably have seen the telegram published by my right hon. and gallant Friend the Secretary of State for War in this morning's newspapers. That I think is practically correct. It appears that some messengers came from Cetewayo to General Crealock stating Cetewayo's strong desire for peace; but they did not appear to have been authorized by the Great Council or by the King to offer any terms of peace, or to be of the rank ordinarily sent for such a purpose. I believe Lord Chelmsford directed General Crealock to tell these messengers that he had informed previous messengers that any message was to be sent to him at General Wood's camp, that he was ready to receive any message under a flag of truce, and that something more than words would be required, alluding, of course, to the terms of peace dictated to Cetewayo in December last, and anticipating some reply to these proposals.

PARLIAMENTARY PAPERS — GREECE AND CYPRUS.—QUESTIONS.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE asked, When the Greek and Cyprian Papers would be delivered to Members?

MR. BOURKE, in reply, said, the Cyprian Papers would be delivered to-morrow or the day after; and the Greek Papers at the end of next week, or the beginning of the week following.

SIR JULIAN GOLDSMID asked, When the Egyptian Papers would be delivered?

MR. BOURKE hoped they would speedily be circulated.

PARLIAMENT—BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.—QUESTIONS.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON asked, If it was to be understood that the Army Discipline and Regulation Bill would be proceeded with at the Morning Sitting on the morrow (this day); and, if the Government could state what Business they intended to take on Thursday?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER, in reply said, the Army Discipline and Regulation Bill was to be taken to-morrow at the Morning Sitting, and on Thursday they proposed to resume the adjourned discussion on Indian Finance.

MR. CALLAN: Sir, I should wish to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer a Question which would convenience Irish Members very much to have answered. It is, Whether it is his intention to bring forward the Irish Estimates, or the Scotch Universities Votes before this day week?

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON: Sir, the promise which has already been given does not apply to all the Irish Estimates, nor to the Votes for the Scotch Universities. It is proposed to take the Irish Law Votes.

MR. CALLAN: I understood that before the Recess some Member on the opposite side stated that none of the Irish Estimates would be taken on the first night after the Recess. Might I ask if that is so?

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON: I suppose I am the Member of the Government referred to. At all events, what I did say was that I would take none of the Votes objected to by certain hon. Members for Ireland; but with regard to the Irish Law Votes I made no promise. I gave no pledge whatever and I would not take the Law Votes of Class III. In fact, I did say I would take Class III. as it stood.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

SUPPLY—CIVIL SERVICE ESTIMATES.

[Progress.]

SUPPLY—considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

CLASS III.—LAW AND JUSTICE.

(1.) Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £129,351, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1880, for the Expense of the Maintenance of Juvenile Offenders in Reformatory, Industrial, and Day Industrial Schools in Great Britain, and for the Salaries and Expenses of the Inspectors of Reformatories."

MR. JAMES STEWART said, that in the absence of his hon. Friend the Member for Paisley (Mr. W. Holms), he would move the reduction of the item of £112,000 for Industrial Schools in England by the sum of £6,891. It would be remembered that last Session exception was taken to this Vote on the ground that there was no valid reason why the allowance for children in the industrial schools for Scotland should be less than the allowance made in England. The hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury (Sir Henry Selwin-Ibbetson) stated, then, that the Government were prepared to take the matter into their consideration, and upon that understanding the Scotch Members did not press the matter to a Division. He (Mr. James Stewart) thought it was incumbent on the Scotch Members now to do more than they did last year, because they felt disappointed that the Vote should not have been equalized, and the payment for children in Scotland placed on the same footing as that for children in England. He, therefore, begged to move the Amendment which stood on the Paper in the name of his hon. Friend the Member for Paisley.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That the Item of £112,000, for Industrial Schools, England, be reduced by the sum of £6,891."—(Mr. James Stewart.)

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON submitted that when this question was under discussion last year, he expressed the intention to look into the case with the view of seeing whether this payment ought not to be raised in Scotland to the amount paid in England. As the result of the inquiry he had made, he was prepared, on behalf of the Treasury, to accept the recommendation of the Inspector of Reformatories in favour of any school that was placed in this invidious position. The case really stood in this way—In 1861 the Scotch reformatory schools were paid at the rate of 4s. per child, which grant was raised in 1867 to 4s. 6d., at which figure it now stood. With regard to the English scale, all schools that dated before 1872 were in receipt of 5s. for every child of the same age as those children for whom the Scotch schools were paid 4s. 6d. per head. He should be prepared, on the part of the Treasury, to raise the sum of 4s. 6d. to 5s. in cases where the Inspector of Reformatories, having satisfied himself that the school was an efficient one, had certified that it was founded before 1872. He could not place the Scotch schools in a different position with regard to schools founded after that date, which were paid at the rate of 3s. 6d. per child.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL said, they could not ask more than that the Scotch schools should be placed precisely on the same footing as the English schools. He desired to know from the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury, whether the English schools were to be subjected to the same condition as the hon. Gentleman had just stated would be imposed as regarded the Scotch schools in respect to the payment of 5s. per child, and whether a certificate was required before the payment was made?

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON said, that was the rule under which the English grant was made; and all he could say was that, in making this addition to the Scotch rate, these schools would be subjected to the same condition that the English schools were subjected to—that was, that there must be a certificate of efficiency. Already the Treasury had sanctioned an increase at this rate to the industrial schools at Edinburgh and Glasgow; but it had never been carried out.

MR. C. S. PARKER thanked the hon. Baronet for the concession he had made. He was sure that the Scotch Representatives were satisfied with the concession as now explained, and he hoped that the new arrangement would take effect immediately.

MR. JAMES STEWART said, after the explanation of the hon. Baronet the Secretary to the Treasury, he would withdraw his Amendment.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. W. H. JAMES asked for an explanation of the diminution to the extent of £1,000 in the grant to the Day Industrial School. As far as he was aware, there was only one school of the kind established throughout the whole of England, and it would be re-assuring if the hon. Baronet could state that it was being carried on successfully, and at the same time state why it had been thought right to reduce the grant.

SIR MATTHEW WHITE RIDLEY pointed out that there were three day industrial schools—two in Liverpool, and one at Bristol. The reason for the reduction of the grant was that it was found last year that £2,500, which was the sum taken, was largely in excess of what was required. It was expected that £1,500, which was now taken, would cover the whole of the cost of these establishments.

MR. BIGGAR said, that an hon. Friend had given Notice of an Amendment to reduce the Vote by £5. He (Mr. Biggar) had no proposition on the Paper; but he begged leave to move the reduction of the Vote by a similar sum, for this reason—that they in Ireland, as compared with England, were somewhat unfairly treated in respect to reformatory and industrial schools. He believed that in England the number of children who could be sent by the local magistrates to such schools was perfectly unlimited—that, in fact, the reformatory schools were bound to receive as many young persons as were sent there by the magistrates, if there was sufficient accommodation for them. But, unfortunately, in Ireland the case was thoroughly different. The local Inspector, no doubt, a very estimable gentleman, on his own responsibility stipulated what number of boys or girls, as the case might be, should be sent to the reformatory schools. He particularly wished to direct the attention of the Committee to the Roman Catholic Reformatory School for boys at Belfast—a school capable of accommodating, so far as dormitories and general internal arrangements were concerned, as many as 160 boys; but the Inspector only certified that accommodation should be given for 75 boys. The result of this was that the promoters of the school, who had gone to considerable expense in filling up the establishment for the required purpose, had one-half of the money expended unused. That was a great grievance; and it was felt to be one by the local magistrate, who was a Protestant and of Conservative politics; by the prosecuting authority of Belfast, which was purely Conservative, and also by the manager of the school; and he held that until the grievance was redressed, some limit should be put upon the amount granted by Parliament for the support of reformatory schools. Not long ago, Mr. Hamilton, the magistrate of Belfast, had one boy before him whom he wished to send to the Roman Catholic Reformatory; but, unfortunately, the reply he received was that there was no accommodation for the boy on account of the limit put upon the number of boys who were to receive free lodging by the certificate of the Inspector. In the whole of the Province of Ulster there were only two reformatory schools—one for Protestant boys, and one for Roman Catholics. Notwithstanding that there were constant applications for admissions in the Catholic school, the Inspector would only certify for 75; whereas he gave a certificate in respect to the Protestant school for 350 boys, the two sects in the Province being about equal. The Inspector was himself a Roman Catholic; but he gave the Protestants greater privileges than he accorded to his co-religionists. In point of fact, the Protestants did not require so much accommodation as was provided for them; because he (Mr. Biggar) found that, according to the last Return, there were only 126 boys in the school, a certificate being given for 350. The Government ought to give some assurance that the grievance under which the Catholics of Belfast laboured in this matter would be redressed; in fact, that the certificate for 125 boys should be transferred from the Protestant school to the Catholic school, which number of boys could be reasonably accommodated in the present building. That could be done without any increase on the charge for which certificates had been granted. The Roman Catholics would be materially benefited without any injury accruing to the Protestants, who had now more accommodation than they really required. The system of limiting the number by hard-and-fast lines told very hardly against Roman Catholic children. One argument against the Irish claim, in respect to these schools, was that a higher rate was paid in Ireland; but he found that in England and Scotland a very similar rate was paid. In Scotland a very large proportion of the children were paid for at the rate of 4s. 6d. per week; whilst 6s. was paid in England in the case of the older children, and a very large proportion were paid for at 5s. In Ireland, the rate was 5s. all round; so that, in reality, even so far as the rate was concerned, there was very little advantage to Ireland. Now, if it were said that the average rate in Ireland should be brought down to the average rate in England, and that, at the same time, they should be allowed to put in as many children as they wanted in the Irish schools, he would be better satisfied. The manager of a school would be much better pleased to get as many boys at 4*s.* 6*d.* a-week as his school would accommodate than to receive 5*s.*, and to have to refuse thoroughly eligible subjects, as at present. He begged leave to move the reduction of the Vote by £5.

THE CHAIRMAN said, it was the practice to move the reduction of a Vote by a more considerable sum than had been named by the hon. Member, or, at least, by an amount equivalent to some head or item of the Vote. He thought that he should not be following the usual practice if he were to put to the Committee a reduction by £5, that amount not arising in any form connected with the Vote.

MR. BIGGAR said, the question he wished to raise was this—that in England an unlimited number of children were taken into these industrial schools, if there were accommodation for them in the building; but in Ireland the case was different. The Irish schools were limited to a specific number, and could not take any beyond that. He did not wish that the amount given for industrial schools in England should be substantially reduced, but only to raise a question of principle—namely, as to whether or not there should be a limited number of admissions in Ireland, and whether thoroughly eligible candidates should be turned away on account of arbitrary and unreasonable certificates?

MR. A. MOORE said, that in placing a similar Amendment upon the Paper to that just referred to, he did so for this reason—He should be very sorry to be found voting against any sum of money being devoted to this most useful purpose of industrial schools in England; but he merely wished to call attention to the very arbitrary course which was pursued by the Treasury in the matter of the Irish schools, which were dealt with very differently to those in England. In 1872, there was a Treasury Minute passed reducing the amount of the allowance paid per head on all children in industrial schools in England and Ireland to 3*s.* 6*d.* per head, and people were asked, as he understood it, to open new schools at 3*s.* 6*d.* per head. That Minute was now in operation, and it was expected that Irish managers would open new schools at 3*s.* 6*d.* per head, which it was utterly impossible for them to do. If children could be kept for that sum, what excuse could be given for paying 5*s.* and 6*s.* in England for the maintenance of a large proportion of the 9,000 children in the schools of that country? He was not going to make a wholesale accusation against the Treasury. All the schools at present in operation in Ireland were receiving 5*s.* per head, and there were many schools in England which were not receiving so much; but he complained that this arbitrary rule was launched by the Treasury, cutting down to 3*s.* 6*d.* all new schools which might be opened after a certain date. [Sir HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON: It was not in 1872.] The hon. Baronet intimated that it was not in 1872. Well, it might not have been in 1872 in Ireland, but it was in England, and the rule now applied in a most harsh way to Ireland, simply from this fact—that in England they had local bodies and laws enabling them to contribute to the schools, but in Ireland they had only one class of local body. In England they had school boards, contributing, in some cases, as much as 4*s.* 6*d.* per week, which would make a total of 8*s.*, even with the minimum grant. But in Ireland they had not got the same local resources; and last year, when a Bill was brought in to give other local bodies in Ireland power to contribute, it was blocked by Notices of hon. Members on the Government side of the House. They exercised their undoubted right, of which he could not complain; but he did complain that a law had been issued that new schools were only to receive 3*s.* 6*d.* That might act in England, where they had other local bodies empowered to contribute, but it could not act in Ireland; and although he fully appreciated the good motives of the Treasury in doing this in order to compel local support, and to prevent idle parents from being relieved of the charge of the maintenance of their children, he knew it was the opinion of those who were competent to judge, and of the authorities of the English schools themselves, that although that rule might work in England, it could not in Ireland. What had, in fact, happened since the rule was passed? In England people had been willing to open new schools, because they were well aided; but it had crushed out new schools in Ireland, and not a single new school had been opened there since then. He found that 6,200 out of 9,000 children in the English schools were paid for at the rate of 5*s.* and 6*s.* per week; and if those sums were required in this country for a very large majority, it was quite evident that 3*s.* 6*d.* could not be enough in Ireland. It was proposed to apply the rule in question only in reference to new schools to be established; and, in the face of that decision, he wished to know what earthly excuse there was for maintaining the old grant in the old-established schools? He argued that the Government should seriously consider the matter, with a view that something might be done, not to crush further progress, but to enable new schools to be opened on a reasonable basis.

Mr. Biggar

THE CHAIRMAN said, any Amendment of an Estimate should be one that raised a question of a substantial reduction. The hon. Member's observations had been perfectly germane to the Question before the Committee; but he (the Chairman) did not think he should be acting in accordance with precedent in putting to the Committee a reduction of £5.

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON thought a short explanation would clear up a great deal of the difficulty and doubt which appeared to exist. The real facts of the case were these—In 1872, on its being found that the sums paid were really too liberal—namely, 5*s.* or 3*s.* from 6 to 10 years, and 3*s.* more from 10 to 16 years—and encouraged too much the admission of children whose parents ought to support them, but wished to get rid of them, the Government reduced the grant to new industrial schools in England alone to 3*s.* 6*d.*, at which it now stood. At that sum a large number of schools had been started, and were being properly and effectively worked. Nothing was done in 1872, or subsequently, with regard to Ireland, where 5*s.* had always been paid, without any distinction of age, and without any of the minor sums which were given in Scotland and in England for the younger children. But in order to prevent the very thing which the new rule was passed to prevent in England, a limitation was put upon the number of scholars in Ireland by making it obligatory that the consent of the Lord Lieutenant should be given to the number of children for which schools were certified; and that had acted as a check upon the too rapid increase of these schools in Ireland, which would not really operate in the direction in which hon. Members all wished to see them operate—namely, for the repression of crime and the improvement of children who were either destitute or criminal. Last year his attention was called by Irish Members to that restriction. They said it placed the industrial schools of Ireland on a different footing to those of England, and he was asked to consider whether he could not bring about some similarity. Well, of course, if that limitation as to number were taken off, and if in Ireland they were to be allowed to create these schools in any number, only fulfilling the condition that the English schools had fulfilled of thorough efficiency, then the Irish managers ought not to complain if they were placed on an identical footing with the English as to the grant. Therefore, he proposed last year to abolish the restriction, and to reduce the grant to 3*s.* 6*d.* for children between the ages of 10 and 16 years. What had been the result? He had had two, if not three, cases from Ireland, pointing out just what the hon. Member for Clonmel (Mr. A. Moore) had stated this evening—that it was impossible, in the opinion of people in Ireland, to maintain these schools on the 3*s.* 6*d.* grant. He had endeavoured to bring the Irish schools down to that condition of grant in order that he might relax the limitation upon the numbers, and really place them on identical terms with the grants in England.

MR. A. MOORE observed, that the hon. Baronet the Secretary to the Treasury had not relaxed the regulation referred to.

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON replied, that he had not, because of that objection, and because of the statement that they would not open schools on the more moderate amount. It had gone so far, however, that, within a few weeks, he had relaxed the rule at Dungarvan school, which was limited to a certain number of boys. The Treasury had consented to the admission of the additional number asked for, provided they were taken at the reduced rate, thus bringing them into accord with the English system. Since then he had had applications from that school and neighbourhood, pointing out the impossibility of carrying on the school on such terms, and he had at last consented to a larger number of boys being taken at the larger sum of 5s. per week. If the hon. Member looked at the comparative numbers, he would see that the amounts granted in Ireland were far in excess of those granted in England and Scotland, because all the boys were treated on the same condition, irrespective of age. If, however, uniformity was to be brought about, the Irish schools must accept the same terms as the others; and if they would do that, he would agree, on the part of the Treasury, that the limitation should be at once abolished. But it must be on condition that the terms were identical, financially and otherwise, and then they would bring about in Ireland the result which had been attained in England by operating in another direction.

MR. A. MOORE inquired whether the hon. Baronet would be good enough, also, to introduce a measure to equalize the powers of local bodies to contribute?

MR. BIGGAR said, there were some things which the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury seemed to have overlooked. In many cases, the managers of the schools paid a considerable amount out of their own pockets for children in excess of those for whom the Government grant was given. In a school in Wexford there were 23 of these "free" children; at Tralee, 11; and at St. Vincent, Limerick, there were absolutely 92; at another place in Limerick there were 62; at Roscommon, 44; and at Sligo, 44 free to 30 children who were paid for, which reduced the average payment to less than 2s. 6d. per head. Another point of difference between the English and Irish schools was that, in the former, children were allowed to be paid for over the age of 16, supposing they were learning a trade; but, in the latter, the grant was withdrawn at that age. If the hon. Baronet asked the managers of schools to maintain children for less than 5s., it was impossible to do so. The average cost for boys was somewhere about 8s., so that at present the remaining 3s. had to be made up by the local authorities.

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON said, it was far from the wish of the Government to throw any obstacle in the way of what was admitted to be one of the best means of reducing the criminal population. A great deal of the opposition of hon. Members arose from misapprehension of the facts. The English system was not contributed to by the rates in nine cases out of ten; certainly a very large proportion were supported by the Government grant and voluntary contributions. Most of the schools were created by voluntary efforts, supplemented by the grant. There were county industrial schools which had a claim on the rates; but an immense deal of the industrial school work of England was done by voluntary effort; and it was because he thought voluntary efforts ought to be encouraged that he had said he should only be too glad to see the Irish schools placed in identically the same position as they were placed in the other two parts of the Kingdom. If the Irish people really felt as strongly on the matter as was represented, they would make an effort to follow the example of England, and they would find that the cost of these schools was not so large as was stated by the hon. Member for Cavan (Mr. Biggar). The majority of the voluntary schools in England were supported at an average cost of 7s. per head per week, and he was satisfied that for that amount a proper industrial school could be efficiently carried out. Therefore, if a half was contributed by the State, it did not leave a very large amount to be met by voluntary effort, which in England had always been forthcoming. It had been suggested by the hon. Member for Cavan that, after a certain number, all children should be paid for at a reduced rate. That was the very proposal which he (Sir Henry Selwin-Ibbetson) made in two cases; but he was told in both cases that the managers could not accept it, and he was placed in the position of being obliged to grant 5s. per head for all. He need hardly point out that, however carefully these schools were managed, when they were paid so largely as that, the inducement was very great to thrust into the schools children who ought to be kept by their parents. If he could see his way to a solution of this most difficult question he should be exceedingly pleased, because, as he had already said, the system was one that he should like to see encouraged, not only in England, but also in Ireland. He must notice one point which had been alluded to by the hon. Member for Cavan, who complained of the scarcity of reformatories provided for Roman Catholic boys. That, he believed, would be found to be merely the result of want of local energy and want of effort, rather than the fault of a very able public servant, the Inspector of Reformatories, whose sympathies were certainly not in favour of reducing the number of these schools in the country.

Sir Henry Selwin-Ibbetson

MR. A. MOORE felt quite sure the hon. Baronet the Secretary to the Treasury wished to arrive at a fair solution of the differences between the two countries; but he desired to correct the error into which the hon. Gentleman had fallen when he said there were no voluntary efforts made in Ireland—

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON said, he had not expressed that view. What he remarked was that the voluntary contributions in Ireland did not amount to a sum in connection with the Government grant so large in comparison as it did in England.

MR. A. MOORE said, the hon. Gentleman spoke of the great voluntary efforts in this country, and said these schools were mainly due to voluntary effort. But the fact was, local bodies in this country largely assisted. For instance, the county magistrates of Middlesex built Feltham, the cost of the land and buildings being about £150,000. In Ireland, private individuals supplied every shilling spent on these industrial schools there. Thus, a large school outside Dublin, containing 700 boys, cost £30,000 of private money. He hoped the House would not be led into the impression that there was no voluntary effort made in Ireland. But he did not wish to pursue the subject further. A resolution had been passed cutting down the amount to 3*s.* 6*d.* The Elementary Education Act did not, he was glad to say, apply the school boards to Ireland; but in England there was the assistance afforded by these boards, and to ask these schools in Ireland to go on at the 3*s.* 6*d.* rate was to ask an impossibility.

MR. W. HOLMS said, that in Scotland generally industrial schools had been established by private subscriptions, and were supported from this source assisted by Government grants. He would take this opportunity of thanking the hon. Baronet the Secretary to the Treasury for having agreed to place Scotland in the same position as England and Ireland in regard to the amount of the grant per child. That was all that the Scotch people wanted.

MAJOR NOLAN feared that the change was but the thin end of the wedge, and though the financial difference, as now proposed, was slight, yet it might ultimately be fraught with important consequences. If the hon. Baronet the Secretary to the Treasury would promise that the present number of children would be always left under the 5*s.* rate, then the change would not be nearly so bad.

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON said, his proposal was that schools in the future would be treated in the same way as they were in England, and additional schools and additions to the numbers of boys in existing schools would be under the 3*s.* 6*d.* system; but old schools, with the numbers now sanctioned, would be under the old system of 5*s.* In one instance, where, in the case of some 50 boys, the proposed limitation to 3*s.* 6*d.* was put in force, it was again raised to 5*s.* in compliance with the urgent request of the neighbourhood, so that there was no disposition to make this the thin end of the wedge. If it was wished to place Ireland in the same position with England as regarded these schools, that could only be done by accepting the financial part of the question as well as every other part of the position. If that was done, all the schools with the numbers already sanctioned would be paid for at the 5*s.* rate, while all additions would be treated under the new 3*s.* 6*d.* system.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL thought the thin end of the wedge alluded to was being driven in an opposite direction to that feared by Irish Members. Instead of there being anything contrary to Irish interests, it seemed to him that the thin end of the wedge was what had been done in favour of some 50 boys beyond the prescribed number, and who, in Scotland, would only receive 3*s.* 6*d.* Scotch Members had to thank Government for putting Scotland on the same footing with England, and it was only fair that Ireland should be placed on an equal footing. He hoped the Treasury would maintain their position, and not allow this thin end of the wedge, as regarded these 50 boys, to be driven any further. There was another point to which he wished to direct attention, and that was to training-ships. He was a member of a deputation from Scotland which waited on the Home Secretary, and the right hon. Gentleman gave hopes that their representations would be favourably considered with regard to the great advantage of those ships, and especially with regard to the training ship on the Tay and its advantage to Scotland. When he considered that a boy in a training-ship only cost the Government 6*s.*, whereas a boy in an industrial school on shore cost 5*s.*, he thought the additional 1*s.* in the former case was well spent in the endeavour to turn the worst part of our juvenile population into efficient seamen; for, as they had suggested to the Home Secretary, the Mercantile Marine was at present inefficiently supplied with sailors, and was obliged to man largely with foreigners. The coasting population did not now supply the Marine to the extent that it formerly did; and, therefore, these training-ships did the country service not only by reclaiming boys from vice and misery, but by raising up a body of seamen much wanted by our Merchant Marine. He, therefore, ventured to hope that the Government would endeavour to increase the number of boys on board these ships, and that, in all arrangements affecting industrial schools, the claims of training-ships would be fairly considered.

Mr. O'DONNELL said, he would not reply to the observations of the last speaker (Sir George Campbell) upon Irish affairs. Too frequently had the hon. Member shown his ignorance of them to make it necessary to reply on this occasion. A fair solution of the question had been touched upon, but, only incidentally, by the hon. Baronet the Secretary to the Treasury. With regard to the Dungarvan school, the hon. Gentleman said he had found it necessary, after the proposed limitation had been made upon the numbers over a certain number, to raise the grant again to 5*s.* at the urgent request of the neighbourhood. Now, Irish Members would be quite content to allow the Government to establish a rule making the grant generally only 3*s.* 6*d.*, except in cases where the general consensus of the neighbourhood pointed to the fact that 3*s.* 6*d.* would be entirely inefficient. That would be a thoroughly satisfactory solution. He did not at all see the aptness of the Government argument, that they had cut down the sum for the maintenance of the boys, in order to limit the temptation to throw boys on the public who ought to be supported by their own parents. The sum to be made up would certainly not come out of the pockets of these parents, and he could not see how the parents would be restrained by this proposition. Safeguards should be applied in another direction. Let the tests be more strict to insure the boys being deserving objects, and let the experience and opinion of the neighbourhood have a voice in determining the sum necessary for their efficient maintenance. He objected to the opinion expressed by some hon. Members, that Irish Members were asking exceptional privileges for Irish industrial schools—in fact, another illustration of the way in which Ireland desired those wants supplied out of the Imperial Exchequer which in England and Scotland would be met by local contributions. The hon. Member for Clonmel (Mr. A. Moore) had pointed out that there were large contributions out of local funds in these cases in Ireland, and the Committee should remember that in all these demands on the Imperial Exchequer Ireland was impelled by the great poverty of the country. English Members might talk of local contributions and the handsome donations of local landlords; but hon. Members on both sides should remember the initial distinction between the two countries. Ireland was regularly depleted from year to year. English Members might boast of landlords and munificence; but they had not to contend with absentee landlords. Irish rents were spent in England. That fact was too notorious; and until that was remedied Ireland must apply to the Imperial Exchequer for assistance.

Mr. BIGGAR said, that in corroboration of the statement that the people of Ireland were unable to support these schools, he would cite an instance where a landlord in Cork, with a rental of £14,000 a-year, spent only 12s. a-week in the place. How, then, could it be expected that local subscriptions to these schools could be very large. He would not divide the Committee upon the point, however, even if he were able, all that he wished to do being to call attention to an undoubted grievance.

Sir George Campbell

Original Question put, and agreed to.

(2.) Motion made, and Question proposed,

“That a sum, not exceeding £20,125, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1880, for the Maintenance of Criminal Lunatics in the Broadmoor Criminal Lunatic Asylum, England.”

MR. RYLANDS moved, as an Amendment, that the Vote be reduced by the amount of £2,000, with the object of impressing upon the Government the necessity of dealing with Broadmoor Asylum in a more economical manner than had hitherto been practised. Two years ago, so unsatisfactory was the state of expenditure with regard to this institution, that the Home Secretary appointed a Departmental Committee, with the object of ascertaining whether some great improvements could be made. The Home Secretary was not by any means satisfied with the state of affairs then, and he (Mr. Rylands) did not think he could be more satisfied now. At all events, on the face of the Vote and the amount of expenditure, unless the Home Secretary could give satisfactory assurances that the expenditure would be reduced, the Committee would be justified in reducing the sum. The Report presented by the Committee to which he had alluded was of a remarkable character. On this Committee were five Gentlemen, all of very considerable authority, and the minority of two Members had such an unfavourable opinion of Broadmoor that they recommended the institution should be closed, the building pulled down, and that, making the best of the materials, a new asylum should be erected under conditions admitting of more efficient and economical control. However, the majority of three thought this drastic remedy hardly necessary. They did not think that a large public building, erected within 16 or 17 years, and under the authority of Government, could be decided to be so entirely unsuited as to make it necessary to be pulled down. They, therefore, recommended that, instead of pulling down this building, erected at enormous expenditure, considerable alteration should be made to secure efficient and economical management. But he (Mr. Rylands) could not gather from the Estimates that any of these recommendations had been adopted—perhaps, the Home Secretary would tell the Committee. He remembered that the Committee were of opinion that there was a large amount of unnecessary expenditure, increasing from year to year, on ordinary repairs of buildings, roads, fences, and drains; but he found that last year £2,000 had been spent in that way, and the Estimate contained a similar amount—an expenditure most extraordinary under the circumstances. There was an increase also by the introduction of a new item of £900 for new buildings and alterations, and that was the only evidence on the face of the Vote that anything was being done to carry out the recommendations of the Committee. He called attention to the fact that the cost of lunatics confined in this asylum was very much in excess of the cost of prisoners in gaols, and of the cost of lunatics in the lunatic asylums of the Kingdom. He was anxious the Committee should bear in mind that, though the Home Secretary declined to accept the management of this as a Government institution, yet, in point of fact, it was a Government institution. It was under the control of the Home Office, and, perhaps, they would hear how far the Home Office was able to exercise that control. There was an omission in this Estimate, to which he directed the attention of the Secretary to the Treasury. There was no statement of the number of lunatics confined in the asylum, and for which the Estimate was prepared. It would be observed that in the Estimate for Convict Prisons this information was furnished.

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON directed the hon. Member's attention to page 222.

MR. RYLANDS said, he was obliged to the hon. Gentleman. He had found the information he required. In the useful Paper issued by the Secretary to the Treasury in March last, there was a statement of the average cost of the inmates of the Broadmoor Asylum. In passing, he wished to observe that the Home Office took credit to themselves that the Vote would have shown a larger reduction, but for the item of £900 for new buildings. The net decrease was £696; and but for this £900, the absolute decrease would have been £1,596, which the Home Secretary would consider a material reduction. But, having regard to the decrease in the price of provisions and materials, and bearing in mind the Report of the Committee, he (Mr. Rylands) thought a much larger diminution of expenditure should be shown than the £1,596 for which the Home Office took credit. Much of this £1,500 was due to the reduction in the cost of maintaining the inmates. By way of comparison, let them look at the Convict Prison Estimates, and compare them with the Estimate for Criminal Lunatics. In convict establishments the cost per prisoner had been reduced from £38 10s. in 1878 to £37 8s. in 1879, and the cost in local prisons had been reduced from £24 19s. to £23. But in this case of Broadmoor the reduction was from £56 1s. in 1878 to £55 15s. in 1879. That was a reduction of but 6s. per head, and was by no means in proportion to the saving in the cost of food, &c. Perhaps they would have some explanation of this. Next, he wished to call the attention of the Committee to the important fact that while under this Vote they paid £55 15s. as the cost of criminal lunatics in Broadmoor, the cost for them in asylums managed by the county magistrates, and under the control of the county Justices, was very much less. In his county of Lancashire it was less than half, for he found from a Return presented to him as a magistrate for that county in the year 1878-9 was £21 18s. 2d. for Prestwich, £24 3s. 2d. for Rainhill, and £25 9s. for Whittingham; or an average of £23 per head. One of the main reasons for the difference arose from the difference in the cost of the staff. At Broadmoor the attendants cost per prisoner £19 10s. 5d.; while at Prestwich, in Lancashire, it was £4 16s. 4d., or only about one-fourth of the charge at Broadmoor. They might be told that a very much larger staff was required to manage a criminal lunatic asylum than an ordinary county lunatic asylum. He was prepared to dispute that altogether; and he did not believe that anything like the excess represented by the difference in these figures was necessary. In the asylum at Prestwich, for instance, there were a number of very violent lunatics; while the evidence taken before the Departmental Committee showed very distinctly that even harmless lunatics required constant attendance because of the suicidal mania with which they were afflicted. A large number of attendants were required, for instance, at Prestwich; but even admitting that a larger staff was required at Broadmoor than at the county lunatic asylums—and he was not prepared to say that some little excess was not justified—still the amount charged in the Estimates did appear to him to be beyond all reason. There could be nothing to justify so great a divergence as that between £55 15s. and £23; and as he was decidedly of opinion that these charges were excessive, he should move the reduction of the Vote by £2,000, and unless some satisfactory explanation of the difference were given, the Committee would do well to support him in making the reduction.

Mr. Rylands

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £18,125, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1880, for the Maintenance of Criminal Lunatics in the Broadmoor Criminal Lunatic Asylum, England."—(Mr. Rylands.)

SIR WALTER B. BARTTELOT regretted that some Notice had not been given of the Motion, as then the hon. Member for Berkshire (Mr. Walter) would have been present; and, doubtless, he would have been able, as a member of the Visiting Committee at Broadmoor, to have given them some reasons for the present state of things. This Vote had been before the House on many occasions; but still his hon. Friend the Member for Burnley (Mr. Rylands) had done good service in calling attention to the very high rate at which criminal lunatics were maintained in Broadmoor. He understood that his right hon. Friend the Home Secretary had made considerable changes at Broadmoor, and that the class of persons now kept there were lunatics detained "during the pleasure of Her Majesty." Those persons who had become insane while undergoing punishment were not now kept in that prison, as he understood. Many of the persons now confined there were, therefore, more or less harmless, in no way violent, as many others were. What he particularly wished to call attention to was that criminal lunatics—that was to say, persons who had become insane while undergoing a sentence of imprisonment—were now sent to the county asylums. This was the very class which was formerly maintained at Broadmoor; yet they were now kept in these county asylums at a much less rate than what they cost when at Broadmoor. He thought it was very hard that these persons should be sent to the counties. They ought to be in some more appropriate place; and he had heard many complaints about the matter from visitors, doctors, and others. It certainly was very improper that pauper lunatics should be shut up with persons who had been convicted of felony, burglary, and it might even be, in a lesser degree, of something very like murder. Surely, when the country was paying a large sum for the maintenance of Broadmoor, the county ratepayers had a right to complain that the cost of these lunatics was thrown upon them, and that they had to maintain them in their asylums. His right hon. Friend had had Memorials from a large number of counties—if not, indeed, from most of the counties in England—complaining of this practice, and he did think that a very strong case was made out. For instance, at that moment, there were in Colney Hatch 17 criminal lunatics, and five of them were under sentences for life. Why were such men to be kept in an asylum of that kind? Surely, it was not fair that the county should be charged with the cost of their maintenance. Five of these came direct from Broadmoor; and he found that several others had come from various places, their sentences having expired, but being still under police supervision, and they were transferred to the asylum under the warrant of the Secretary of State. Such men ought not to be in a county asylum. The Government, he believed, had a prison, close by Broadmoor, called Knaphill, where criminal lunatics had been sent at times; and he did not see why that should not be done again. That was a proper prison for criminal lunatics. But the conduct of the authorities there had been bitterly complained of in the way in which they sent discharged lunatics to the union in which that prison was situated. Strong complaints of this conduct had been made to the Home Secretary, though he had not yet had time to investigate them. He understood, also, that a Memorial to him was in course of preparation, complaining that these criminal lunatics, on their discharge, were taken to the workhouse and left there, instead of being passed to the asylum of the county from which they came. The Government had no right to ask the counties, after they had built asylums for these poor unfortunate suffering creatures, to put among them convicted felons and persons of the worst character. Some provision should also be made for criminal lunatics whose sentence had expired, many of whom were totally unfit to associate with ordinary lunatics in county asylums. Why should not his right hon. Friend, with 50 empty prisons at his disposal, fit up one of them in the North, and another in the South of England, to which could be sent these dangerous and violent lunatics? The counties, of course, would have to contribute for the maintenance of those whose sentences had expired. At any rate, he hoped the right hon. Gentleman would do something to relieve the counties from the necessity of receiving such persons into their asylums.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS said, when he came into Office he found at Broadmoor not only male and female prisoners sent there to be detained during Her Majesty's pleasure, who were not looked upon as criminals at all, because, of course, they were incapable of crime, but other persons mixed with them, who had been sentenced to various terms of imprisonment, and during those periods of imprisonment had become insane. Those, of course, were criminals; and though, having become insane, they could not, of course, be punished as such, still there was a difference, and a considerable difference, between them and the other class of prisoners. He found on inquiry that Broadmoor was built as a prison for persons acquitted on some charge on the ground of insanity, and that the other class had no business to be there at all. As a consequence, a great number of persons who ought to have gone to Broadmoor had been sent elsewhere, because there was no room for them. He, therefore, thought it much better to clear Broadmoor of persons who ought not to be there than to mix up criminals and lunatics, which, in his opinion, was a very wrong thing to do. As to what was to be done with them, that was a matter for argument. Of course, the counties were bound to find asylums for their lunatics; but it was a question whether it would be cheaper or more economical to keep these criminal lunatics more distinct. The simple point to be decided was, whether the counties should provide the place, or whether the Government should provide a prison, not, of course, at the cost of the Government but at the cost of the county? He was not aware that the matter was to have been brought on that evening, or he would have been prepared to give further answers. His hon. and gallant Friend (Sir Walter B. Barttelot) had also complained that, in one or two cases, the criminal lunatic had not been delivered to the proper authorities. He had no recollection of any complaints on the subject; but he would have the matter looked into. Certainly, there was no reason why the persons in question should not have been properly handed over, and he thought there must be some blame to be attributed to the person in charge. With regard to the cost of Broadmoor, he was bound to say that that subject had been a thorn in his side for some time. His hon. Friend (Sir Henry Selwin-Ibbetson) went with him when he visited the prison, and he was bound to say that he came away rather more disheartened than when he went. The real mischief of the whole thing was that the prison was built in the most extravagant style from the outset, and the arrangements of the building were such as to make a permanent waste of money almost necessary. It was very difficult to get over the original faulty construction, both in buildings and in the arrangement of rooms. The enormous size of the place, the distances at which people were kept, and the number of servants consequently necessary, made it almost impossible to bring the average of cost down to the figure of the county lunatic asylums. The character of the lunatics to be taken care of, and the numberless acts of violence committed by them, made constant watching necessary in their case. They were very much more violent indeed than the criminals who became insane. Something had already been done to reduce the expense, for whereas the Estimate in 1875-6 was £35,500, this year it was only £27,000; so that something had already been done to reduce the cost. As his hon. Friend opposite (Mr. Rylands) had said, the prison was not directly under his control. The management was vested in a body of Prison Commissioners, and he had only power over the Estimates by ordering them to be reduced. He did insist that they must be reduced, or they should not receive his signature. Accordingly, a considerable reduction was made; but, notwithstanding that, his hon. Friend (Sir Henry Selwin-Ibbetson) now told him that there would be a return to the Treasury of about £2,000. He very much regretted the absence of the hon. Member for Berkshire (Mr. Walter), who was now Chairman of the Prisons Board, and, therefore, really had a great deal more to do with the management of the prison than he had as Home Secretary. But he could tell his hon. Friends and the Committee that if there was one thing more than another which his hon. Friend the Member for Berkshire had impressed upon his mind, it was the necessity of reduction in expenditure. He hoped, with this explanation, his hon. Friend opposite would allow the Vote to pass. They had discussed over and over again whether it would not be cheaper to pull down the building and build it again elsewhere. The property certainly could not be sold at a price which would enable the Government to build again. The matter was not finally decided, for there were great difficulties in the way; but he hoped the hon. Member would leave the matter in his hands to see what could be done.

Mr. HIBBERT thought, after the promise given last year that this subject should be fully inquired into, his hon. Friend (Mr. Rylands) was fully justified in bringing forward this question. He himself rose to speak on the question raised by the hon. and gallant Baronet opposite (Sir Walter B. Barttelot), and he must say he was scarcely satisfied with the reply of the Home Secretary. He thought there would be great difficulty in dealing with these criminal lunatics in the way suggested. This particular class was as nearly allied to criminals as could be, and for years they were treated as such by being sent abroad. His right hon. Friend, on the other hand, had distributed them in various county lunatic asylums. He wished his right hon. Friend could see his way to putting this class by themselves in one of the vacant prisons; for he knew by his experience of the county lunatic asylums of Lancashire that they were a very difficult class to deal with, owing to their very unsafe character. In Prestwich Asylum, they had been obliged to build a considerable number of separate rooms of a more expensive character than those required for ordinary lunatics, in order to accommodate this class, who were of a most dangerous character. Judging by what he had seen of them, he should be very glad indeed if his right hon. Friend could see his way to placing this particular class of lunatics in a separate asylum, where also they would enjoy the advantage of being better treated than they were in county lunatic asylums. He could not agree that Broadmoor could be carried on as cheaply as a county lunatic asylum; but still he thought a very strong case had been made out for some reduction in the Vote.

Mr. Ascheton Cross

MR. WHITWELL entirely agreed with the view of the hon. and gallant Member opposite (Sir Walter B. Barttelot), that lunatics of the class alluded to by him should be excluded from ordinary county asylums. Of that there could be no question. His hon. Friend (Mr. Rylands) had presented them with a very careful and clear comparison; but he feared that he had pressed the matter too far. From his experience of county asylums, he was persuaded that patients in Broadmoor did require much more attendance and care than ordinary lunatics. Though, of course, some of the expenses might be very much reduced, still, from the nature of the building itself, it was impossible to make them as small as they were in county asylums, while to sweep away the prison altogether would only be going further and faring worse.

SIR WALTER B. BARTTELOT pointed out that his right hon. Friend, in his desire not to mix up the innocent with the guilty in the Government prison, had done the very thing which he wished to avoid, by mixing up the innocent and the guilty in the county asylums. As his right hon. Friend had taken over all the prisons in the country, he considered that he, or his Department, was bound to provide some accommodation for those persons who had become insane after some sentence of imprisonment had been passed upon them. His right hon. Friend had said that the counties ought to provide for their own criminal lunatics. But they had nothing to do with those undergoing sentences. But there were persons who had undergone sentence, and whose sentences were expired, who also, as he had explained, ought not to be in county asylums. Then came the question, what was to be done with them? He did hope his right hon. Friend would make some provision for these unfortunate people.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS explained, that he only said that the counties must provide for these lunatics. He quite agreed that while they were under sentence the Government must undertake the care of them. But when that sentence had expired, these persons became ordinary lunatics, and the care of them devolved on the counties.

MR. FLOYER felt himself much indebted to the hon. Member for Burnley (Mr. Rylands) for bringing forward this question, for everyone who had had anything to do with the management of county asylums knew that one of the greatest difficulties they had to contend with was the care and guarding of these criminal lunatics. They could not stop escapes without a very much larger staff of attendants than was otherwise necessary, or unless they practised a system of confinement which, happily, was now a thing of the past. Escapes, therefore, did happen. Yet, when they had to deal with these criminal lunatics, it was very important that they should not escape, as such an accident might be attended with very serious consequences. Men suffering from homicidal or murderous propensities might escape, and it was very difficult in ordinary county asylums to take such effectual precautions as would absolutely prevent escapes. He did, therefore, venture to press upon the Home Secretary the very great importance and necessity of making such provision as his hon. and gallant Friend (Sir Walter B. Barttelot) had suggested. Usually the number of criminal lunatics in the country was very small; and it was almost impossible, without very great and unnecessary expense, to make proper provision in those asylums for these persons. It had been suggested that two prisons, one in the North and one in the South, should be devoted to the reception of this particular class; and he thought that accommodation would be adequate, and something which it was very desirable should be granted. Undoubtedly, the experiment conducted at Broadmoor had been, up to the present time, of a very expensive character. For instance, there were two clerks and two assistant clerks to keep the books, and in that point he thought there might be some reduction made. Certainly, he knew from his own experience that one clerk was quite sufficient for the work, if it were only done in a proper and ordinary way. He admitted, with his hon. and gallant Friend, that more attendants were requisite than in an ordinary asylum to deal with these criminal lunatics. Still, there was great room for reduction of expenditure, and he was glad to hear that the Home Secretary was doing his best to bring it about. They all knew the practical ability and knowledge of the hon. Member for Berkshire (Mr. Walter); and he, therefore, hoped that this conversation would not be without some result.

MR. RAMSAY, having on more than one occasion called attention to this matter himself, was glad that the hon. Member for Burnley (Mr. Rylands) had brought it now before the Committee. The expense of one prison under the management of the Home Secretary ought not to be greater than another, and until that result was arrived at hon. Members would do well to continue to debate the Vote. He had himself visited Broadmoor in order to discover what was the cause of this great difference in expense, and certainly he thought there was nothing in the arrangement of the building which justified it. It was quite true that criminal lunatics did require greater attention and restraint than ordinary patients in county asylums; but, then, the persons confined in Broadmoor were not at all of that class. However insane they might have been at the time of their trial, many of them certainly were not now insane; and, therefore, the expense incurred for their maintenance and detention was not greater than that required for an ordinary insane person.

Mr. Floyer

He did hope that the right hon. Gentleman, having turned his attention to the cost of Broadmoor, would continue his efforts in the direction of economy until he was able to present an Estimate reduced by at least one-half from that now before them.

SIR ANDREW LUSK asked, if it was worth while to spend so much time about a few lunatics at Broadmoor, when there were so many others in the country? This was a very small Vote, and a peculiar Vote. These were persons who had been declared by doctors to be insane, and not to understand the nature of the crime which they had attempted or committed. They were, as a consequence, taken care of and sent to Broadmoor, in order to prevent the possibility of their committing the same crime again. It was easy to find fault; but it was not so easy to manage a prison of this kind. He did not object to the Vote, for it must always be an expensive and troublesome matter to look after persons of this description.

MR. RYLANDS said, after the statement of the Home Secretary, he should not think of pressing his Motion to a Division, for it was satisfactory in every way. He knew the right hon. Gentleman was most anxiously desirous to keep down expenditure. He had the greatest confidence in him and in the hon. Member for Berkshire (Mr. Walter), and he believed they would be able to make considerable reductions. He should look forward with confidence to the next Estimate, and would now ask leave to withdraw his Motion.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

(3). £49,613, to complete the sum for the Lord Advocate and Criminal Proceedings, Scotland.

MR. O'DONNELL wished to ask a question with reference to Dundee. He should be glad to know how far the right hon. and learned Lord Advocate had proceeded in dealing with the recent riots in Dundee? Catholics were very much indebted to the Law Officer for Scotland for the fair-minded and courteous way in which he had answered the Question put to him some time ago on this subject; but there was a good deal of curiosity felt by them to know how the affair was going on now. It seemed that there had been a public meeting in Dundee, a few days ago, to discuss the question, from which he gathered that the Lord Advocate was making some inquiries. Had anything been decided upon? Of course, if the thing was still pending, he would not harass the Lord Advocate by pressing the question. In calling attention to the disturbances, he (Mr. O'Donnell) was actuated in no way by any desire to restrain the fullest freedom of discussion on all questions, religious and political; but what the Catholics and a great many of the Protestants of Dundee complained of was, that the mask of religious discussion was merely assumed by a low adventurer and impostor to commit a gross outrage upon the religious convictions of a section of the population. He understood from the right hon. and learned Lord Advocate that the Scotch law was broad enough and strong enough to deal with a case of this kind, and he merely wished to know if the inquiries were ended, and if any proceedings were to be taken?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS said, he discussed this matter with the Lord Advocate at some length before it was brought to the notice of the House; and the answer given by the right hon. and learned Lord Advocate, which was so satisfactory to the House and the public generally, was the result of that conference. Of course, the Government had not the least desire to interfere with the right of free discussion, when properly and fairly exercised. With regard to the present state of affairs, the Lord Advocate had gone to Scotland during the Recess to make some inquiries. He expected him to have returned that evening; but, as he had not yet returned, he (Mr. Cross) could not, at present, answer the question.

MR. RYLANDS regretted that the right hon. and learned Lord Advocate was absent; because it was, of course, under such circumstances, rather unreasonable to press the Government for information. Still, he must call attention to the salaries of the procurators fiscal. He thought it had been arranged, in the year 1850, that these gentlemen were to be paid by salaries instead of fees, these salaries being fixed upon a calculation as to the average income derived from the fees of previous years, which, according to the Scotch language used, was received for business "chargeable in Exchequer." It seemed, however, that the procurator fiscal did other work, not chargeable in Exchequer, but chargeable to county rates. That business was not included in the salaries. They continued to receive the fees chargeable on the county, and they were also allowed to receive other fees from private parties for prosecutions under special statutes. From these two sources it would be seen that the procurators fiscal derived sums of money which were set forth in the Estimates under the heading "remuneration ex-officio," in addition to salaries voted. The Return was peculiar. In Clackmannan, for instance, the procurator fiscal received a salary of £400 a-year, and from other fees received £50 a-year; whereas in Airdrie, where the salary was £570 a-year, the other fees only produced £9 3s. There were similar discrepancies to be observed throughout the Estimate, showing that in some counties there was very little of the business chargeable to the county rates, and that very few fees were derived from private prosecutions; whereas these fees in other counties considerably increased the remuneration of the procurator fiscal. He observed that the procurators fiscal of Edinburgh and Glasgow had declined to give any Return to the Government of the amount they received from these sources. He thought the Government ought to insist upon receiving a Return. The whole system of payment appeared to him to be open to serious objection; and it appeared to him that the Government would do well to get rid of the payment by fees, and to do away with the arrangement by which they were paid in this way under special statutes. With regard to these fees for prosecutions under special statutes, he should like to know, also, what they were?

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON was exceedingly sorry that the right hon. and learned Lord Advocate was not present to give a better answer upon this point than he could give. While he could not say under what statutes these fees were allowed, he thought the Return showed that they were only received in cases where the public duties of the procurator fiscal permitted him to undertake the duties for which they were received. It was only when the work for which he was paid by salary was not so important as to occupy his whole time that he was allowed to derive profits from other work. With regard to the Edinburgh official, he thought he had made a proper Return. He had explained that he had no remuneration from either of these private sources, and he imagined that was the explanation of the Glasgow case as well. The word "Nil" should have appeared in the printed Papers, instead of the words "No return." He would look into this question of the procurators fiscal, and, if the hon. Gentleman the Member for Burnley (Mr. Rylands) wished it, give him fuller explanations on Report.

MR. FRASER-MACKINTOSH explained, that the procurator fiscal was alone responsible for the prosecution of certain offences in Scotland, and he pursued for penalties and recovered certain fees in connection with these prosecutions. The hon. Member for Burnley's (Mr. Rylands's) observations raised an important question regarding procurators fiscal; and it would be remembered that, in the discussion two years ago on the Sheriffs Courts Bill, the majority of Scottish Members present expressed their opinion, and recorded it by a Division, that these gentlemen should confine themselves to their public duties. He (Mr. Fraser-Mackintosh) thought they should be appointed by the Crown, properly paid, and required to discharge their public duties and no others.

MR. RYLANDS said, the right hon. and learned Lord Advocate might not return in time to enable the hon. Gentleman to give the further information he had so courteously promised, and he (Mr. Rylands) would be glad to rest content with the promise that the subject should receive the attention of the Treasury. He understood that promise to be implied in what had been said. [Sir HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON assented.] If the matter was considered at the Treasury, he believed certain good might be done. He did not like to see gentlemen in an official position having receipts which were not in the form of salary, and he thought the Returns should be complete, or some explanation given.

SIR ANDREW LUSK said, some system of this kind was being introduced into England, and he hoped they would be very careful how they took it in hand, for it would certainly be a great expense, especially if the whole thing was not properly planned. They had many things cheaper in Scotland than in England; but before they took up a system of procurators fiscal they had better count the cost, and take care to see what they were about.

Vote agreed to.

(4.) £45,931, to complete the sum for Courts of Law and Justice, Scotland.

MR. W. HOLMS said, he would like to call the attention of the Committee to the way in which some of these salaries were made up. For instance, under the head of "Court of Sessions," it was shown that out of 58 clerks 17 either had incomes from annuities, or fees from private practice, or enjoyed a plurality of offices. He thought this was altogether a wrong system. It was well to know distinctly who were and who were not the servants of the Crown, and to have, instead of 58 persons who would give a divided attention to their duties, a smaller number who would bestow upon their work an undivided attention. One assistant clerk, who was paid under this Vote £475 a-year, had also £275 as a "Circuit Clerk in Justiciary." He could not satisfactorily attend to both these offices. Then, £700 was paid to the Auditor of the Court. It was evident that he received a considerable amount of fees, for it was explained in a note to the Estimates that of the amount he received for extra-judicial remits it was difficult to say "the amount he received ex officio." He (Mr. W. Holms) thought it absurd that the Auditor of the Court should have a considerable amount of fees from private work. It was a very unsatisfactory state of things, for if an Auditor was allowed to have private work, the Government had no control over his work.

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON said, the question had been discussed at considerable length in previous Sessions. He could only repeat the argument then offered—that it was often of advantage to the Public Service to get the services of a man of large experience to undertake certain work, even though he had been employed in some other Office, or had some private work. In many cases, a man might be in receipt of fees from other sources; but it did not by any means follow that he neglected his public duties, or that he did not comply with the regulations of his Office as to the number of hours he should give to the Public Service in return for the salary paid him. The real cause of this information being given was that the House, some years ago, was anxious to ascertain as far as possible what the actual emoluments were, from all sources, of all public servants. In working that out, every official was asked whether he was in receipt of any sort of official salary other than that which he received from his post? Of course, they were not able to give the amounts where men were of literary habits and made money in that way; but, wherever the facts could be obtained, they were printed in the notes. In some cases, as, for instance, that of the Auditor to the Court, a man was not wanted for the whole of his time, and they got much better men by allowing them, when their services were not required by the Government, to augment their income from other sources. If they were to draw a hard-and-fast line, they would very often either lose the services of very valuable public servants, or they would have to pay very much higher salaries than were at present charged on the Estimates.

Sir Henry Selwin-Ibbetson

MR. RYLANDS thought the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury had rather missed the point of the remark. He presumed that they offered certain fair salaries for the public duties, and not such salaries as a man of suitable capacity would not be likely to take. They professed to offer a salary capable to secure the ability fitted for the office. Then they had a right to ask the individual for a return of all he received from the State, either as salary for duties, or as compensation for loss of office. Of course, they did not ask what were his private emoluments. He always understood, also, that a pension became merged in a salary, if the receiver of the pension returned to the Public Service. For instance, the Prime Minister at the present time was in receipt of a salary as Prime Minister, and that merged his pension as a Cabinet Minister. He could mention a great many instances in which the same principle was carried out; and, therefore, he did not understand how these clerks and assistant clerks could be in receipt of annuities varying from £80 to £160 a-year, which were, in fact, pensions received by them as late Judges' clerks, which, apparently, did not merge in their salaries. He did not quite understand why that was so,

and he certainly thought there ought to be some good reason for it. With regard to the auditor, the Secretary to the Treasury did not appear to him to have quite answered the objection. The note to the Vote was—

“The Auditor receives a considerable amount of fees for extra-judicial remits and other business, but he has difficulty in stating separately the amount he receives ex-officio.”

If that meant that, practically, he made such large profits that he was unable to give particulars, as he supposed it did, then, of course, they could not call upon him to make a return of then. But he might ask, also, the very plain question, whether they ought to appoint, at a salary of £700 a-year, a gentleman who received such a very large amount of fees from his private practice that he could not state the amount? Practically, he had no doubt that this gentleman was making a very large income, and it created a suspicion that the work he was doing outside was, probably, a good deal more remunerative than that for which they were paying him.

MR. RAMSAY pointed out that the question involved in this case was, whether the State should employ any gentleman who undertook professional duties in addition to his official work, and was, therefore, the same as that just raised in regard to the procurators fiscal. He rose to ask the Home Secretary whether he was able to give them any information as to the view he had taken regarding the office of Sheriff, and, also, whether he had come to any conclusion as regarded the constitution of the Court of Session? There was one vacancy in that Court at present; but he thought there was no reason why there should not be a greater number of vacancies, if they should occur. He had no desire to urge the Home Secretary to make any appointment to the vacant office. But while he thought the number of Judges in excess of that required for the discharge of public business, he was of opinion that a permanent alteration in the number of the Judges must be accompanied by some variation in the present constitution of the Court. The number of Judges who sat to hear appeals would have to be smaller. There were four, at present, and that was too many. It would be also interesting to know whether the Home Secretary had yet seen his way to reduce the number of Sheriffs-Substitute in any district in Scotland where he might be of opinion that the duties were so light as not to require that the office should be filled up when vacant. Nothing, so far as he (Mr. Ramsay) had been informed, had yet been done in the way of reducing the number of the Sheriffs-Substitute, although the right hon. Gentleman promised to give his best consideration to this matter when the Sheriffs Court Bill was before them.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS: I really cannot give the Committee any information that we have arrived at any definite decision in regard to these matters. We have shown our inclination, as far as the Court of Session is concerned, by allowing the vacancy to remain open so long, and I think hon. Gentlemen will be able to conclude pretty much from this what our views are in this matter. My right hon. and learned Friend the Lord Advocate undertook, in the Recess, to make further inquiries, not only as to the Court of Session, but as to the Sheriffs-Substitute. I think that the hon. Gentleman is wrong in saying that no step has been taken. In one case, I think, a reduction has been made.

MR. FRASER-MACKINTOSH here rose to say that there had been no fewer than two reductions in the North, where there were great complaints in consequence. He referred to Nairn and Tain.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS: It appears that there are two cases, and I was just going to say that one case was in my mind, because we had many complaints as to the action we had taken. That, however, is not proof of an insuperable objection. Time will show what can best be done, and where it should be done. There are difficulties, in some places, owing to the long distances between populous places in some parts of Scotland. What I have said will show that the matter has not been lost sight of.

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON said, in reply to the hon. Member for Burnley (Mr. Rylands), that he thought it would be a hard case if there was to be no superannuation at all for officers re-entering the Public Service. It was the rule that pensions granted to public servants should not exceed the total amount of the salaries before received; but, in the cases referred to by the hon. Member, it would be depriving them of what was practically given for life, to refuse the grants made under particular statutes, and compensation for loss on the abolition of offices previously held. It really amounted to this—the hon. Member was anxious to get officers at a fixed salary, and it might be possible to get men without any other other occupation; but it very often happened that men could be got who had a far greater amount of knowledge, who would give the same amount of time to the Public Service, and who were in receipt of these compensations, or, being in private practice, derived emoluments from that source. By this means, the public obtained the services of men of greater experience than could be secured by the payment of salary only, as in some instances that cropped up last year. The public time was not trenched upon, and often a more efficient servant was obtained. With regard to the services of an Auditor, that was one of those cases in which they must have a man of a certain position and knowledge. The duty of auditing a particular Office was not one that should occupy the entire time of an individual. The higher class of public servant only could be employed, and the Public Service obtained from him all that could be expected, whoever he might be. It was almost to be regretted that so much information had been given with regard to salaries which were not in all cases paid out of the public funds.

MR. RAMSAY hoped the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary would not allow local clamour in every district to prevail, but would take into consideration each case on its merits, and judge it on the evidence that might arise. As to the office of Sheriff-Substitute, he was quite aware that the right hon. Gentleman yielded in one case to local clamour. He trusted that would not occur again, because, when Sheriffs-Substitute had been elected, they had been generally well fitted for the offices for which they were chosen. It was absurd to speak of long distances, as if these were inconvenient or of any disadvantage to the Sheriff. He (Mr. Ramsay) lived in a district where they had to travel 200 miles to any Court of Law, and he believed there was no district where there was less of crime and less of litigation than in that locality. He could, therefore, speak as to the possibility of some of these offices being dispensed with whenever an opportunity occurred, and trusted that public clamour would not be allowed to prevent the saving of public money on the occurrence of vacancies.

Mr. Ramsay

SIR ANDREW LUSK believed it to be a good thing that people should have to travel 200 miles to a Court of Law. The commercial classes in this country had formed the opinion that the Courts of Session in Scotland and the Irish Courts were over-manned, and that the expense connected with them was out of all proportion to the amount of work which they had to get through. Litigation in this country could not be always avoided, and it was the complaint of the commercial class, who were sometimes engaged in it through circumstances over which they had no control, that they were kept waiting too long for justice, and that there were so many men in the various Courts who had nothing to do but to create all kinds of obstruction. He was glad to hear the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary say that time would be taken to consider whether the vacancy in the Court of Session should be filled up or not, for even in London many people were beginning to think that the number of Judges was too great for the work that had to be done. A great deal of time was taken up by the Courts of Appeal where, perhaps, five or six Judges were occupied with some Church of England or parish scandal, to the detriment of the commercial classes, who could not get their cases tried.

MR. FRASER-MACKINTOSH, with respect to the statement that there were too many Judges in Scotland, said, he was not now going to give an opinion; but as the Vote included the Judges' salaries, he would be very sorry this discussion closed without any Scottish Member getting up, as he was happy to do, and recording his praise of the way business was managed in the Court of Session. Of late years, the business of the Court of Session had been conducted with very great ability indeed. The City of Glasgow Bank closed its doors early in October last, and the numerous important cases arising out of the stoppage had been promptly, but carefully, disposed of by the Court of Session, and had been determined by the House of Lords. The Lord Chancellor said, and said very rightly, that there was seldom so much ability displayed as in the Court of Session.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS desired to add his testimony to the ability of the Court of Session. It was a great honour to Scotland.

MR. O'DONNELL asked for an explanation of items under sub-head D for Sheriffs, as well as for the Procurator Fiscal, who was paid by a salary of £3,000. It seemed, as a rule, that there were very few salaries paid to officers; while a number of curious fees of all kinds were mentioned, of which, in some cases, there were no returns.

THE CHAIRMAN pointed out that the remarks of the hon. Member were out of place, the Vote to which he was referring having been already passed.

MR. BIGGAR was bound to say that the balance of argument was entirely in favour of Government officials not taking private business. He gave full weight to the argument of the Secretary to the Treasury, with regard to the necessity of getting good men for the Public Service; but he could not help feeling that those men who had private business to attend to would often perform their public duties in a most careless manner, their offices in that way becoming sometimes little else than sinecures. There were, for instance, in Ireland, such offices as Clerk of the Peace and Clerk of the Crown, where gentlemen received salaries and had, at the same time, private practice, the actual business of the Crown being done by a clerk at a small salary, while another gentleman received a large salary for doing nothing. It would, in his opinion, be much better that those public servants should give their whole time to the service of the Crown, and receive salaries in proportion to the work which they performed; on the other hand, if there was not sufficient occupation for the persons appointed, the offices should be abolished. With regard to the question of pensions—which he thought the hon. Baronet (Sir Henry Selwin-Ibbetson) had explained in an unsatisfactory manner—he was of opinion that gentlemen should not have an opportunity of retiring from an official position upon a pension, unless it was shown to the satisfaction of the authorities that they were incapacitated for performing the duties of their office; while the system of giving pensions to young men who might last out a generation was, to his mind, thoroughly preposterous.

for them. He, therefore, thought it much better to clear Broadmoor of persons who ought not to be there than to mix up criminals and lunatics, which, in his opinion, was a very wrong thing to do. As to what was to be done with them, that was a matter for argument. Of course, the counties were bound to find asylums for their lunatics; but it was a question whether it would be cheaper or more economical to keep these criminal lunatics more distinct. The simple point to be decided was, whether the counties should provide the place, or whether the Government should provide a prison, not, of course, at the cost of the Government but at the cost of the county? He was not aware that the matter was to have been brought on that evening, or he would have been prepared to give further answers. His hon. and gallant Friend (Sir Walter B. Barttelot) had also complained that, in one or two cases, the criminal lunatic had not been delivered to the proper authorities. He had no recollection of any complaints on the subject; but he would have the matter looked into. Certainly, there was no reason why the persons in question should not have been properly handed over, and he thought there must be some blame to be attributed to the person in charge. With regard to the cost of Broadmoor, he was bound to say that that subject had been a thorn in his side for some time. His hon. Friend (Sir Henry Selwin-Ibbetson) went with him when he visited the prison, and he was bound to say that he came away rather more disheartened than when he went. The real mischief of the whole thing was that the prison was built in the most extravagant style from the outset, and the arrangements of the building were such as to make a permanent waste of money almost necessary. It was very difficult to get over the original faulty construction, both in buildings and in the arrangement of rooms. The enormous size of the place, the distances at which people were kept, and the number of servants consequently necessary, made it almost impossible to bring the average of cost down to the figure of the county lunatic asylums. The character of the lunatics to be taken care of, and the numberless acts of violence committed by them, made constant watching necessary in their case. They were very much more violent indeed than the criminals who became insane. Something had already been done to reduce the expense, for whereas the Estimate in 1875-6 was £35,500, this year it was only £27,000; so that something had already been done to reduce the cost. As his hon. Friend opposite (Mr. Rylands) had said, the prison was not directly under his control. The management was vested in a body of Prison Commissioners, and he had only power over the Estimates by ordering them to be reduced. He did insist that they must be reduced, or they should not receive his signature. Accordingly, a considerable reduction was made; but, notwithstanding that, his hon. Friend (Sir Henry Selwin-Ibbetson) now told him that there would be a return to the Treasury of about £2,000. He very much regretted the absence of the hon. Member for Berkshire (Mr. Walter), who was now Chairman of the Prisons Board, and, therefore, really had a great deal more to do with the management of the prison than he had as Home Secretary. But he could tell his hon. Friends and the Committee that if there was one thing more than another which his hon. Friend the Member for Berkshire had impressed upon his mind, it was the necessity of reduction in expenditure. He hoped, with this explanation, his hon. Friend opposite would allow the Vote to pass. They had discussed over and over again whether it would not be cheaper to pull down the building and build it again elsewhere. The property certainly could not be sold at a price which would enable the Government to build again. The matter was not finally decided, for there were great difficulties in the way; but he hoped the hon. Member would leave the matter in his hands to see what could be done.

Mr. HIBBERT thought, after the promise given last year that this subject should be fully inquired into, his hon. Friend (Mr. Rylands) was fully justified in bringing forward this question. He himself rose to speak on the question raised by the hon. and gallant Baronet opposite (Sir Walter B. Barttelot), and he must say he was scarcely satisfied with the reply of the Home Secretary. He thought there would be great difficulty in dealing with these criminal lunatics in the way suggested. This particular class was as nearly allied to criminals as could be, and for years they were treated as such by being sent abroad. His right hon. Friend, on the other hand, had distributed them in various county lunatic asylums. He wished his right hon. Friend could see his way to putting this class by themselves in one of the vacant prisons; for he knew by his experience of the county lunatic asylums of Lancashire that they were a very difficult class to deal with, owing to their very unsafe character. In Prestwich Asylum, they had been obliged to build a considerable number of separate rooms of a more expensive character than those required for ordinary lunatics, in order to accommodate this class, who were of a most dangerous character. Judging by what he had seen of them, he should be very glad indeed if his right hon. Friend could see his way to placing this particular class of lunatics in a separate asylum, where also they would enjoy the advantage of being better treated than they were in county lunatic asylums. He could not agree that Broadmoor could be carried on as cheaply as a county lunatic asylum; but still he thought a very strong case had been made out for some reduction in the Vote.

Mr. Ascheton Cross

MR. WHITWELL entirely agreed with the view of the hon. and gallant Member opposite (Sir Walter B. Barttelot), that lunatics of the class alluded to by him should be excluded from ordinary county asylums. Of that there could be no question. His hon. Friend (Mr. Rylands) had presented them with a very careful and clear comparison; but he feared that he had pressed the matter too far. From his experience of county asylums, he was persuaded that patients in Broadmoor did require much more attendance and care than ordinary lunatics. Though, of course, some of the expenses might be very much reduced, still, from the nature of the building itself, it was impossible to make them as small as they were in county asylums, while to sweep away the prison altogether would only be going further and faring worse.

SIR WALTER B. BARTELOT pointed out that his right hon. Friend, in his desire not to mix up the innocent with the guilty in the Government prison, had done the very thing which he wished to avoid, by mixing up the innocent and the guilty in the county asylums. As his right hon. Friend had taken over all the prisons in the country, he considered that he, or his Department, was bound to provide some accommodation for those persons who had become insane after some sentence of imprisonment had been passed upon them. His right hon. Friend had said that the counties ought to provide for their own criminal lunatics. But they had nothing to do with those undergoing sentences. But there were persons who had undergone sentence, and whose sentences were expired, who also, as he had explained, ought not to be in county asylums. Then came the question, what was to be done with them? He did hope his right hon. Friend would make some provision for these unfortunate people.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS explained, that he only said that the counties must provide for these lunatics. He quite agreed that while they were under sentence the Government must undertake the care of them. But when that sentence had expired, these persons became ordinary lunatics, and the care of them devolved on the counties.

MR. FLOYER felt himself much indebted to the hon. Member for Burnley (Mr. Rylands) for bringing forward this question, for everyone who had had anything to do with the management of county asylums knew that one of the greatest difficulties they had to contend with was the care and guarding of these criminal lunatics. They could not stop escapes without a very much larger staff of attendants than was otherwise necessary, or unless they practised a system of confinement which, happily, was now a thing of the past. Escapes, therefore, did happen. Yet, when they had to deal with these criminal lunatics, it was very important that they should not escape, as such an accident might be attended with very serious consequences. Men suffering from homicidal or murderous propensities might escape, and it was very difficult in ordinary county asylums to take such effectual precautions as would absolutely prevent escapes. He did, therefore, very much press upon the Home Secretary and gallant great importance and necessity that such provision as his hon. Member for Friend (Sir Walter B. Barttelot) had suggested. Usually the almost impossible, without very small; and it was

was not so important as to occupy his whole time that he was allowed to derive profits from other work. With regard to the Edinburgh official, he thought he had made a proper Return. He had explained that he had no remuneration from either of these private sources, and he imagined that was the explanation of the Glasgow case as well. The word "Nil" should have appeared in the printed Papers, instead of the words "No return." He would look into this question of the procurators fiscal, and, if the hon. Gentleman the Member for Burnley (Mr. Rylands) wished it, give him fuller explanations on Report.

MR. FRASER-MACKINTOSH explained, that the procurator fiscal was alone responsible for the prosecution of certain offences in Scotland, and he pursued for penalties and recovered certain fees in connection with these prosecutions. The hon. Member for Burnley's (Mr. Rylands's) observations raised an important question regarding procurators fiscal; and it would be remembered that, in the discussion two years ago on the Sheriffs Courts Bill, the majority of Scottish Members present expressed their opinion, and recorded it by a Division, that these gentlemen should confine themselves to their public duties. He (Mr. Fraser-Mackintosh) thought they should be appointed by the Crown, properly paid, and required to discharge their public duties and no others.

MR. RYLANDS said, the right hon. and learned Lord Advocate might not return in time to enable the hon. Gentleman to give the further information he had so courteously promised, and he (Mr. Rylands) would be glad to rest content with the promise that the subject should receive the attention of the Treasury. He understood that promise to be implied in what had been said. [Sir HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON assented.] If the matter was considered at the Treasury, he believed certain good might be done. He did not like to see gentlemen in an official position having receipts which were not in the form of salary, and he thought the Returns should be complete, or some explanation given.

SIR ANDREW LUSK said, some system of this kind was being introduced into England, and he hoped they would be very careful how they took it in hand, for it would certainly be a great expense, especially if the whole thing was not properly planned. They had many things cheaper in Scotland than in England; but before they took up a system of procurators fiscal they had better count the cost, and take care to see what they were about.

Vote agreed to.

(4.) £45,931, to complete the sum for Courts of Law and Justice, Scotland.

MR. W. HOLMS said, he would like to call the attention of the Committee to the way in which some of these salaries were made up. For instance, under the head of "Court of Sessions," it was shown that out of 58 clerks 17 either had incomes from annuities, or fees from private practice, or enjoyed a plurality of offices. He thought this was altogether a wrong system. It was well to know distinctly who were and who were not the servants of the Crown, and to have, instead of 58 persons who would give a divided attention to their duties, a smaller number who would bestow upon their work an undivided attention. One assistant clerk, who was paid under this Vote £475 a-year, had also £275 as a "Circuit Clerk in Justiciary." He could not satisfactorily attend to both these offices. Then, £700 was paid to the Auditor of the Court. It was evident that he received a considerable amount of fees, for it was explained in a note to the Estimates that of the amount he received for extra-judicial remits it was difficult to say "the amount he received ex officio." He (Mr. W. Holms) thought it absurd that the Auditor of the Court should have a considerable amount of fees from private work. It was a very unsatisfactory state of things, for if an Auditor was allowed to have private work, the Government had no control over his work.

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON said, the question had been discussed at considerable length in previous Sessions. He could only repeat the argument then offered—that it was often of advantage to the Public Service to get the services of a man of large experience to undertake certain work, even though he had been employed in some other Office, or had some private work. In many cases, a man might be in receipt of fees from other sources; but it did not by any means follow that he neglected his public duties, or that he did not comply with the regulations of his Office as to the

Sir Henry Selwin-Ibbetson

that there had been a public meeting in Dundee, a few days ago, to discuss the question, from which he gathered that the Lord Advocate was making some inquiries. Had anything been decided upon? Of course, if the thing was still pending, he would not harass the Lord Advocate by pressing the question. In calling attention to the disturbances, he (Mr. O'Donnell) was actuated in no way by any desire to restrain the fullest freedom of discussion on all questions, religious and political; but what the Catholics and a great many of the Protestants of Dundee complained of was, that the mask of religious discussion was merely assumed by a low adventurer and impostor to commit a gross outrage upon the religious convictions of a section of the population. He understood from the right hon. and learned Lord Advocate that the Scotch law was broad enough and strong enough to deal with a case of this kind, and he merely wished to know if the inquiries were ended, and if any proceedings were to be taken?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS said, he discussed this matter with the Lord Advocate at some length before it was brought to the notice of the House; and the answer given by the right hon. and learned Lord Advocate, which was so satisfactory to the House and the public generally, was the result of that conference. Of course, the Government had not the least desire to interfere with the right of free discussion, when properly and fairly exercised. With regard to the present state of affairs, the Lord Advocate had gone to Scotland during the Recess to make some inquiries. He expected him to have returned that evening; but, as he had not yet returned, he (Mr. Cross) could not, at present, answer the question.

MR. RYLANDS regretted that the right hon. and learned Lord Advocate was absent; because it was, of course, under such circumstances, rather unreasonable to press the Government for information. Still, he must call attention to the salaries of the procurators fiscal. He thought it had been arranged, in the year 1850, that these gentlemen were to be paid by salaries instead of fees, these salaries being fixed upon a calculation as to the average income derived from the fees of previous years, which, according to the Scotch language used, was received for business "chargeable in Exchequer." It seemed, however, that the procurator fiscal did other work, not chargeable in Exchequer, but chargeable to county rates. That business was not included in the salaries. They continued to receive the fees chargeable on the county, and they were also allowed to receive other fees from private parties for prosecutions under special statutes. From these two sources it would be seen that the procurators fiscal derived sums of money which were set forth in the Estimates under the heading "remuneration ex-officio," in addition to salaries voted. The Return was peculiar. In Clackmannan, for instance, the procurator fiscal received a salary of £400 a-year, and from other fees received £50 a-year; whereas in Airdrie, where the salary was £570 a-year, the other fees only produced £9 3s. There were similar discrepancies to be observed throughout the Estimate, showing that in some counties there was very little of the business chargeable to the county rates, and that very few fees were derived from private prosecutions; whereas these fees in other counties considerably increased the remuneration of the procurator fiscal. He observed that the procurators fiscal of Edinburgh and Glasgow had declined to give any Return to the Government of the amount they received from these sources. He thought the Government ought to insist upon receiving a Return. The whole system of payment appeared to him to be open to serious objection; and it appeared to him that the Government would do well to get rid of the payment by fees, and to do away with the arrangement by which they were paid in this way under special statutes. With regard to these fees for prosecutions under special statutes, he should like to know, also, what they were?

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON was exceedingly sorry that the right hon. and learned Lord Advocate was not present to give a better answer upon this point than he could give. While he could not say under what statutes these fees were allowed, he thought the Return showed that they were only received in cases where the public duties of the procurator fiscal permitted him to undertake the duties for which they were received. It was only when the work for which he was paid by salary was not so important as to occupy his whole time that he was allowed to derive profits from other work. With regard to the Edinburgh official, he thought he had made a proper Return. He had explained that he had no remuneration from either of these private sources, and he imagined that was the explanation of the Glasgow case as well. The word "Nil" should have appeared in the printed Papers, instead of the words "No return." He would look into this question of the procurators fiscal, and, if the hon. Gentleman the Member for Burnley (Mr. Rylands) wished it, give him fuller explanations on Report.

MR. FRASER-MACKINTOSH explained, that the procurator fiscal was alone responsible for the prosecution of certain offences in Scotland, and he pursued for penalties and recovered certain fees in connection with these prosecutions. The hon. Member for Burnley's (Mr. Rylands's) observations raised an important question regarding procurators fiscal; and it would be remembered that, in the discussion two years ago on the Sheriffs Courts Bill, the majority of Scottish Members present expressed their opinion, and recorded it by a Division, that these gentlemen should confine themselves to their public duties. He (Mr. Fraser-Mackintosh) thought they should be appointed by the Crown, properly paid, and required to discharge their public duties and no others.

MR. RYLANDS said, the right hon. and learned Lord Advocate might not return in time to enable the hon. Gentleman to give the further information he had so courteously promised, and he (Mr. Rylands) would be glad to rest content with the promise that the subject should receive the attention of the Treasury. He understood that promise to be implied in what had been said. [Sir HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON assented.] If the matter was considered at the Treasury, he believed certain good might be done. He did not like to see gentlemen in an official position having receipts which were not in the form of salary, and he thought the Returns should be complete, or some explanation given.

SIR ANDREW LUSK said, some system of this kind was being introduced into England, and he hoped they would be very careful how they took it in hand, for it would certainly be a great expense, especially if the whole thing was not properly planned. They had many things cheaper in Scotland than in England; but before they took up a system of procurators fiscal they had better count the cost, and take care to see what they were about.

Vote agreed to.

(4.) £45,931, to complete the sum for Courts of Law and Justice, Scotland.

MR. W. HOLMS said, he would like to call the attention of the Committee to the way in which some of these salaries were made up. For instance, under the head of "Court of Sessions," it was shown that out of 58 clerks 17 either had incomes from annuities, or fees from private practice, or enjoyed a plurality of offices. He thought this was altogether a wrong system. It was well to know distinctly who were and who were not the servants of the Crown, and to have, instead of 58 persons who would give a divided attention to their duties, a smaller number who would bestow upon their work an undivided attention. One assistant clerk, who was paid under this Vote £475 a-year, had also £275 as a "Circuit Clerk in Justiciary." He could not satisfactorily attend to both these offices. Then, £700 was paid to the Auditor of the Court. It was evident that he received a considerable amount of fees, for it was explained in a note to the Estimates that of the amount he received for extra-judicial remits it was difficult to say "the amount he received ex officio." He (Mr. W. Holms) thought it absurd that the Auditor of the Court should have a considerable amount of fees from private work. It was a very unsatisfactory state of things, for if an Auditor was allowed to have private work, the Government had no control over his work.

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON said, the question had been discussed at considerable length in previous Sessions. He could only repeat the argument then offered—that it was often of advantage to the Public Service to get the services of a man of large experience to undertake certain work, even though he had been employed in some other Office, or had some private work. In many cases, a man might be in receipt of fees from other sources; but it did not by any means follow that he neglected his public duties, or that he did not comply with the regulations of his Office as to the number of hours he should give to the Public Service in return for the salary paid him. The real cause of this information being given was that the House, some years ago, was anxious to ascertain as far as possible what the actual emoluments were, from all sources, of all public servants. In working that out, every official was asked whether he was in receipt of any sort of official salary other than that which he received from his post? Of course, they were not able to give the amounts where men were of literary habits and made money in that way; but, wherever the facts could be obtained, they were printed in the notes. In some cases, as, for instance, that of the Auditor to the Court, a man was not wanted for the whole of his time, and they got much better men by allowing them, when their services were not required by the Government, to augment their income from other sources. If they were to draw a hard-and-fast line, they would very often either lose the services of very valuable public servants, or they would have to pay very much higher salaries than were at present charged on the Estimates.

Sir Henry Selwin-Ibbetson

MR. RYLANDS thought the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury had rather missed the point of the remark. He presumed that they offered certain fair salaries for the public duties, and not such salaries as a man of suitable capacity would not be likely to take. They professed to offer a salary capable to secure the ability fitted for the office. Then they had a right to ask the individual for a return of all he received from the State, either as salary for duties, or as compensation for loss of office. Of course, they did not ask what were his private emoluments. He always understood, also, that a pension became merged in a salary, if the receiver of the pension returned to the Public Service. For instance, the Prime Minister at the present time was in receipt of a salary as Prime Minister, and that merged his pension as a Cabinet Minister. He could mention a great many instances in which the same principle was carried out; and, therefore, he did not understand how these clerks and assistant clerks could be in receipt of annuities varying from £80 to £160 a-year, which were, in fact, pensions received by them as late Judges' clerks, which, apparently, did not merge in their salaries. He did not quite understand why that was so,

and he certainly thought there ought to be some good reason for it. With regard to the auditor, the Secretary to the Treasury did not appear to him to have quite answered the objection. The note to the Vote was—

“The Auditor receives a considerable amount of fees for extra-judicial remits and other business, but he has difficulty in stating separately the amount he receives ex-officio.”

If that meant that, practically, he made such large profits that he was unable to give particulars, as he supposed it did, then, of course, they could not call upon him to make a return of then. But he might ask, also, the very plain question, whether they ought to appoint, at a salary of £700 a-year, a gentleman who received such a very large amount of fees from his private practice that he could not state the amount? Practically, he had no doubt that this gentleman was making a very large income, and it created a suspicion that the work he was doing outside was, probably, a good deal more remunerative than that for which they were paying him.

MR. RAMSAY pointed out that the question involved in this case was, whether the State should employ any gentleman who undertook professional duties in addition to his official work, and was, therefore, the same as that just raised in regard to the procurators fiscal. He rose to ask the Home Secretary whether he was able to give them any information as to the view he had taken regarding the office of Sheriff, and, also, whether he had come to any conclusion as regarded the constitution of the Court of Session? There was one vacancy in that Court at present; but he thought there was no reason why there should not be a greater number of vacancies, if they should occur. He had no desire to urge the Home Secretary to make any appointment to the vacant office. But while he thought the number of Judges in excess of that required for the discharge of public business, he was of opinion that a permanent alteration in the number of the Judges must be accompanied by some variation in the present constitution of the Court. The number of Judges who sat to hear appeals would have to be smaller. There were four, at present, and that was too many. It would be also interesting to know whether the Home Secretary had yet seen his way to reduce the number of Sheriffs-Substitute in any district in Scotland where he might be of opinion that the duties were so light as not to require that the office should be filled up when vacant. Nothing, so far as he (Mr. Ramsay) had been informed, had yet been done in the way of reducing the number of the Sheriffs-Substitute, although the right hon. Gentleman promised to give his best consideration to this matter when the Sheriffs Court Bill was before them.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS: I really cannot give the Committee any information that we have arrived at any definite decision in regard to these matters. We have shown our inclination, as far as the Court of Session is concerned, by allowing the vacancy to remain open so long, and I think hon. Gentlemen will be able to conclude pretty much from this what our views are in this matter. My right hon. and learned Friend the Lord Advocate undertook, in the Recess, to make further inquiries, not only as to the Court of Session, but as to the Sheriffs-Substitute. I think that the hon. Gentleman is wrong in saying that no step has been taken. In one case, I think, a reduction has been made.

MR. FRASER-MACKINTOSH here rose to say that there had been no fewer than two reductions in the North, where there were great complaints in consequence. He referred to Nairn and Tain.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS: It appears that there are two cases, and I was just going to say that one case was in my mind, because we had many complaints as to the action we had taken. That, however, is not proof of an insuperable objection. Time will show what can best be done, and where it should be done. There are difficulties, in some places, owing to the long distances between populous places in some parts of Scotland. What I have said will show that the matter has not been lost sight of.

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON said, in reply to the hon. Member for Burnley (Mr. Rylands), that he thought it would be a hard case if there was to be no superannuation at all for officers re-entering the Public Service. It was the rule that pensions granted to public servants should not exceed the total amount of the salaries before received; but, in the cases referred to by the hon. Member, it would be depriving them of what was practically given for life, to refuse the grants made under particular statutes, and compensation for loss on the abolition of offices previously held. It really amounted to this—the hon. Member was anxious to get officers at a fixed salary, and it might be possible to get men without any other other occupation; but it very often happened that men could be got who had a far greater amount of knowledge, who would give the same amount of time to the Public Service, and who were in receipt of these compensations, or, being in private practice, derived emoluments from that source. By this means, the public obtained the services of men of greater experience than could be secured by the payment of salary only, as in some instances that cropped up last year. The public time was not treasured upon, and often a more efficient servant was obtained. With regard to the services of an Auditor, that was one of those cases in which they must have a man of a certain position and knowledge. The duty of auditing a particular Office was not one that should occupy the entire time of an individual. The higher class of public servant only could be employed, and the Public Service obtained from him all that could be expected, whoever he might be. It was almost to be regretted that so much information had been given with regard to salaries which were not in all cases paid out of the public funds.

MR. RAMSAY hoped the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary would not allow local clamour in every district to prevail, but would take into consideration each case on its merits, and judge it on the evidence that might arise. As to the office of Sheriff-Substitute, he was quite aware that the right hon. Gentleman yielded in one case to local clamour. He trusted that would not occur again, because, when Sheriffs-Substitute had been elected, they had been generally well fitted for the offices for which they were chosen. It was absurd to speak of long distances, as if these were inconvenient or of any disadvantage to the Sheriff. He (Mr. Ramsay) lived in a district where they had to travel 200 miles to any Court of Law, and he believed there was no district where there was less of crime and less of litigation than in that locality. He could, therefore, speak as to the possibility of some of these offices being dispensed with whenever an opportunity occurred, and trusted that public clamour would not be allowed to prevent the saving of public money on the occurrence of vacancies.

Mr. Ramsay

SIR ANDREW LUSK believed it to be a good thing that people should have to travel 200 miles to a Court of Law. The commercial classes in this country had formed the opinion that the Courts of Session in Scotland and the Irish Courts were over-manned, and that the expense connected with them was out of all proportion to the amount of work which they had to get through. Litigation in this country could not be always avoided, and it was the complaint of the commercial class, who were sometimes engaged in it through circumstances over which they had no control, that they were kept waiting too long for justice, and that there were so many men in the various Courts who had nothing to do but to create all kinds of obstruction. He was glad to hear the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary say that time would be taken to consider whether the vacancy in the Court of Session should be filled up or not, for even in London many people were beginning to think that the number of Judges was too great for the work that had to be done. A great deal of time was taken up by the Courts of Appeal where, perhaps, five or six Judges were occupied with some Church of England or parish scandal, to the detriment of the commercial classes, who could not get their cases tried.

MR. FRASER-MACKINTOSH, with respect to the statement that there were too many Judges in Scotland, said, he was not now going to give an opinion; but as the Vote included the Judges' salaries, he would be very sorry this discussion closed without any Scottish Member getting up, as he was happy to do, and recording his praise of the way business was managed in the Court of Session. Of late years, the business of the Court of Session had been conducted with very great ability indeed. The City of Glasgow Bank closed its doors early in October last, and the numerous important cases arising out of the stoppage had been promptly, but carefully, disposed of by the Court of Session, and had been determined by the House of Lords. The Lord Chancellor said, and said very rightly, that there was seldom so much ability displayed as in the Court of Session.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS desired to add his testimony to the ability of the Court of Session. It was a great honour to Scotland.

MR. O'DONNELL asked for an explanation of items under sub-head D for Sheriffs, as well as for the Procurator Fiscal, who was paid by a salary of £3,000. It seemed, as a rule, that there were very few salaries paid to officers; while a number of curious fees of all kinds were mentioned, of which, in some cases, there were no returns.

THE CHAIRMAN pointed out that the remarks of the hon. Member were out of place, the Vote to which he was referring having been already passed.

MR. BIGGAR was bound to say that the balance of argument was entirely in favour of Government officials not taking private business. He gave full weight to the argument of the Secretary to the Treasury, with regard to the necessity of getting good men for the Public Service; but he could not help feeling that those men who had private business to attend to would often perform their public duties in a most careless manner, their offices in that way becoming sometimes little else than sinecures. There were, for instance, in Ireland, such offices as Clerk of the Peace and Clerk of the Crown, where gentlemen received salaries and had, at the same time, private practice, the actual business of the Crown being done by a clerk at a small salary, while another gentleman received a large salary for doing nothing. It would, in his opinion, be much better that those public servants should give their whole time to the service of the Crown, and receive salaries in proportion to the work which they performed; on the other hand, if there was not sufficient occupation for the persons appointed, the offices should be abolished. With regard to the question of pensions—which he thought the hon. Baronet (Sir Henry Selwin-Ibbetson) had explained in an unsatisfactory manner—he was of opinion that gentlemen should not have an opportunity of retiring from an official position upon a pension, unless it was shown to the satisfaction of the authorities that they were incapacitated for performing the duties of their office; while the system of giving pensions to young men who might last out a generation was, to his mind, thoroughly preposterous.

MR. W. HOLMS asked for information with regard to the sum of £1,500 paid to Crown Agents for the investigation of peerages. He would be glad to know whether these were officers of the Crown, or professional men in private practice, and whether the details of charge on page 237 referred to the investigation of dormant peerages? If the latter was the case, why was not the expense paid by the claimants?

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON explained, that the charges in question were paid under an old statute of Anne for inquiries in the matter of peerages, and, as he believed, they were made payable by the Crown in order to protect the public. The inquiries were of a public character, for the purpose of ascertaining the validity of claims; but he regretted his inability to say why the expenses were not payable by the claimants.

SIR EDWARD COLEBROOKE corroborated the statement of the hon. Baronet, a relative of his having discharged the duties in question. It was considered necessary that somebody should be employed by the Government to see justice done, and that it should not be left to private persons alone to advance claims to peerages.

MR. W. HOLMS inquired by whom these officers were appointed?

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON replied, that they were appointed by the Crown.

Vote agreed to.

(5.) Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £27,268, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1880, for the Salaries and Expenses of the Offices in Her Majesty's General Register House, Edinburgh."

SIR EDWARD COLEBROOKE wished to ask the hon. Baronet the Secretary to the Treasury, whether the Government had come to any decision with regard to the very large surplus which arose on the fees of this Department? The present was not a Vote of public money for the maintenance of the Register House, but was a payment out of a very large sum received for different fees for the work done in the Department, the surplus of which the Government were under statutory obligation to apply, either in increasing the efficiency of the Department, or in the reduction of future fees. The hon. Baronet might be aware that some years ago a considerable reduction actually took place, in pursuance of the statute, and that very efficient relief was given to those who previously paid. The surplus would next year amount to £10,000, the present Vote being for £36,000, while the anticipated receipts were £46,000. He thought it was high time that something was done by the Government in the direction of a considerable reduction of fees.

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON assured the hon. Baronet (Sir Edward Colebrooke) that the subject had already occupied the attention of the Government, and in particular of his right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Home Department, during the visit which he had paid to Edinburgh not very long ago; his inquiries having resulted in the opinion that a considerable revision of the Office was necessary. Although the surplus was not quite so large as that mentioned by the hon. Baronet, still, he quite admitted that the Estimates showed a probable saving of something like £9,000; but the hon. Baronet was aware that if necessary changes had to take place in the Office, such changes were very generally attended with increased salaries, and it would be hardly prudent, until those changes were settled, to promise any distinct reduction in the fees. He again assured the hon. Baronet and the Committee that the question had not been lost sight of, and that he hoped soon to be able to make a considerable reduction in the direction indicated.

MR. RAMSAY said, as there was at present a Bill before the House for the purpose of regulating the Office of Lord Clerk Register, he thought it desirable that the hon. Baronet (Sir Henry Selwin-Ibbetson) should agree to postpone the consideration of the Vote until the House had had an opportunity of discussing the provisions of that Bill. It appeared to him to be rather a singular step that the Committee should be asked to vote this large sum of money for the purpose of perpetuating the Office on its present footing; while, at the same time, there was a Bill in hand, the object of which was to reduce the duties of the Office. It would be admitted that as far as the objections taken by the Scotch Members were concerned, they were worthy of consideration, and that no time would be lost by their endeavour to secure some amendment of this Department. The Home Secretary introduced a Bill last year for the purpose of appointing an Assistant Secretary of State for Scotland. A Secretary of State for Scotland, with a seat in the Cabinet, would be what all Scotchmen would desire. Such a Minister would aid in securing attention to Scottish business. He thought they had a right to complain of the fees charged in the Register Office. Considering the large sums of money which came in from the owners of real estate in Scotland, it was not a sufficient reason for continuing to charge the same rate of fees as hitherto, simply to say that the surplus was not so great as had been stated by the hon. Baronet the Member for North Lanarkshire (Sir Edward Colebrooke). He believed the surplus actually amounted to £9,800, and that sum had been gathered from the owners of real property in Scotland; besides which, Scotch Members had been asked for, and did vote, a large amount for the registration of real estate in England. It was, therefore, difficult to understand why the Secretary to the Treasury should at all doubt the propriety of considering the whole question of the system of Scotch registration, leaving hon. Members free to consider what should be done when the Bill now before the House reached the stage of a second reading. There were many persons who took a great interest in the settlement of this question; and his hon. Friend the Member for Edinburgh (Mr. M'Laren), who was then absent on public business, had given Notice of a Motion either for the postponement or reduction of the Vote. In his (Mr. Ramsay's) opinion, an opportunity should be given to hon. Members for the purpose of having the whole Office considered; and he trusted the hon. Baronet would accept his suggestion of postponing the Vote altogether until the Bill before the House had been carried through. He would not, however, make a Motion to that effect, because he was unwilling to waste the time of the House by taking a Division.

SIR HENRY SELWYN-IBBETSON could not agree to the suggestion of the hon. Member for the Falkirk Burghs (Mr. Ramsay) for the postponement of the Vote. He did not think that, in the present state of Public Business, they would advance their position very much by a postponement until the House had decided upon the Bill which had been submitted. If that Bill became law, he need not say that any changes introduced thereby would be operative as against the Estimate then under discussion, and that if any reduction took place the effect would be that the money saved would pass into the Exchequer. Again, looking at the position of Public Business, if the Vote were postponed, they could hardly hope to raise a discussion at the end of the Session. When the changes which it might be found necessary to introduce were settled, and when it was ascertained what further expense would result from those changes, he should be very glad to reconsider the table of fees charged in connection with this Office, with a view to their reduction; but he could hardly promise that reduction until those questions had been adjusted. It very often happened that the surplus was used up by expenses of the establishment, for which demands were from time to time made upon the Treasury. The future position of the question would in no way be prejudiced by the passing of the Vote, to the postponement of which he hoped the Committee would not agree.

MR. FRASER-MACKINTOSH said, he was very much disappointed that the hon. Gentleman had not agreed to the suggestion which had been made to the Committee by the hon. Member for the Falkirk Burghs (Mr. Ramsay), as last year this Vote would have been challenged had not the Home Secretary promised to go down and inquire, and it was distinctly understood that something was to be done. The hon. Baronet must be quite aware that there existed a great deal of dissatisfaction in Scotland on the subject of the Register House, in regard to the fees exacted in that Office. One of the reasons for which he (Mr. Fraser-Mackintosh) thought the Vote should be postponed was that hon. Members were entitled, when discussing Scottish Votes, to the presence of the Lord Advocate and also the Home Secretary, so that they might tell the House what they intended to do; for it appeared quite clear that if they allowed the Vote to pass on the present occasion, it would go off in the same manner as last year, and nothing would be done. The agitation in regard to the fees in the Register House was one that had been going on for a great many years, and the surplus that had accrued on one occasion had been as much as £16,000 in a-year, while it had seldom been less than £8,000. The amount of fees drawn was growing every year, and it was nonsense to say that the time had not arrived when a great reduction should be made, for that time was long since past. Among the Votes for that Office he saw a sum of £1,200 a-year for the Lord Clerk Register; but it had been intimated that the present holder of the Office was to have no salary. Again, the Keeper of the Registry of Sasines received £1,000 a-year. They heard a great deal from the hon. Baronet about having good men of social position and ability to fill Government offices; but he understood that this gentleman never attended to his duties at all, and his appointment was so glaring that it had been struck at, as a thing never again to take place, by a special Act of Parliament. If nothing came of it, he should move that the Vote be reduced by the sum of £1,000. The point he had mentioned was one on which many of them were unanimous, and he suggested that the hon. Baronet should postpone the Vote, the more particularly as the hon. Member for Edinburgh had not been able to be present during the discussion; and if that course was pursued, he believed the hon. Baronet would find he was not delaying, but rather advancing matters.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £26,268, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1880, for the Salaries and Expenses of the Offices in Her Majesty's General Register House, Edinburgh."—(Mr. Fraser-Mackintosh.)

Dr. CAMERON said, the whole question before the Committee lay in a nutshell. There was derived from the fees charged in Scotland, for the registry of transfers, a sum of money which more than paid all the expenses of the Office, and left a surplus of something like £10,000, and that surplus went into the Imperial Treasury, which it was contended by the

Scotch Members was not right. The subject had been brought forward on several former occasions; and he remembered having assisted on one of those occasions three years or four years ago, at which time he had sent to the right hon. Gentleman the present First Lord of the Admiralty (Mr. W. H. Smith), who then occupied the position now held by the hon. Baronet (Sir Henry Selwin-Ibbetson), a number of reports which had been drawn up by the various legal bodies, and which comprised plans for the removal of the causes of complaint with regard to the Office, and suggestions for increasing the efficiency of the system. The right hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury of the day took the papers, and almost undertook to read them; but, of course, nothing came of it for he was promoted to another Office, and "a King arose who knew not Joseph." So the matter went on year after year; but it was not a question which was in any way affected by the Lord Clerk Register (Scotland) Bill, which was a Bill for consolidation, and affected the salary of another Department solely, doing away with an Office which was, more or less, of the nature of a sinecure, and re-arranging various Offices with a view to greater economy and efficiency. The Bill did not concern the Office about which the Committee were discussing, and the excuse put forward did not amount to any just reason why the question should not be at once decided. There were two ways of dealing with the question. One, the simplest, was to reduce the fees by the amount of the surplus which accrued every year; and the other, and it appeared to him the preferable way, was to institute improvements in the Office, not by way of increasing the salaries, but by way of more efficient registration, and by the adoption of a system which had been tried with great satisfaction in Glasgow and elsewhere—the system of "search-sheets." When that had been suggested before, the answer always was that it would require money; but why should they not take the surplus £10,000 to make the experiment with? The two systems could be run simultaneously, so that if one did not answer it could be discontinued. He understood perfectly well that the Secretary to the Treasury, in the absence of the Lord Advocate, could hardly be expected to pronounce any opinion on the matter; and all that they asked was that, under the circumstances of the case, the hon. Baronet should agree to the very reasonable course of postponing the Vote. If the matter would be arranged, he would not wish to say another word; and, therefore, he asked that the Vote should not be pushed forward, but that it should be postponed until, the Lord Advocate being present, they would have an opportunity of consulting him. He did not think the Scotch Members would be found obstructive; but really the proposal for the postponement of the Vote was so reasonable that he should feel justified in supporting any Motion for adjournment that might be made upon it.

Mr. Fraser-Mackintosh

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON was sorry to appear unreasonable in pressing the Vote upon the Committee; but he ventured to submit that the question could not be met even by the knowledge or presence of the Lord Advocate, inasmuch as it entirely rested in the hands of the Treasury to deal with it in accordance with the Act of Parliament. And it was because the Treasury had to act in the matter that he had stated he was prepared to admit the justice of the claim made, when the time should arrive for its revision. But he had also stated, not that the Bill mentioned had nothing to do with the question, but that the Government could not proceed to deal with the fees at once, because they had been making that very inquiry which hon. Members seemed to think the Treasury had ignored from year to year. That inquiry had been made with the view of altering and amending this particular Office, and of meeting the complaints which had been made on more than one occasion, and with the view of carrying out also, as the hon. Member for Glasgow (Dr. Cameron) had suggested, a better mode of indexing and keeping the records, not as superseding the present system, but as running parallel with it, and in order to make the work better and more useful. The plan had not only been considered by the Treasury, but had been very far advanced towards carrying out; but what he had before stated he was still obliged to maintain, that he could not definitely say he could alter the present system of fees until the result of the proposed changes was known, at which time he should be quite prepared to consider what should be done in the matter of restricting the fees. He ventured to think that a pledge of that kind on behalf of the Treasury should give some satisfaction to those who were concerned in the matter, and show them that the object was not to get it postponed for another year. With regard to the Register, he could state that indexing arrangements, which, he trusted, would be satisfactory, had been agreed to and were about to be carried out; and, therefore, it was to be hoped that the Committee would see there were no grounds for any further postponement. Had the Lord Advocate been present, he believed nothing more could have been said on the subject of this particular Vote.

SIR EDWARD COLEBROOKE thanked the hon. Gentleman for his statement; but he was obliged to qualify the expression of the satisfaction which he felt at hearing that the subject was engaging the earnest attention of the Government by saying that he had not the highest confidence that things would move as rapidly as he could wish, because, judging by the past, he did not think the Treasury had shown any great zeal in carrying out urgently-needed reforms. At the same time, he was quite content, as the matter had been really taken in hand, to leave it in its present position. He thought, however, that the Committee had been unfairly placed, by the absence of the Lord Advocate, with regard to inquiries which it might have been desirable to make as to the establishment and working of the system which would necessarily have some influence upon the nature of the reforms which were to be carried out; and he was of opinion that if they did not go so far as to postpone the Vote, at any rate the Report might be brought on after the Lord Advocate had returned to town. With regard to the searching department, he was certain this could be improved in the matter of the indices, one of the great features of the reform carried out about 10 years ago being that those indices were sent out for completion to the different counties without burdening Edinburgh with the whole of the expense. He should be glad if the right hon. Gentleman could say anything upon this point, which was exciting a considerable amount of interest in his neighbourhood.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS hoped that the debate and the speech which had followed on the part of his hon. Friend the Secretary to the Treasury would be accepted not in the light of an ordinary pledge, but as a proof that action was really going forward. As a result of what took place in the debate last Session, he went down to Edinburgh and proceeded through the Registry Offices with the Lord Advocate; and he (Mr. Cross) felt bound to express his thanks to every officer connected with the Department for the ready information which they had afforded him upon every subject of inquiry. He had gone thoroughly and completely into every department; and with regard to the question of the indices, he was sorry to find, in certain instances, they were in arrear. Upon that subject, no doubt, there had been considerable difficulty, as well as some feeling, which had materially interfered with the preparation of the records. He did not think anything could be better, in their way, than the search-sheets, which were most valuable, and saved a great deal of time in searching for titles. Under that system one book was posted up into another day by day, after the manner of bankers' or merchants' accounts, and, finally, into the ledger, in which the whole of any transaction could be seen at a glance. This compilation was extremely useful, though it was necessary to be very careful that nothing was missed from the search-sheets, as, in that case, the error would possibly not be discovered for years afterwards. In his opinion, it was absolutely for the interest of the country that the search-sheets, on which Mr. Brodie, the then holder of the office, had spent so much time and labour, should be continued; but it was also his opinion that the statutory indices should be kept up as well. Those indices ought to be made as perfect as possible, for no great mass of literature was of any use without the key to it. Some of the Scotch officials preferred one plan, and some the other; but his view was that both plans should be carried on concurrently. As it had been found that considerable confusion existed on account of the unsatisfactory condition of the indices, the Treasury had consented to every proposition which he had made; and he hoped that in a few months, in consequence of the action which had been taken, the indices would be completely and properly posted up to the present time, which he was sure would effect a great improvement in the system of registration. With regard, however, to the question of cost, he was not quite certain. Neither could he give any opinion at that moment whether it was better to reduce the fees, or improve the efficiency first. But if he were personally applied to, he should say—"First make your Registry House as efficient as possible, and then look for a reduction of fees." The next thing would be to establish a reserve, because every now and then there were extraordinary expenses to be provided for; but, beyond making ample provision and keeping in hand such reserve as might be necessary, he was strongly of opinion that the whole of the remaining surplus should be taken off the fees. That being the case, he had only to remark that the records, of which he had never seen a more valuable collection, were exposed to great risk of destruction by fire; and he was struck more than anything with the circumstance that the clerks were allowed to return to the offices and remain there up to 8 or 9 o'clock at night, in order to work overtime. The clerks had fires in their rooms, and on leaving for the night they were accustomed to rake out the cinders into the grate, which he believed to be a most dangerous practice; while the only precaution attempted was that some porter was supposed to see that the lights were extinguished, and that the fires were raked out. That appeared to be the whole security for these valuable records against fire. In consequence of this he had requested the Inspector to report to him, and the Treasury had also sent down another officer to make a special inquiry. It was, therefore, to be hoped that something had been done to render this most valuable collection secure from destruction by fire. From the circumstances to which he had referred, he believed the Committee would see that they were on the high road to improvement, and that the Treasury were really doing something in the matter.

MR. C. S. PARKER observed, that the explanation which had been given by the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary was very satisfactory to Scotch Members. Their constituents would be glad to hear that the Government had bona fide given their attention to the subject this year, and that the right hon. Gentleman had mastered so many of the details; and as regarded risk of fire they had reason to thank him for the prudence he had shown. They had been offered two alternatives. First, that this money should be spent upon rendering the Department more effective; or, secondly, that it should go in diminution of fees. But he thought that the Government should give an assurance more definite in respect of time, that this year, at last, the money should go in one or other of these ways—either that the Department should be made more effective, or that the scale of fees should be revised. The hon. Baronet the Secretary to the Treasury, no doubt, felt himself in the position of a guardian of the Imperial Treasury, and bound to take care of its interests; but the money derived from the fees of this Department ought not to go into the Exchequer. It should be applied at once in reduction of the scale of fees or in adding to the efficiency of the Department. He thought, if an explicit promise were made to that effect, it would be more satisfactory and would meet the case.

MR. BIGGAR remarked that £46,000 was received from the Department, and only £36,000 was expended upon it. But that surplus was only nominal, for there were sums to be provided for, such as providing for those who had formerly held office in the Department, which would reduce the surplus to nothing at all. Something had been said in the course of the debate upon the desirability of a Cabinet Minister being appointed to look after the interests of Scotland. In his opinion, such an arrangement would be a waste of money; on the Treasury Bench there was not room for another Secretary of State—the ground was fully occupied as it was by hon. and right hon. Gentlemen, and great inconvenience was caused by crowding. There was one point to which he wished to refer—namely, the question of sasines. A salary was taken from the Government by a gentleman for doing entirely nominal work. In his opinion, no Government work should be allowed to be done by deputy, and if work was required to be done, it should be done by the holder of the office himself. He did not think there was the least grievance in this matter, and considered that the conduct of the Scotch Members was a waste of time.

MR. RAMSAY was surprised to hear Scotch Members censured for wasting the time of the House. The hon. Member for Cavan (Mr. Biggar), he was sure, could not possibly have been guilty of the same waste of time. The suggestion that he (Mr. Ramsay) made, that the Vote should be postponed, was based upon the fact to which he referred—namely, the absence from their places of the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Lord Advocate and the hon. Member for Edinburgh (Mr. M'Laren). In the absence of both those hon. Members, he thought that it would be desirable to postpone the Vote. It had been stated by the hon. Baronet the Secretary to the Treasury that the passing of this Vote would have nothing whatever to do with the Bill referring to the Office of Lord Clerk Register. Now, one of his reasons for referring to the Bill was that it might be necessary, in altering and improving the system of registration which now existed in Scotland, that some statutory authority for carrying out these changes should be given. It was in order that the Lord Advocate should consider whether anything of the sort should be inserted in the Bill that he had suggested that the Vote should be postponed. The suggestion seemed to him to be so reasonable that he had hoped that the hon. Baronet would have been willing at once to have acceded to it. The Scottish Representatives generally concurred with him in thinking that that would be the wisest course to take. Still, however, he did not wish to press the matter, and would leave it to the hon. Baronet to decide whether it should be postponed. He would ask him to re-consider his decision, and defer the consideration of this Vote at the present time, in order that the provisions of the Lord Clerk Register Bill might be fairly considered, and that such changes might be introduced into the system of registration in Scotland as were indicated by the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Home Department. He was satisfied that Public Business would be expedited by the course he had suggested being taken; but still, after the explanation the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary had been good enough to give them, as to the steps which he had taken with regard to the Department and the protection of documents deposited in the Registry Office, he felt that he was bound to withdraw his proposal, if the hon. Baronet insisted upon it.

SIR ANDREW LUSK remarked that there were, no doubt, some important questions connected with this Vote; but the right hon. Gentleman had given a statement of what had been already done with regard to the Office, and what it was proposed to do, and, in his opinion, nothing more could be desired. The right hon. Gentleman stated that he had been down, and had himself looked into the matter, and was trying to bring about the results which hon. Members wanted. For these reasons, he appealed to his hon. Friend (Mr. Fraser-Mackintosh) to withdraw his Motion.

MR. FRASER-MACKINTOSH said, that in consequence of the statement of the Home Secretary in explanation, he would withdraw his Motion. He thought, however, that they were entitled to that statement without being obliged to make all that fuss about it. He took exception to several of the remarks of the Home Secretary. The Treasury had not to pay the cost of carrying out the recommendations. It would come out of the pockets of the proprietors of lands and houses in Scotland. A thoroughly efficient organization would not, he was informed, cost £2,000 a-year additional, hence a large reduction of the fees could instantly be made. If the Home Secretary insisted on a reserve, it could be pointed out that there had been a large surplus from past years improperly drawn from the class alluded to. He withdrew his Amendment on the understanding that the suggestions of the Home Secretary would be carried out. There was one question he wished to draw the attention of the right hon. Gentleman to, and that was the placing on the Civil Service Lists of all the clerks employed engrossing, or otherwise, in the Register House, with a view to their proper remuneration and ultimate superannuation, as to which great dissatisfaction existed. Memorials from these deserving officials had been presented, and demanded favourable consideration. He should be glad to know whether the Home Secretary saw his way to a satisfactory settlement of that question?

Mr. Ramsay

MR. J. W. BARCLAY said, that before the Amendment was withdrawn, he would urge upon the Government that it was not only necessary to have an increased efficiency in this Department, but a reduction in the fees. The hon. Member for the Inverness Burghs had stated that £2,000 a-year would be sufficient to complete the organization of the Office. The fees at present paid into the Office would fully meet that expense, allow a reduction on the fees charged, and yet leave a very considerable margin to protect the Treasury from loss. Not only was it necessary that there should be increased efficiency in the Office, but also that the fees in Edinburgh be reduced. After the explanation and assurance which had been given, he thought the Motion might very well be withdrawn, and that they might wait for another year to see what was done.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS said, that an exact paraphrase had been given of what he had himself said. He was anxious about the superannuation of the clerks—some of them he was bound to say, in his opinion, were entitled to superannuation; but there were others whom he conceived to have no such claim. As hon. Members might be aware, there was a difficulty at the present moment, owing to all of those persons not being Civil servants. The question was, however, being discussed, and after the lapse of another year he would be able to speak of it much more fully.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

(6.) Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £63,433, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1880, for the Expenses of the Prison Commissioners for Scotland, and of the Prisons under their control, including the Maintenance of Criminal Lunatics and the Preparation of Judicial Statistics."

MR. DODSON said, that, perhaps, the Secretary to the Treasury would be good enough to answer some questions with regard to this matter. The same information was not given in the remarks accompanying this Vote as was done in the case of the similar Vote in regard to England. It was upon that matter he wished to ask some questions. He wished to know the number of prisons taken over by Government from the day they first commenced to take them over; what reduction in their number had since been made; and he also wished to know what reduction had been made in the cost of prisons generally since the Government had taken them over? In the Memorandum accompanying the Vote, it was stated that the average cost of prisoners was, per head, £27 4s. He would point out that that was a higher amount than the average cost of a convict in Perth Prison, and £3 or £4 higher than the average cost of a prisoner in the local prisons of Scotland in 1877—the year before the Government took over the prisons. It would seem, therefore, that the average cost of a prisoner under Government had increased instead of diminishing.

MR. J. W. BARCLAY inquired what progress had been made in arriving at a settlement with the local authorities in taking over the prisons?

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON was afraid that he was not able to give a very good account of what had been done under the Prisons Regulation Act for Scotland. The reduction in the number of prisons in Scotland had not been so great as in England, because of the necessity for enlarging certain of the prisons in Scotland very considerably before they could abolish others. That process entailed not only a very considerable amount of time, but a very large amount of money. The cost of prisoners in Scotland was, no doubt, in excess not only of prisoners in England, but of prisoners formerly in the local prisons. That arose from the inability of the Government to reduce the number of prisons in Scotland in the same proportion as they had reduced them in England; thus the cost of a prisoner in Scotland could not be reduced in the way in which it had been done in England. He believed that his right hon. Friend the Home Secretary had it in contemplation to enlarge one or two of the prisons in Scotland, and thereby to do away with a considerable number. By that means they would be enabled to make a considerable reduction in the cost of prisoners in Scotland as they had in England.

MR. DODSON thought that the questions which he had put had hardly been answered. The point which he wished to make was that it appeared from a Memorandum accompanying the Civil Service Estimate that the average cost of a prisoner in Scotland had been estimated at £27 4s. He pointed out that that was a higher amount than, according to the judicial statistics of Scotland, was the cost of a convict in 1877, and that it was a still greater expenditure than the average cost of a prisoner in the local prisons in Scotland in the year 1877, the last year in which the prisons were in the hands of the local authorities. The average cost of a prisoner, as set down in this Memorandum, was £27 4s., and the average gross cost of a prisoner in the local prisons, in 1877, was something like £24, according to the judicial statistics. He thought that there must be some explanation of that, and perhaps the right hon. Gentleman would be good enough to give it to them. The other question which he wished to ask was, what was the number of prisons that had been closed since the Government took over the prisons, and what reduction had been made in the total cost of prisons in Scotland since the Government took them over? He was aware that in Scotland there was a certain number of very small prisons; and, no doubt, some would have to be maintained in districts where the population was sparse. It was also probable that some that might eventually be abolished could not be closed until other prisons were enlarged.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS said, that he could not answer the questions which had been put at the present time. The Commissioners would, he believed, shortly send in their Report, by which some of the questions asked could be answered. He might observe that in Scotland things were not done in quite the same way as in England. Owing to the amount of prisons, compared with the number of prisoners, it was necessary to do away with a great number; but, owing to the smallness of some of the prisons, they found it impossible to shut up two or three, because those left were too small to take the prisoners. Practically, in Scotland, they would have to build a certain number of fresh prisons altogether. At the present moment the number of prisons which had been closed in Scotland was very small; but a scheme was under consideration, and he would venture to say that after the Commissioners had made their Report something would be done in the matter. A question had also been asked as to the arrangements which had been come to with the local authorities. Some difficulty had arisen in this matter from the fact that the cells in Scotland were not certified. It became necessary, therefore, to take some standard by which they could be guided as to whether cells were to be paid for or not. As the Bill was originally drawn, they were to pay for every cell of 700 cubic feet; but the hon. Member for Edinburgh (Mr. M'Laren)—doubtless bearing in mind that the new prison at Edinburgh did not meet the requirement—objected to the provision. The matter was taken up by a considerable number of Scotch Members, and they stated that they would rather leave the question to be decided by the Secretary of State, as to which were the proper cells, and which were not. That course was adopted; but it had led to a considerable difficulty in the administration, for it was a very hard thing for the Government to say what was the actual value of the cell. They had come to what might be taken as a reasonable solution of the matter, and had fixed a certain amount of cubic feet as the requisite size for the cells to be taken over; every cell under that size would have to be certified as fit for human habitation. He had also been asked to account for the fact that the average cost of a prisoner in Scotland was now £27, a higher amount than appeared under the old system. It was perfectly true that the cost of a prisoner in Scotland was now greater than formerly, and he could not explain the actual difference; but he must point out that in Scotland they had begun by increasing and adding to the cost by appointing the Commissioners and Inspectors, and had, as yet, arrived only upon the fringe of the subject. The actual cost of the prisoners had thus been increased; but the extra expenditure had been caused by the new staff, the benefit of which would be found thereafter.

MR. DODSON asked, if it was to be understood that, up to the present time, there had been no actual reduction in the total cost?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS: None.

MR. J. W. BARCLAY said, he was glad to hear that there was likely to be an arrangement made with regard to the old prisons. He would like to know whether cells certified by the right hon. Gentleman's Predecessor would be taken as now suitable for the reception of prisoners, and would be so certified by the Inspectors? He did not know whether the right hon. Gentleman was aware that many cells under the standard (700 cubic feet) he had fixed had been certified as suitable by his Predecessors. He hoped that he would consider the cells so certified sufficient under the present Act. Could the right hon. Gentleman indicate when he would be able to announce his intentions as to the new prisons in Scotland?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS said, that what the hon. Member had said was exactly what he (Mr. Cross) did not mean. He did not intend to adopt any cells which had not been passed by the Inspectors in Scotland; it was not his intention to adopt cells allowed by his Predecessors in Scotland. Under the Scotch Prisons Act there was not such a clause as was contained in the English Prisons Act providing that cells should be certified. As a matter of fact, prisoners were allowed to be kept in certain cells with the knowledge of the Inspector; but those cells were never certified in Scotland as they were in England. The real fact was, that if he were to adopt those cells he would be held up in that House as doing wrong, and as being one of the greatest tyrants that ever existed by permitting prisoners to be put in places not fit for habitation. Another question had been put to him as to when they might expect to begin the new prisons in Scotland. He hoped very soon; but there was great difficulty in putting these matters into the Estimates, arising, as he would point out, from the, at present, very inconvenient system of keeping accounts. Take the prison of the City of Glasgow, for instance; it was a very valuable site, but it was not a good prison, and one he wished to get rid of. But it was necessary he should build a new prison before he got rid of it. For that purpose, he must put into the Estimates some £20,000, £30,000, or £40,000. If he could sell the Glasgow Prison afterwards, the whole of that money would come back to the Exchequer; but by the present mode of keeping accounts, the item of £40,000 on account of the Glasgow Prison, which would be defrayed by the sale of the site, would appear in the Estimates as an extra charge for the year, and cause the Estimate to exceed the previous year by that amount. That seemed to him a very great mistake in the manner of keeping accounts. He hoped by some means or other, in a short time, however, to deal with the City of Glasgow Prison. Before long, also, he trusted in many parts of Scotland to do away with numbers of the smaller gaols that were unfit.

Mr. Assheton Cross

MR. J. W. BARCLAY observed, that what they complained of in Scotland was that the Home Secretary required them to have better cells than were accepted in England. They were perfectly willing to be placed on the same footing with England; but they did not think it right that they should have to provide a superior cell. The right hon. Gentleman's Predecessors had declared certain cells in prisons to be suitable for the detention of prisoners. He thought those cells ought to be allowed under the present Act, because they were certified by the Predecessors of the right hon. Gentleman, and were in themselves very much better in many ways than some of those taken over by the Government in England.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS thought the hon. Member had misunderstood what he had said. Under the English Act of 1865, cells were certified and given a legal status; but in Scotland there was nothing of that kind. He quite agreed that cells had been passed by the Inspectors, and a certificate given by the Home Office in many cases; but they did not give those cells any legal status. Therefore the legal definition of a certified cell as existing in England did not apply to the cells in Scotland. Coming, however, to the other part of the question, he might say that they had not the slightest intention of dealing more hardly with Scotland than with England, the only object they had in view being to obtain such cells as would be suitable.

MR. MUNTZ did not think that the Committee was then in a position to discuss the Prisons Vote. The Act ought to be some time in working before its operation could be reasonably discussed. In the course of six or seven years it would have had a fair trial, and then would be the time to discuss what they ought to do. When the Act had been in operation for that period, they would be enabled to see its results. In his opinion, what the Act required to be done at the hands of the Central Government might be much better done by the local authorities. But the House had decided otherwise; and he, therefore, thought that the Act should be given fair play while it was being carried out.

MR. ERRINGTON thought the salaries of the various officers had been, to a certain extent, calculated upon the number of prisoners and of prisons. Under these circumstances, it seemed to him inconvenient to discuss the question of these salaries unless they had accurate information as to the number of gaols. Was the right hon. Gentleman in a position to state the number?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS remarked, that he had not then the Papers with him, although an Estimate had been made. It was, however, an Estimate to which he did not bind himself. The Inspectors had their salaries calculated according to all the circumstances of the case, and not only to the number of prisoners.

MR. WHITWELL noticed an item of £3,000 for additions to the Lunatic Department. He should like to know whether it was intended to have the lunatics in the General Prison?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS: The lunatic ward is quite distinct from the General Prison.

MR. O'DONNELL observed, that he found that the salaries of persons engaged in religious ministrations in the Perth General Prison, including the chaplains and Scripture readers, male and female, amounted to nearly £700 a-year. The Roman Catholic priest out of that sum was paid only £70 a-year, and he thought that was rather an inadequate allowance, considering the number of Roman Catholic prisoners. He wished to point out that a priest at one of those prisons must devote a large portion of his time to the prisoners, and the remuneration paid did not seem to him to be sufficient for the services performed by the Roman Catholic chaplain. He believed that the system with regard to persons engaged in religious ministrations to prisoners in the Scottish gaols was far from satisfactory; and in connection with the matter, he would more particularly point to the very inadequate salary paid to the Roman Catholic chaplain at Perth.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS said, that since the Estimates were framed in November, the whole question of religious ministrations to prisoners had been under consideration. They had now come to a conclusion with regard to the principal points, and a scheme embodying them would shortly be adopted. That was the case with regard to England, and he hoped it would shortly be so in the case of Scotland.

MR. PARNELL said, the Estimates were put before the House with very little information, under letter D, as to salaries and allowances. In the case of these Scotch prisons, the only details given them, under the head D, were some matters concerning the General Prison at Perth. He supposed that that was taken as a kind of example. He would point out, however, that in the case of the English prisons they had a much larger amount of detail given them. He hoped that next year they would have full details, both as regarded Scotch and Irish prisons.

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON said, that at the time the Votes were prepared, it was not possible to give full details with regard to the Scotch prisons. Before the Estimates for next year were framed, the question of the prisons throughout the country would be placed on a permanent basis, and it would be possible to give all the information the hon. Member required.

MR. PARNELL hoped that the hon. Baronet the Secretary to the Treasury would take into consideration the scale of salaries paid to prison officials. When the Vote for English Prisons was under discussion, he moved to reduce the Vote on the ground that the salaries paid to English prison officials were higher than the salaries of Irish officials. He considered this question of the salaries to prison officials a very important matter. He looked at it in this way—if they gave a low salary for a prison official, they necessarily obtained a lower class of persons in the prisons than they would do if the employment was made more remunerative. It was exceedingly necessary that the warders in prisons should be men of a better class than at present, and in order to attract them they must be well paid. It had always appeared to him that the profession of a warder should be very much like that of a schoolmaster. They had in the prisons criminals of various classes; some men hardened in crime—men who had committed enormous offences—but the majority of the prison population was composed of men who had committed an offence for the first time, and who were capable of reformation. If they set warders of an inferior class over such persons, they would simply harden them in crime, instead of reforming them. On the other hand, if the warders were trained, as the teachers in schools were trained, they would have a better class of men, and the prison discipline would be much more satisfactory than at present. He really thought that this question was very much lost sight of. The money for the maintenance of prisons was formerly derived from local sources, and was not voted by Parliament. It was now voted by Parliament, and these matters should be attended to. By keeping the salaries at a low ebb, they would be sure to get an inferior class of warders. If the hon. Baronet would consider the rate of payment to the warders with a view to raise it, he believed that they would be able to obtain a very much better class of warders, who had a great influence in the reformation of the prisoners. Perhaps he might be excused for going into some few matters of detail. By the Prisons Act, 1877, prisons were removed from the jurisdiction of the local authorities and placed under that of the Home Secretary. The Visiting Justices had very extensive powers under the old Prisons Act—the management, dietary, and powers of inspection, together with the appointment of the prison officials and warders, and, in fact, the whole management of the prisons was under their charge. The case was the same in Ireland, and, to a large extent, in Scotland, except that in Scotland the prisons were managed by a Prisons Board, which was composed of Justices. Practically, all the county Justices were upon the Prisons Board, and the management was, therefore, the same as it was in England and Ireland. Naturally, the Justices exercised a very large control over all the warders and Governors under their authority; but now the prisons had been handed over to the Government, and the power had been entirely centralized. Almost all the functions which were formerly performed by the Visiting Justices had now been taken away from them, and they had been left nothing to do. There was a clause in the Prisons Act which described the functions of Visiting Justices, who were by the Act called the Visiting Committee of Justices. That clause appeared only to have been put into the Act pro forma, in order to let the Justices down as lightly as possible, and to make them think that they had still some functions to perform with regard to prisons. From correspondence he had had, and from inquiries he had made, he had ascertained the view now taken by the Visiting Justices of their functions. They were of opinion that they had really no power at all. Moreover, the Act had been interpreted harshly and rigorously against them, and they had arrived at the conclusion that their duties had been entirely taken away from them.

THE CHAIRMAN said, he must point out to the hon. Member that the observations which he was now making were with reference to the English Prisons Vote, and not to the Vote now before the Committee. He understood the hon. Member to be referring to the functions of the Visiting Justices in England, and that certainly was not a matter arising under the present Vote.

MR. PARNELL said, there had been Visiting Committees in connection with the Scotch Prisons, and he thought he should be allowed to refer to the state of affairs as they existed in England in comparison with Scotland. The hon. Member was proceeding to comment upon the evidence of Sir William White, when—

THE CHAIRMAN again drew the attention of the hon. Member to the fact that the statements of Sir William White might be a very proper matter for the consideration of the House on another occasion, or might be a very proper contribution to the discussion on the English Prisons Vote; but it did not seem to him that they were relevant to the Vote now before the Committee. The hon. Member was not, therefore, in Order in going into these matters. The whole question of the prison discipline of the English prisons might be raised if the House went into such matters as the hon. Member was now referring to.

MR. PARNELL, in deference to the ruling of the Chairman, would not further refer to the evidence of Sir William White. He only wished to point out that the Visiting Committee in Scotland had precisely the same powers, or rather the same want of powers, as they had in England. The Visiting Committee had ceased to take any interest in their functions, for they had been superseded by the interpretation placed upon the Act of 1875 by the Home Secretary. He believed that an interpretation had been placed by the right hon. Gentleman upon the Act which was never contemplated when it was passed. When the present Act was passing through the House, he moved a new clause for the purpose of insuring that the punishments inflicted upon prisoners in gaols should not be done on the sole authority of the gaolers, but with the sanction of the Visiting Committee, in cases where solitary confinement for more than 24 hours was inflicted. There was no difference in this respect between the Scotch and the English Prisons Acts. By the 67th section of the English Prisons Act of 1865, the gaolers could punish prisoners by three days' confinement, and a similar section was in the Scotch Act. It was to limit that power that he moved the clause to which he had alluded; but by the interpretation placed upon it by the Home Secretary it had failed altogether in its effect. Under this system a man could be punished for three days, though the rules said he was not to be kept in the punishment cell for more than 24 hours. The prison authorities claimed the right to shut a prisoner in his own cell for three days, which seemed to him an absurdity. There was nothing in the Act about punishment cells. It simply required that there should be suitable cells provided for the purpose of punishing prisoners condemned to solitary confinement. It would, therefore, appear that this power of the gaoler to punish prisoners by confinement in their cells was a new practice outside the law, and not a practice allowed by the statute at all. It was certainly an illegal practice, and his attention had been a good deal drawn to it. Prisoners who did not "know the ropes" were very often repeatedly punished in this way, until they became so reduced physically that they were unable to do their work, and, as a result, prisoners very often died from the results of this punishment. That was the case with Nolan, and it was found to be so by the Coroner's jury. Certainly, in future, this power should be restrained to 24 hours, instead of three days; and he was very sorry the Home Secretary was not present, because he knew the matter had occupied his attention, and he should like some assurance that he was making some inquiries into the matter. He hoped the Home Secretary would take the opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown upon the subject, and ascertain whether these powers really existed in the hands of the gaoler. If it did, then he must introduce some amending Act, or it would be the duty of some independent Member to do it. The practice should not be tolerated for an instant of allowing gaolers to inflict this penalty. Where it was given, it should be inflicted only by the Visiting Justices, who should try the prisoner for the offence and sentence him. He did not see the least reason why the Visiting Justices should not enjoy power to that extent. This was the last remnant of power they possessed under the Act of 1877, and even that was so interpreted that the Justices had no practical control whatever. There were many other points suggested when the Act was passing through the House, to which the Home Secretary promised to give attention. For instance, he asked that men in the habit of wearing flannels should not be deprived of them when they entered prison. His attention was directed to the matter by the fact that that was the treatment inflicted on several of the political prisoners, and, as they all knew, more than one died in the prison. The Home Secretary promised to make a rule on the matter; but he had not done so. Again, the Home Secretary promised to attend to the question of malingering, which it was very difficult to guard against; but there was an entire absence of any reference to it in the rules. Then, again, prisoners sentenced to short terms, such as 21 days, got a diet which was practically insufficient to support life; and he was informed that in many prisons it was not used, because it was considered to be so. He had touched upon some of the points which he considered worthy of notice; and he trusted, in the absence of the Home Secretary, that the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury would be able to give them some assurances on the subject.

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON said, all these subjects had occupied the attention of the Home Secretary, and he knew that his right hon. Friend had thoroughly studied all these rules and regulations. The Committee must, of course, be aware that the rule was not to make much of prisoners, and the principle to be observed was that they should be so treated that no injury was done to their health. As to the question raised by the hon. Gentleman, that warders should be of the educational rather than of the strict guardian type, that was a very wide question, which went much further than the mere case of the warder. They must consider what their prisons were constituted for. His own view was that the prison should be a place, if possible, of punishment for the crime committed; and, while avoiding anything like tyranny or cruelty on the part of the officers, the prison should not be to the prisoner a place which he could contrast favourably with his ordinary life. While providing for the education and instruction of the prisoner, he yet doubted whether they would be justified in increasing the expense of the prison by improving the character of the officials, who might more fairly be looked upon as custodians rather than as educators of the prisoners in confinement. Their education and instruction was delegated to other officers employed for that purpose; and if they had in the warder a man who was careful and trustworthy, he very much doubted whether he need be any more than that. With regard to the difference in salaries, he hardly thought the contention of the hon. Gentleman was borne out by the facts. The salaries of the Irish warders compared favourably, in his opinion, with the salaries paid in the Scotch prisons, and even with those in the English prisons. They represented, he was satisfied, the value of the labour that was given in the three countries. Of course, the authorities of the prisons must get properly efficient men, and the salary paid must fairly represent that efficiency. The salary of the warders had been, to a certain extent, raised, in order to get suitable men. If the hon. Gentlemen doubted that, he had only to look at the Estimates. The warders in Ireland were paid £55, rising by £5 triennially to £70; while in Scotland the warders were paid £62, rising annually by £1 to £80; and in England they were paid £70, rising by £1 to £75. Therefore, the Irish warders were not unfavourably handicapped, as against the other two parts of the Kingdom. He could assure the hon. Member that there was no one more desirous of carrying out this Act on principles of humanity, though at the same time observing proper discipline, than his right hon. Friend.

Mr. Parnell

MR. O'CONNOR POWER observed, that this question of prison discipline was a very important matter. The two things necessary in regard to it were—first, good rules, and next, good administration. Now, he wished to point out that the Home Secretary had not fulfilled the promises he had made. They were dissatisfied with a number of points which, though small in themselves, were very important in their consequences. To his mind, the most important question connected with this subject was that of administration; and although by agitation they might succeed in getting the Home Office to try to frame rules as nearly perfect as possible, everything depended on the character of the persons appointed to carry them out. The object of the Commissioners should, therefore, be to secure the services of good men in all departments; and if they were to attract to the service men who could be trusted to do what was right in practice, and when the eye of their superior officer was not upon them, the remuneration now given in many departments must be enlarged. He had attended very closely to all the debates which had taken place in the House on the present system of prison discipline, and it had always seemed to him that the only way by which proper prison administration was to be secured was by, as far as possible, subjecting the prisons to non-official inspection. This was, also, one of the most useful parts of the suggestion of his hon. Friend the Member for Meath (Mr. Parnell), when he called attention to the necessity of letting light into prisons through the medium of Visiting Committees, for it was the only machinery by which the public outside were able to exercise any direct influence upon prison discipline. The limited powers given to these bodies should not, therefore, be restricted; on the contrary, the tendency to this opinion should be in the opposite direction. He remembered one suggestion brought forward before the Committee, that upon the payment of a small fee the public might be allowed to visit prisons at certain times, and see the size of the cells; and, again, one of the gravest questions that occupied them was concerning the size of the cell in which a prisoner had to be inured for a length of a time. The result of their consideration of this point was that some of the cells were thought to be unfit for the habitation of a human being. But absolutely nothing had been done to effect independent inspection at any time on the part of the outside public. He repeated, that the first object should be to frame new rules, and that the next should be to see that the good rules were administered; but, at present, the public had not guarantees for good administration, which, like all attempts to accomplish anything good, required the greatest care. The public, in his opinion, ought at some time or another to be allowed to see for themselves what was going on in these establishments. Attention had been called to the position of Catholic chaplains in the Scotch prisons, and it had been stated that some arrangement was made that they should be paid by time work, or by a kind of capitation grant. If that were the actual arrangement, it spoke very well for the conduct of the Catholic people of Scotland, because it showed that the Catholics formed a very small proportion of the prisoners. But he had met on more than one occasion with complaints of the narrow way in which Catholic priests were dealt with in the Scotch prisons; and now that Government had taken the prison administration into their own hands, it was a matter worthy of their attention to see that no class of prisoners should be without the services of ministers of religion, no matter what might be the local opinion under the circumstances. No matter what the prison officials might say or do, they could not make a man worship God according to the dictates of another man's conscience; and if they did anything to prisoners to make them amenable to religious influences, it must be by approaching them through ministers of their own persuasion. The Government must be aware that there was a large party in the House of Commons to whom this matter of prison discipline had for a long time been a subject of the greatest interest; and that many measures would have been brought forward by private Members, had they not hoped to succeed in pressing the Government not to let the question drop until the whole system had been placed upon a sound footing.

MR. O'DONNELL had listened with great pleasure to the hon. Baronet the Secretary to the Treasury, when he stated that the Home Secretary had taken into his serious consideration some of the points raised by the hon. Member for Meath (Mr. Parnell); but that had not touched the very essence and foundation of their complaint, that whatever might have been the consideration bestowed upon the point referred to, the right hon. Gentleman had not carried out his promise. He (Mr. O'Donnell) could not see that it could be very much consolation to the friends of a prisoner sentenced to twelve months' or three years' imprisonment, and who had been accustomed to wear flannels and required them for his health, to find that, notwithstanding all the consideration given by the Home Secretary to the subject, no rule had been framed to protect him from the brutality of being stripped of those garments upon which his health depended. The Secretary to the Treasury said that prisons were not places of pleasure, and that the population at large ought not to be accustomed to look upon imprisonment as an agreeable interlude in the business of life; but nobody in the House could at all favour the theory that punishments were given only for the object of exercising severity. He confessed that if the Home Secretary had given his great consideration to this matter, it was certainly singular that he should have allowed himself to be so far misled by his own reasonings as to contrive that curious gloss upon the Act of Parliament by which the plain intent of the Legislature had been totally foiled. The Legislature had decreed that the punishment of solitary confinements should not be inflicted for a period of more than 24 hours, except with the consent of certain outside authorities—namely, the Visiting Justices. But the right hon. Gentleman considered the question in this way. He knew that the Act forbade the infliction of close imprisonment upon a prisoner for more than 24 hours, except by permission of this external and independent authority; he also found that in the Act close imprisonment was defined to be imprisonment in a punishment cell. So he got out of the difficulty by an evasion, equally unworthy of his office and of the responsibility in which he stood before the country. The Act forbade him to inflict more than 24 hours in a regulation punishment cell, so he got out of the difficulty by allowing the gaoler to inflict three days' punishment in the prisoner's own cell. This was cruelty; it was not punishment, it was barbarity. Therefore, the sooner the right hon. Gentleman devoted a little more consideration to the subject the better for his own influence and the better for future Acts of Parliament. The question of prison discipline ought to engage a still larger share of the attention of the House than it had during recent years. It was admitted that, so far as any reformation of the prisoner was concerned, the working of the present system had been a thorough failure, and that to have passed a certain number of years in these academies of crime justly branded a man as a bad character for the remainder of his life; it was, therefore, necessary to impress upon the Government that the visits of prisoners to these places should, besides being punitive, be also reformatory. Unless they were to provide that when a man who got into prison should never come out, it ought to be considered how far the time spent there was likely to harden him in crime; and, in many cases, where the individual was as much a victim as an offender, whether he should become a burden to the population all the days of his life?

MR. BIGGAR had no doubt that punishments should not be inflicted except after judicial decision, and that, therefore, a Judge who gave that decision should know what was the extent of the punishment for which he passed sentence. It was thoroughly unreasonable that the Judge should think the punishment was going to be one thing, and that the party carrying the sentence into effect should inflict something of an entirely different character. But such was the case under the present system. The Judge might sentence a man to imprisonment with a certain amount of hard labour; and, in the manner described by the hon. Member for Meath, he might be put upon bread and water in solitary confinement, with the certainty of his either being permanently injured or meeting a premature death. It was never the intention of the House of Commons, when the Prison Act was passed, that such things as these should happen, or that the term of a month's imprisonment should become an equivalent for execution by Mr. Marwood. Another blot upon the system was that nothing was known or heard of a prisoner during the whole term of his imprisonment. If a man died from the effects of the treatment received, it was unsatisfactory that a Coroner's jury should decide upon the circumstances of his death, even supposing they could by some means get up the facts of the case; and it was well known that the officials supported and screened one another. He, therefore, considered that, as the Home Secretary had promised to amend the prison rules, some arrangement should be made by which a prisoner should have the opportunity of complaining if he thought he had been treated in a manner not in accordance with the prison rules. With regard to the prison chaplains, it was, of course, proper that they should receive a liberal salary; but this office, in the present case, was filled by a gentleman who also received £20 to pay for a substitute during his absence, from which it was to be gathered that he gave the whole of his time to the duties of the office. The Catholic priest got £70 a-year; but he did not require any irresponsible Scripture teacher, because he performed his duties himself. Then came the Scripture reader with a salary of £140 a-year, which was a larger sum by £15 than what was given to the highest teacher in the gaol, and was more by £10 than the sum paid to the head-warder. He (Mr. Biggar) held, in the first place, that these Scripture readers were not required at all; and that, secondly, even supposing they were required, the salary was excessive. The position of a Scripture reader was that of a person thoroughly irresponsible, and was either too stupid or too dishonest to fill that of schoolmaster, or, in short, any other useful employment. He thought that hon. Members of all denominations should set their faces against this system of paying to these irresponsible persons salaries equal to those paid to ministers of the Established Church; for that reason, he would move that the item of £140 for salaries to these persons be struck out of the Vote.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That the item of £140, for Salary of Scripture Reader in Perth Prison, be omitted from the proposed Vote."—(Mr. Biggar.)

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON could not for one moment agree that the Committee would take the view expressed by the hon. Member for Cavan (Mr. Biggar) of the position and duties of the Scripture readers, and he trusted that the Motion of the hon. Member would be rejected by the Committee.

Mr. PARNELL thought the Committee was entitled to know whether the Home Secretary persisted in the interpretation which he had placed upon Section 50 of the Prisons Act of 1877; that interpretation being entirely contrary to the intention of Parliament, and assuming an authority on the part of the Home Office which rendered the clause of no practical effect whatever. He had already explained that it continued the power to gaolers to inflict solitary confinement on bread and water diet just in the same way as before. Instead of limiting the power of these men, the Home Office had, by a device of their own, interpreted the Act to mean that solitary confinement of a prisoner in his own cell was a separate and distinct punishment from solitary confinement in a punishment cell. He wished to know whether the Home Secretary still adhered to his interpretation, and whether he had taken any steps since the matter was last discussed to submit the question for the opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown, as to the construction to be placed on the Section of the Act of 1877, to which he referred? He also desired to know whether, if he was still of opinion that the power to inflict this punishment existed, he would bring in a short Act to carry out the obvious intention of Parliament? As regarded the question of flannels, the Home Secretary had certainly promised that care should be taken to supply flannels to those prisoners who required them. The words "shall get them" were merely a form of expression, and he would be glad to know what steps the right hon. Gentleman had taken to frame rules with regard to this matter?

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON said, the hon. Member for Meath had forgotten that the power referred to had been in existence previous to the transfer of prisons. The punishment of bread and water diet was absolutely necessary for the maintenance of prison discipline.

MR. CALLAN observed, that the Roman Catholic priest received only £70 a-year, the Presbyterian clergyman £50 a-year; but the Scripture reader, whom he generally found to be a spirituous individual, was paid a good deal more. The teachers of religion in a prison at Perth thus only received £50 a-year; whereas the Scripture reader, the inferior minister, was paid a salary of £140 a-year, which salary it seemed had originally been fixed at £110 a-year, and had risen to its present maximum of £140. Thus the Scripture reader was paid exactly double what the Roman Catholic priest received. He could not understand another item; a warder received a salary for acting in the capacity of a "precentor," whatever that might be. There was also a teacher of music to the female convicts. He should like some explanation as to the allowance to a warder for teaching music to female convicts; he thought an explanation was also desirable with regard to the difference between the salaries to the Roman Catholic priest and the Protestant clergyman.

THE CHAIRMAN said, that it had been proposed to omit an item from the Vote under discussion. He must point out that until the Committee disposed of the Amendment moved by the hon. Member for Cavan, no other item could be discussed.

MR. CALLAN stated that he would confine his observations to the question of the Scripture reader, and would reserve the other questions till later.

MR. BIGGAR wished to say a few words with regard to what had fallen from the hon. Baronet the Secretary to the Treasury. In the first place, with regard to readers of what they called "the Scriptures," in his opinion, a teacher of religion should be an authorized person—that was, authorized by some religious community; and he was most distinctly of opinion that that House should not permit unauthorized persons to undertake the expounding of religion to persons under their control. He knew very well that Roman Catholics would not submit to such a thing, and he did not think that a member of the Established Church of Scotland would submit to have the doctrines of his Church expounded to him by any such irresponsible person as a Scripture reader. He knew one case of a Scripture reader who was formerly a National School teacher in Belfast, and was dismissed from his office for gross fraud; yet that person had been appointed a Scripture reader, and received money in that capacity. While employed as a teacher he issued what purported to be a summons from the Magistrates' Court in respect of a person's child, and levied a fine of a shilling for the summons. The summons was a forgery, and he had no right to charge anything for it. Having thus lost his situation as a National School teacher, that person turned his attention to Scripture reading, and had made a very good living out of it ever since. It seemed to him that those irresponsible people were very much better paid than properly qualified ministers of religion. The case of another Scripture reader in the North of Ireland was known to him. His character was described by a clergyman of the Church of Ireland in terms of unqualified disapproval. Under these circumstances, he must object to irresponsible people of this sort being employed, and for that reason he moved the reduction of the Vote.

MR. O'DONNELL thought that his hon. Friend the Member for Cavan (Mr. Biggar) must have formed his opinion of Scripture readers entirely from those few persons engaged in proselytizing in the North of Ireland. He was sure that there was no more respectable and no more useful body of assistants in the Protestant and Presbyterian Churches than the Scripture readers attached to those communities. The hon. Member for Cavan, it seemed to him, had been led to do injustice to the general body of Scripture readers from his experience of a certain number of persons called the Irish Church Missionaries. Forming his opinion from them, he had been led to generalize too much. The Scripture readers in prisons had a very arduous task to perform, and rendered good assistance to the ministers in their duties. Their employment thus tended to reduce the expenditure of religious ministrations in prisons, for he believed an expenditure in that direction was of great benefit in the reformation of prisoners.

Sir Henry Selwin-Ibbetson

MR. BIGGAR was indisposed in general to differ from his hon. Friend the Member for Dungarvan (Mr. O'Donnell); but on this occasion he could not agree with him. It was true he had no general experience of Scripture readers; but in the part of Ireland to which he belonged, that class of persons were in the habit of levying black-mail upon persons like old ladies who did not know the value of money. The payment to the Scripture readers was unfair, having regard to the salaries paid to the other officials in prisons. In the first place, he did think that it was the duty of the Committee to set its face against the employment of irresponsible teachers of religion. He had no objection to the payment of the Presbyterian chaplain, for he was responsible to the Church to which he belonged; but a Scripture reader was responsible to no one. Such a person might teach doctrines which were perfectly false so far as any Church was concerned, and he was not subject to the supervision of anyone at all. He might be a person of the most degraded character; and, for all these reasons, he felt himself called upon to divide upon this Vote. The Presbyterian Scripture reader at Perth must have gone on for some considerable time, for his salary had risen from £100 to £140 a-year, and, no doubt, the present Government were not responsible for his appointment. They found him in existence, and they did not raise any objection; but he thought then was the proper time for the Government to say that the whole of the duties of religious supervision to the Presbyterians in Perth Gaol should be properly carried out by a Presbyterian chaplain who was thoroughly competent, and who was responsible to the authorities of his own Church.

MR. PARNELL said, he was unwilling to differ from his hon. Friend the Member for Cavan (Mr. Biggar); but he thought on this occasion he was straining his point too far. His experience of Scripture readers was derived from persons in Connemara, who had rendered themselves obnoxious by trying to convert persons from the Roman Catholic faith to the Protestant faith. But the Scripture reader at Perth did not undertake proselytism. The functions of Scripture readers in Scotch gaols were simply to read the Scriptures to those prisoners who wished to hear them read. The hon. Member for Cavan was going somewhat contrary to his principle, that persons of a particular religious persuasion were entitled to the ministrations of their own creed. There were persons in Scotland who attached much greater importance than others to the reading of the Scriptures. It was, therefore, quite right that they should be allowed to carry out their views if they thought proper. The objection of the hon. Member for Cavan with regard to the disparity between the salaries paid was, however, both fair and just. The Scripture reader got a salary of £140 a-year, while the Roman Catholic chaplain was only paid £70 a-year. If the Government would undertake to apportion the salaries of the ministers—of the different classes of ministers—in these prisons according to the number of prisoners of each religious denomination, the object of the hon. Member for Cavan would be obtained, and it would not be necessary to go to a Division. At present, it had been explained that the whole question of the salaries of the chaplains was in an unsettled state. The question of Scripture readers would be gone into; and he thought, as a sort of principle, that the members of every creed were entitled to have religious ministrations according to their own wishes. It seemed to him that they could make this compromise with the Government—that the Motion should be withdrawn on the assurance of the Government that they would consider the question of apportioning the salaries of the different chaplains and ministers of the various denominations.

MR. A. M'ARTHUR said, the hon. Member for Meath (Mr. Parnell), who had just sat down, had informed them that he seldom disagreed with his hon. Friend the Member for Cavan (Mr. Biggar); but he thought the hon. Member for Cavan was wrong on that occasion, and would recommend him to withdraw his Amendment, and allow the item to pass. He (Mr. A. M'Arthur) did not often agree with the hon. Member for Cavan; but on this occasion he was disposed to do so. He begged, however, to say that he had not the slightest sympathy with the sentiments expressed by the hon. Member respecting Scripture readers. On the contrary, he believed that they were generally very good, excellent, and useful men; he had, therefore, no objection to them on the grounds mentioned by the hon. Member. But he believed there was a disposition manifested by certain hon. Members of the House to unnecessarily increase the number of chaplains and paid officials; and, with regard to the present case, he certainly thought that a Presbyterian chaplain, a Church of England clergyman, and a Roman Catholic priest, if they discharged their duties properly, should be quite sufficient to give religious instruction to the prisoners in one gaol. His hon. and learned Friend the Member for Louth (Mr. Sullivan) had stated, a few evening ago, when advocating an increase of Roman Catholic chaplains, that he had on one occasion voted in favour of a Presbyterian chaplain for a gaol in which there were only seven Presbyterian prisoners. Now, he (Mr. A. M'Arthur) could not help regarding that as altogether wrong, and a downright misappropriation of public money. In out-of-the-way places, where there were not ministers of all denominations, there might be some excuse for appointments of the kind; but in localities where there were numerous clergymen and ministers, and, comparatively few prisoners, he thought it would not be unreasonable to expect that such ministers should have sufficient Christian zeal and charity to induce them to attend to the religious instruction of prisoners belonging to the Church with which they were connected without any pecuniary reward. He also believed that the adoption of such a policy would have a much better effect upon prisoners and convicts themselves; for when they felt that men were giving them religious instruction and advice in a professional way, and merely because they were paid for doing the work, the effect upon the minds of prisoners was not likely to be so salutary and beneficial as if they felt that ministers belonging to their own Church were, from a sense of duty and out of pure love to them, endeavouring to promote their best interests by giving them religious instruction gratuitously. Such instruction was highly valuable and necessary; but he again stated that there appeared to be a desire on the part of certain hon. Members to unnecessarily increase the number of chaplains and paid officials. He protested against that as a waste of public money, and he thought hon. Members on both sides of the House should give the subject their careful consideration and attention.

Mr. A. M'Arthur

Mr. SULLIVAN did not think that the economical mind of the hon. Member for Leicester (Mr. A. M'Arthur) should be vexed by the expenditure under this Vote. The objection raised to the Vote could not be supported on the broad ground of principle, because the doctrine which would have to be enunciated was that the ministers of religion should have to live upon air. Even Scripture readers and ministers of religion had to pay their butchers and bakers. And if the Government did not pay the ministers of religion, who was to do so? Some one must pay them. The moment the Government put themselves into a position of authority, either with regard to paupers or prisoners, they were bound to pay for their support, their medical treatment, and their religious wants. Upon what doctrine could the hon. Member for Leicester support his argument that the ministers of religion were not to be paid? He was surprised, on this occasion, to find a conjunction of Leicester and Cavan in the objection to this Vote. It seemed to him that if a Presbyterian required the services of a Scripture reader he was entitled to have them. He took the broad view that if a man were put into prison, where reformation and amendment, rather than torture and vengeance, were to be the guiding principles, the influences of religion should be brought to bear upon that man even more strongly than when he was out-of-doors. The more complete and full the influences of religion upon a man were, so would his amendment be the stronger and more sincere.

Mr. BIGGAR observed, that the hon. and learned Member for Louth (Mr. Sullivan) seemed to think that he was attacking religion. He begged to say that that was not the case; he thought it was very desirable that prisoners should have religious teaching, but he thought that all religious teaching should be given by authorized ministers of religion. He did not believe in irresponsible teachers, and it was for that reason he should take a Division upon the Vote.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 4; Noes 152: Majority 148.—(Div. List, No. 112.)

Original Question again proposed.

MR. CALLAN, observing that the sum of £200 was charged as salaries for "female Scripture readers," asked for a definition of the term, and also for information with regard to the item for a teacher of music to the female convicts.

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON could hardly conceive that any explanation of the term "female Scripture reader" could be necessary. With regard to the teacher of music, the object of employing that person was to enable the prisoners to sing in chapel.

MR. PARNELL explained that, although he had spoken against the Amendment of the hon. Member for Cavan (Mr. Biggar), he had voted for it, because the Government had not accepted what he (Mr. Parnell) considered to be a fair compromise, when he suggested that the salaries of the persons in question should be equalized all round.

MR. BIGGAR was not disposed to contest one of the items of the Vote. He was of opinion that a woman was quite as competent as a man for the purposes of religious instruction; but it seemed that the sum charged for salary to these female readers—namely, £100 each, was most extravagant; and as he thought that the services of one teacher only were sufficient, he begged leave to move the reduction of the Vote by the amount of £100, the amount of the salary of the teacher whose services he considered to be in excess of the requirements of the prison.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That the Item of £200 for the Salaries of Female Scripture Readers in Perth Prison be reduced by £100."—(Mr. Biggar.)

MR. SULLIVAN hoped the hon. Member for Cavan (Mr. Biggar) would allow the Vote to pass, and in recommending that, he took the opportunity of expressing the high respect which he entertained for his motives; but he could not help thinking that it was through a misconception that Irish

Representatives spoke upon questions like the present. He did not believe that the people of Ireland wanted any information as to the duties of female Scripture readers, whom they knew to be persons ministering to the spiritual wants and necessities of immoral females; and if the prisoners really had the benefit of the services of such functionaries, he could only say that he should be very sorry for the office to be done away with. He repeated his belief in the excellency of the motives of his hon. Friend, but appealed to him not to delay the passing of the Vote by a proposal that would be greatly misconceived out-of-doors.

MR. BIGGAR, after the appeal of his hon. and learned Friend, was not disposed to take a Division.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £65,521, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1880, of Criminal Prosecutions and other Law Charges in Ireland, including certain Allowances under the Act 15 and 16 Vic. c. 83."

MR. PARNELL thought the hon. Baronet (Sir Henry Selwin-Ibbetson) would recollect that the bringing on of these Irish Votes upon that occasion was in violation of a promise given by him shortly before the Whitsuntide Recess. The promise was given in reply to a Question as to the course of Business, made at the commencement of the Sitting, when the hon. Baronet stated that no Irish Votes should be brought on until the second Estimate night after Whitsuntide. [SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON dissented.] The Secretary to the Treasury shook his head; but that was the distinct recollection of himself, and of many Irish Members; and, moreover, he noticed that the hon. Member for Galway (Mr. Mitchell H. E. T. Mitchell), who took a very strong interest in the Irish Votes, was not present in many thought the practice was a most vicious one, to put off the Votes from time to time, in order to suit the convenience of Members; but that was an entirely different thing to putting off the Votes, was disposed to do so. He begged, however, to say that he had not the slightest sympathy with the sentiments expressed by the hon. Member respecting Scripture readers. On the contrary, he believed that they were generally very good, excellent, and useful men; he had, therefore, no objection to them on the grounds mentioned by the hon. Member. But he believed there was a disposition manifested by certain hon. Members of the House to unnecessarily increase the number of chaplains and paid officials; and, with regard to the present case, he certainly thought that a Presbyterian chaplain, a Church of England clergyman, and a Roman Catholic priest, if they discharged their duties properly, should be quite sufficient to give religious instruction to the prisoners in one gaol. His hon. and learned Friend the Member for Louth (Mr. Sullivan) had stated, a few evening ago, when advocating an increase of Roman Catholic chaplains, that he had on one occasion voted in favour of a Presbyterian chaplain for a gaol in which there were only seven Presbyterian prisoners. Now, he (Mr. A. M'Arthur) could not help regarding that as altogether wrong, and a downright misappropriation of public money. In out-of-the-way places, where there were not ministers of all denominations, there might be some excuse for appointments of the kind; but in localities where there were numerous clergymen and ministers, and comparatively few prisoners, he thought it would not be unreasonable to expect that such ministers should have sufficient Christian zeal and charity to induce them to attend to the religious instruction of prisoners belonging to the Church with which they were connected without any pecuniary reward. He also believed that the adoption of such a policy would have a much better effect upon prisoners and convicts themselves; for when they felt that men were giving them religious instruction and advice in a professional way, and merely because they were paid for doing the work, the effect upon the minds of prisoners was not likely to be so salutary and beneficial as if they felt that ministers belonging to their own Church were, from a sense of duty and out of pure love to them, endeavouring to promote their best interests by giving them religious instruction gratuitously. Such instruction was highly valuable and necessary; but he again stated that there appeared to be a desire on the part of certain hon. Members to unnecessarily increase the number of chaplains and paid officials. He protested against that as a waste of public money, and he thought hon. Members on both sides of the House should give the subject their careful consideration and attention.

Mr. A. M'Arthur

Mr. SULLIVAN did not think that the economical mind of the hon. Member for Leicester (Mr. A. M'Arthur) should be vexed by the expenditure under this Vote. The objection raised to the Vote could not be supported on the broad ground of principle, because the doctrine which would have to be enunciated was that the ministers of religion should have to live upon air. Even Scripture readers and ministers of religion had to pay their butchers and bakers. And if the Government did not pay the ministers of religion, who was to do so? Some one must pay them. The moment the Government put themselves into a position of authority, either with regard to paupers or prisoners, they were bound to pay for their support, their medical treatment, and their religious wants. Upon what doctrine could the hon. Member for Leicester support his argument that the ministers of religion were not to be paid? He was surprised, on this occasion, to find a conjunction of Leicester and Cavan in the objection to this Vote. It seemed to him that if a Presbyterian required the services of a Scripture reader he was entitled to have them. He took the broad view that if a man were put into prison, where reformation and amendment, rather than torture and vengeance, were to be the guiding principles, the influences of religion should be brought to bear upon that man even more strongly than when he was out-of-doors. The more complete and full the influences of religion upon a man were, so would his amendment be the stronger and more sincere.

Mr. BIGGAR observed, that the hon. and learned Member for Louth (Mr. Sullivan) seemed to think that he was attacking religion. He begged to say that that was not the case; he thought it was very desirable that prisoners should have religious teaching, but he thought that all religious teaching should be given by authorized ministers of religion. He did not believe in irresponsible teachers, and it was for that reason he should take a Division upon the Vote.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 4; Noes 152: Majority 148.—(Div. List, No. 112.)

Original Question again proposed.

MR. CALLAN, observing that the sum of £200 was charged as salaries for "female Scripture readers," asked for a definition of the term, and also for information with regard to the item for a teacher of music to the female convicts.

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON could hardly conceive that any explanation of the term "female Scripture reader" could be necessary. With regard to the teacher of music, the object of employing that person was to enable the prisoners to sing in chapel.

MR. PARNELL explained that, although he had spoken against the Amendment of the hon. Member for Cavan (Mr. Biggar), he had voted for it, because the Government had not accepted what he (Mr. Parnell) considered to be a fair compromise, when he suggested that the salaries of the persons in question should be equalized all round.

MR. BIGGAR was not disposed to contest one of the items of the Vote. He was of opinion that a woman was quite as competent as a man for the purposes of religious instruction; but it seemed that the sum charged for salary to these female readers—namely, £100 each, was most extravagant; and as he thought that the services of one teacher only were sufficient, he begged leave to move the reduction of the Vote by the amount of £100, the amount of the salary of the teacher whose services he considered to be in excess of the requirements of the prison.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That the Item of £200 for the Salaries of Female Scripture Readers in Perth Prison be reduced by £100."—(Mr. Biggar.)

MR. SULLIVAN hoped the hon. Member for Cavan (Mr. Biggar) would allow the Vote to pass, and in recommending that, he took the opportunity of expressing the high respect which he entertained for his motives; but he could not help thinking that it was through a misconception that Irish

Representatives spoke upon questions like the present. He did not believe that the people of Ireland wanted any information as to the duties of female Scripture readers, whom they knew to be persons ministering to the spiritual wants and necessities of immoral females; and if the prisoners really had the benefit of the services of such functionaries, he could only say that he should be very sorry for the office to be done away with. He repeated his belief in the excellency of the motives of his hon. Friend, but appealed to him not to delay the passing of the Vote by a proposal that would be greatly misconceived out-of-doors.

MR. BIGGAR, after the appeal of his hon. and learned Friend, was not disposed to take a Division.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £65,521, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1880, of Criminal Prosecutions and other Law Charges in Ireland, including certain Allowances under the Act 15 and 16 Vic. c. 83."

MR. PARNELL thought the hon. Baronet (Sir Henry Selwin-Ibbetson) would recollect that the bringing on of these Irish Votes upon that occasion was in violation of a promise given by him shortly before the Whitsuntide Recess. The promise was given in reply to a Question as to the course of Business, made at the commencement of the Sitting, when the hon. Baronet stated that no Irish Votes should be brought on until the second Estimate night after Whitsuntide. [Sir HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON dissented.] The Secretary to the Treasury shook his head; but the was the distinct recollection of him and of many Irish Members; and, over, he noticed that the hon. prepared for Galway (Mr. Mitchell H. e Treasury took a very strong interest in the Irish Votes, was not at some hon. thought the practice was under a one, to put off the Vote. Accordingly, in time, in order to suit the hon. Gentleman Members; but that the Votes at all. His ferent thing to put as that that would course; for then they

and bringing them forward before the time agreed upon. Perhaps the Secretary to the Treasury would state how many of the Irish Votes he proposed to take that evening; because many Irish Members, in consequence of what he contended was the promise of the hon. Baronet not to bring on the Votes until the second Estimate night, were not prepared to discuss them to the extent which they considered to be necessary. He, therefore, begged to move that the Chairman do now report Progress.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."—(Mr. Parnell.)

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON distinctly denied that he had given the promise referred to by the hon. Member, to defer the consideration of the Irish Votes until the second Estimate night after the Whitsuntide Recess. It would be in the recollection of the Committee, who, he believed, would bear him out, that he had never given any such promise. What he had said to the hon. Member for Galway (Mr. Mitchell Henry), who had, on more than one occasion, asked him to postpone certain Votes in which he took a special interest, was that he would not bring on those Votes until Irish Members were present in sufficient number to discuss them. But he had told the hon. Member for Galway, on that occasion, that he would take the Law Votes for Ireland on the night before the House rose for the Recess, or as soon as possible thereafter. Although he had given no pledge, if hon. Members had been misled by anything he had said, and were willing to go on with the other Classes down upon the Paper, he had no wish to force the Irish Law Votes upon their attention.

MR. CALLAN asked if the promise to postpone the Votes referred to by the hon. Baronet was made in the House or way, course of private conversation? for don't you know, SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON: In the minds of hon. Members, [We were so saluted by the hon. Member for Galway, that minister, to be told that Irish Church were, to be bound by private out of pure love, to be bound by private to promote their religious interests.] The hon. Member for Galway (Mr. Callan) had the honour to give such instruction to the hon. Baronet, in his something to this effect, that—"As soon as he had reason to know that Irish Members were present in sufficient numbers, he would endeavour to bring on the Votes in which they were interested." The hon. Member for Meath (Mr. Parnell) was under the same impression as himself (Mr. Callan), that a pledge was given, or implied, that the Irish Votes should not be taken on the first night of the Estimates. He considered it to be absolutely essential that the Vote should be postponed, inasmuch as it was composed of several large items, of which no explanation whatever was afforded in the Estimates for the information of the Committee.

Mr. A. M. Arthur

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON, with the permission of the Committee, would recall what had really taken place with reference to the Irish Votes. Some hon. Members for Ireland raised the question as to whether the Irish Votes should not be postponed a second time—to such time as they could be fairly discussed? And, in answer to that, he had made use of the words just read by the hon. Member for Dundalk (Mr. Callan). He had also said that he would take care, as soon as hon. Members could attend, to bring on the Votes for the Queen's College and University in Ireland. Such was the purport of his speech just before the House broke up for the Recess. As he had already stated, he had no wish to force the Vote upon the Committee that evening upon a mere misunderstanding; but he trusted the Committee would allow the other Votes to be taken.

MR. CALLAN said, they might take Votes 24, 27, 28, and 29, as to which no question arose.

MR. PARNELL thought they must except Vote 28, as to which there would be some discussion. These Law charges, also, were a most important Vote, and would take a long time. But the others might be allowed to pass, as the hon. Baronet wished it, and that would meet the convenience of everybody. Of course, when he referred to an understanding, he knew nothing of a private conversation with the hon. Member for Galway.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. GIBSON) said, not a single item in these Law charges had been altered or objected to for many years; but if the hon. Members wished to raise a discussion the Vote could be postponed, only he did not see what possible questions could be urged.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Original Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

(7.) £28,888, to complete the sum for the Chancery Division of the High Court of Justice, &c. Ireland.

(8.) £8,387, to complete the sum for Probate, &c. Registries, Ireland.

(9.) Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £7,574, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1880, for the Salaries and the incidental Expenses of the Court of Bankruptcy in Ireland."

MR. O'DONNELL said, there was a strong objection to this Vote.

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON said, really hon. Members must make up their minds as to what they thought. Hon. Members proposed that they should take Votes 24, 27, 28, and 29, and since then Vote 28 had been objected to. Now, here was another objection. It seemed, if they were to proceed at all, that they were only to proceed at the suggestion of hon. Members opposite. He did not wish to be misrepresented. He denied having ever said any such thing; but if he had been represented as saying that he would not take certain Votes till the second day after Whitsuntide, then he would not proceed with the opposed Votes. But there were certain Votes to which they had been told there was no objection, and those he must ask the Committee to pass.

MR. CALLAN said, the Votes he mentioned were 24, 27, 28, and 29, and since then an objection had been taken to 28. He did not name 25, for it was one to which he entertained the strongest objection.

MR. J. LOWTHER said, the Vote now under discussion was No. 28. Did anybody object to that?

MR. CALLAN replied that he did not.

MR. PARNELL said, this Vote was included amongst those suggested by the hon. Member for Dundalk (Mr. OaHan); but the Committee would recollect that he (Mr. Parnell) immediately expressed his objection to it.

MR. NEWDEGATE remarked, that he began to question who was in charge of the Estimates. Of course, if it was a question of postponing one or two Votes in pursuance of some pledge, they expected that courtesy from Her Majesty's Government; but here was now a list of some seven Votes, with no reason for the postponement of any of them; and he would suggest to Her Majesty's Government, while they were thus considering the views of the few hon. Gentlemen who arrogated to themselves the representation of Ireland that the majority of the House had a right to expect from them the maintenance of such a continuity of Business as would enable Members generally to form some idea of what Business there was to be transacted.

MR. SULLIVAN said, if the hon. Member opposite (Mr. Newdegate) desired to have Business transacted, he would be less severe in his tones to the Treasury Bench, especially when it manifested the courteous and conciliatory disposition which it had been shown that night. [Laughter.] Hon. Gentlemen might laugh at that statement, and they no doubt desired scenes, which he and his hon. Friends desired to avoid. But the House would find out that the way to facilitate Business was to show the courteous spirit shown by the Secretary to the Treasury. The impression made by his conduct, and the generous spirit in which he had taken care, and more than care, that what he was represented to have said was carried out, would certainly tend to facilitate Business. The hon. Gentleman, if he desired that also, would do well to be less stern.

MR. NEWDEGATE replied, that a minority could not be allowed to command. He had seen the minority treated with very great forbearance; but there were limits to that forbearance, and if those limits were transgressed it became impossible for the great body of the House to do its duty.

MR. RYLANDS was quite prepared to support the Secretary to the Treasury in his impression of what he had said; but the fact remained that some hon. Gentlemen from Ireland were under a different impression. Accordingly, in the fairest way, the hon. Gentleman offered not to take the Votes at all. His own impression was that that would have been the best course; for then they

was disposed to do so. He begged, however, to say that he had not the slightest sympathy with the sentiments expressed by the hon. Member respecting Scripture readers. On the contrary, he believed that they were generally very good, excellent, and useful men; he had, therefore, no objection to them on the grounds mentioned by the hon. Member. But he believed there was a disposition manifested by certain hon. Members of the House to unnecessarily increase the number of chaplains and paid officials; and, with regard to the present case, he certainly thought that a Presbyterian chaplain, a Church of England clergyman, and a Roman Catholic priest, if they discharged their duties properly, should be quite sufficient to give religious instruction to the prisoners in one gaol. His hon. and learned Friend the Member for Louth (Mr. Sullivan) had stated, a few evenings ago, when advocating an increase of Roman Catholic chaplains, that he had on one occasion voted in favour of a Presbyterian chaplain for a gaol in which there were only seven Presbyterian prisoners. Now, he (Mr. A. M'Arthur) could not help regarding that as altogether wrong, and a downright misappropriation of public money. In out-of-the-way places, where there were not ministers of all denominations, there might be some excuse for appointments of the kind; but in localities where there were numerous clergymen and ministers, and comparatively few prisoners, he thought it would not be unreasonable to expect that such ministers should have sufficient Christian zeal and charity to induce them to attend to the religious instruction of prisoners belonging to the Church with which they were connected without any pecuniary reward. He also believed that the adoption of such a policy would have a much better effect upon prisoners and convicts themselves; for when they felt that men were giving them religious instruction and advice in a professional way, and merely because they were paid for doing the work, the effect upon the minds of prisoners was not likely to be so salutary and beneficial as if they felt that ministers belonging to their own Church were, from a sense of duty and out of pure love to them, endeavouring to promote their best interests by giving them religious instruction gratuitously. Such instruction was highly valuable and necessary; but he again stated that there appeared to be a desire on the part of certain hon. Members to unnecessarily increase the number of chaplains and paid officials. He protested against that as a waste of public money, and he thought hon. Members on both sides of the House should give the subject their careful consideration and attention.

Mr. A. M'Arthur

MR. SULLIVAN did not think that the economical mind of the hon. Member for Leicester (Mr. A. M'Arthur) should be vexed by the expenditure under this Vote. The objection raised to the Vote could not be supported on the broad ground of principle, because the doctrine which would have to be enunciated was that the ministers of religion should have to live upon air. Even Scripture readers and ministers of religion had to pay their butchers and bakers. And if the Government did not pay the ministers of religion, who was to do so? Some one must pay them. The moment the Government put themselves into a position of authority, either with regard to paupers or prisoners, they were bound to pay for their support, their medical treatment, and their religious wants. Upon what doctrine could the hon. Member for Leicester support his argument that the ministers of religion were not to be paid? He was surprised, on this occasion, to find a conjunction of Leicester and Cavan in the objection to this Vote. It seemed to him that if a Presbyterian required the services of a Scripture reader he was entitled to have them. He took the broad view that if a man were put into prison, where reformation and amendment, rather than torture and vengeance, were to be the guiding principles, the influences of religion should be brought to bear upon that man even more strongly than when he was out-of-doors. The more complete and full the influences of religion upon a man were, so would his amendment be the stronger and more sincere.

MR. BIGGAR observed, that the hon. and learned Member for Louth (Mr. Sullivan) seemed to think that he was attacking religion. He begged to say that that was not the case; he thought it was very desirable that prisoners should have religious teaching, but he thought that all religious teaching should be given by authorized ministers of religion. He did not believe in irresponsible teachers, and it was for that reason he should take a Division upon the Vote.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 4; Noes 152: Majority 148.—(Div. List, No. 112.)

Original Question again proposed.

Mr. CALLAN, observing that the sum of £200 was charged as salaries for "female Scripture readers," asked for a definition of the term, and also for information with regard to the item for a teacher of music to the female convicts.

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON could hardly conceive that any explanation of the term "female Scripture reader" could be necessary. With regard to the teacher of music, the object of employing that person was to enable the prisoners to sing in chapel.

Mr. PARNELL explained that, although he had spoken against the Amendment of the hon. Member for Cavan (Mr. Biggar), he had voted for it, because the Government had not accepted what he (Mr. Parnell) considered to be a fair compromise, when he suggested that the salaries of the persons in question should be equalized all round.

Mr. BIGGAR was not disposed to contest one of the items of the Vote. He was of opinion that a woman was quite as competent as a man for the purposes of religious instruction; but it seemed that the sum charged for salary to these female readers—namely, £100 each, was most extravagant; and as he thought that the services of one teacher only were sufficient, he begged leave to move the reduction of the Vote by the amount of £100, the amount of the salary of the teacher whose services he considered to be in excess of the requirements of the prison.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That the Item of £200 for the Salaries of Female Scripture Readers in Perth Prison be reduced by £100."—(Mr. Biggar.)

Mr. SULLIVAN hoped the hon. Member for Cavan (Mr. Biggar) would allow the Vote to pass, and in recommending that, he took the opportunity of expressing the high respect which he entertained for his motives; but he could not help thinking that it was through a misconception that Irish

Representatives spoke upon questions like the present. He did not believe that the people of Ireland wanted any information as to the duties of female Scripture readers, whom they knew to be persons ministering to the spiritual wants and necessities of immoral females; and if the prisoners really had the benefit of the services of such functionaries, he could only say that he should be very sorry for the office to be done away with. He repeated his belief in the excellency of the motives of his hon. Friend, but appealed to him not to delay the passing of the Vote by a proposal that would be greatly misconceived out-of-doors.

Mr. BIGGAR, after the appeal of his hon. and learned Friend, was not disposed to take a Division.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £65,521, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1880, of Criminal Prosecutions and other Law Charges in Ireland, including certain Allowances under the Act 15 and 16 Vic. c. 83."

Mr. PARNELL thought the hon. Baronet (Sir Henry Selwin-Ibbetson) would recollect that the bringing on of these Irish Votes upon that occasion was in violation of a promise given by him shortly before the Whitsuntide Recess. The promise was given in reply to a Question as to the course of Business, made at the commencement of the Sitting, when the hon. Baronet stated that no Irish Votes should be brought on until the second Estimate night after Whitsuntide. [Sir HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON dissented.] The Secretary to the Treasury shook his head; but that was the distinct recollection of himself, and of many Irish Members; and, moreover, he noticed that the hon. Member for Galway (Mr. Mitchell Henry), who took a very strong interest in many of the Irish Votes, was not present. He thought the practice was a most vicious one, to put off the Votes from time to time, in order to suit the convenience of Members; but that was an entirely different thing to putting off the Votes, and bringing them forward before the time agreed upon. Perhaps the Secretary to the Treasury would state how many of the Irish Votes he proposed to take that evening; because many Irish Members, in consequence of what he contended was the promise of the hon. Baronet not to bring on the Votes until the second Estimate night, were not prepared to discuss them to the extent which they considered to be necessary. He, therefore, begged to move that the Chairman do now report Progress.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."—(Mr. Parnell.)

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON distinctly denied that he had given the promise referred to by the hon. Member, to defer the consideration of the Irish Votes until the second Estimate night after the Whitsuntide Recess. It would be in the recollection of the Committee, who, he believed, would bear him out, that he had never given any such promise. What he had said to the hon. Member for Galway (Mr. Mitchell Henry), who had, on more than one occasion, asked him to postpone certain Votes in which he took a special interest, was that he would not bring on those Votes until Irish Members were present in sufficient number to discuss them. But he had told the hon. Member for Galway, on that occasion, that he would take the Law Votes for Ireland on the night before the House rose for the Recess, or as soon as possible thereafter. Although he had given no pledge, if hon. Members had been misled by anything he had said, and were willing to go on with the other Classes down upon the Paper, he had no wish to force the Irish Law Votes upon their attention.

MR. CALLAN asked if the promise to postpone the Votes referred to by the hon. Baronet was made in the House or in the course of private conversation? [SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON: In the course of private conversation.] Were the Committee to be told that Irish Members were to be bound by private conversations? The hon. Member for Galway was not the Leader of the Party to which he (Mr. Callan) had the honour to belong. The hon. Baronet, in his reply, had stated something to this effect, that—"As soon as he had reason to know that Irish Members were present in sufficient numbers, he would endeavour to bring on the Votes in which they were interested." The hon. Member for Meath (Mr. Parnell) was under the same impression as himself (Mr. Callan), that a pledge was given, or implied, that the Irish Votes should not be taken on the first night of the Estimates. He considered it to be absolutely essential that the Vote should be postponed, inasmuch as it was composed of several large items, of which no explanation whatever was afforded in the Estimates for the information of the Committee.

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON, with the permission of the Committee, would recall what had really taken place with reference to the Irish Votes. Some hon. Members for Ireland raised the question as to whether the Irish Votes should not be postponed a second time—to such time as they could be fairly discussed? And, in answer to that, he had made use of the words just read by the hon. Member for Dundalk (Mr. Callan). He had also said that he would take care, as soon as hon. Members could attend, to bring on the Votes for the Queen's College and University in Ireland. Such was the purport of his speech just before the House broke up for the Recess. As he had already stated, he had no wish to force the Vote upon the Committee that evening upon a mere misunderstanding; but he trusted the Committee would allow the other Votes to be taken.

MR. CALLAN said, they might take Votes 24, 27, 28, and 29, as to which no question arose.

MR. PARNELL thought they must except Vote 28, as to which there would be some discussion. These Law charges, also, were a most important Vote, and would take a long time. But the others might be allowed to pass, as the hon. Baronet wished it, and that would meet the convenience of everybody. Of course, when he referred to an understanding, he knew nothing of a private conversation with the hon. Member for Galway.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. Gibson) said, not a single item in these Law charges had been altered or objected to for many years; but if the hon. Members wished to raise a discussion the Vote could be postponed, only he did not see what possible questions could be urged.

Mr. Parnell

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Original Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

(7.) £28,888, to complete the sum for the Chancery Division of the High Court of Justice, &c. Ireland.

(8.) £8,387, to complete the sum for Probate, &c. Registries, Ireland.

(9.) Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £7,574, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1880, for the Salaries and the incidental Expenses of the Court of Bankruptcy in Ireland."

MR. O'DONNELL said, there was a strong objection to this Vote.

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON said, really hon. Members must make up their minds as to what they thought. Hon. Members proposed that they should take Votes 24, 27, 28, and 29, and since then Vote 28 had been objected to. Now, here was another objection. It seemed, if they were to proceed at all, that they were only to proceed at the suggestion of hon. Members opposite. He did not wish to be misrepresented. He denied having ever said any such thing; but if he had been represented as saying that he would not take certain Votes till the second day after Whitsuntide, then he would not proceed with the opposed Votes. But there were certain Votes to which they had been told there was no objection, and those he must ask the Committee to pass.

MR. CALLAN said, the Votes he mentioned were 24, 27, 28, and 29, and since then an objection had been taken to 28. He did not name 25, for it was one to which he entertained the strongest objection.

MR. J. LOWTHER said, the Vote now under discussion was No. 28. Did anybody object to that?

MR. CALLAN replied that he did not.

MR. PARNELL said, this Vote was included amongst those suggested by the hon. Member for Dundalk (Mr. Callan); but the Committee would recollect that he (Mr. Parnell) immediately expressed his objection to it.

MR. NEWDEGATE remarked, that he began to question who was in charge of the Estimates. Of course, if it was a question of postponing one or two Votes in pursuance of some pledge, they expected that courtesy from Her Majesty's Government; but here was now a list of some seven Votes, with no reason for the postponement of any of them; and he would suggest to Her Majesty's Government, while they were thus considering the views of the few hon. Gentlemen who arrogated to themselves the representation of Ireland that the majority of the House had a right to expect from them the maintenance of such a continuity of Business as would enable Members generally to form some idea of what Business there was to be transacted.

MR. SULLIVAN said, if the hon. Member opposite (Mr. Newdegate) desired to have Business transacted, he would be less severe in his tones to the Treasury Bench, especially when it manifested the courteous and conciliatory disposition which it had been shown that night. [Laughter.] Hon. Gentlemen might laugh at that statement, and they no doubt desired scenes, which he and his hon. Friends desired to avoid. But the House would find out that the way to facilitate Business was to show the courteous spirit shown by the Secretary to the Treasury. The impression made by his conduct, and the generous spirit in which he had taken care, and more than care, that what he was represented to have said was carried out, would certainly tend to facilitate Business. The hon. Gentleman, if he desired that also, would do well to be less stern.

MR. NEWDEGATE replied, that a minority could not be allowed to command. He had seen the minority treated with very great forbearance; but there were limits to that forbearance, and if those limits were transgressed it became impossible for the great body of the House to do its duty.

MR. RYLANDS was quite prepared to support the Secretary to the Treasury in his impression of what he had said; but the fact remained that some hon. Gentlemen from Ireland were under a different impression. Accordingly, in the fairest way, the hon. Gentleman offered not to take the Votes at all. His own impression was that that would have been the best course; for then they would have been saved something which looked like haggling—one hon. Gentleman objecting to one Vote and one to another. He would suggest to the Government that they should not proceed further with the Irish Votes that night, as it was quite clear there had been a misunderstanding. He would move that they should now report Progress, and take the Customs and Inland Revenue Bill.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again." — (Mr. Rylands.)

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON hoped the Committee would adhere to the original arrangement and take these four Votes before it passed to anything else, as he hoped to ask them to take certain other Votes with the view of advancing the Business of Supply.

MR. BIGGAR thought the hon. Baronet had exercised a wise discretion in entering into a compromise with certain Members on that side of the House, for there was plenty of opportunity to raise several questions on the Votes just agreed to, and he was disposed to have done so but for the compromise suggested. As to the Bankruptcy Vote, the Attorney General for Ireland must know that the Members for Belfast had a very decided opinion in favour of a Local Bankruptcy Bill, and he was sure they would be disappointed if this Vote should be passed in their absence. He knew, of course, that the present Bill could not pass this Session; but still the hon. Gentlemen who were not now present might feel a satisfaction in being able to speak on the subject.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. Gibson) said, the matter would be discussed on its merits, and he felt sure neither of those hon. Members would wish the Vote postponed on their account.

MR. ERRINGTON thought nothing could be fairer than the conduct of the Secretary to the Treasury; but certainly his own impression was shared by many other hon. Members, that no Irish Votes were to be taken that night. He thought that the best thing to be done now was to accept the suggestion of the hon. Member for Burnley (Mr. Rylands).

MR. J. LOWTHER explained, that the offer of the Secretary to the Treasury was to withdraw all Irish Votes except those which were practically unopposed. As to this particular Vote, he did not share the misgivings of the hon. Member for Cavan (Mr. Biggar), that certain hon. Gentlemen, not usually very prominent in opposing Votes, would take exception to this one; and as no hon. Member present took any exception to it, he hoped it would be allowed to pass.

Mr. Rylands

MR. CALLAN hoped his hon. Friend (Mr. Parnell) would withdraw his opposition to this Vote. The Judges were very efficient officers, and he thought of all the Votes this was one to which the fewest objections applied.

MR. BIGGAR knew that the hon. Members for Belfast did desire a Local Bill; and as there was not the least chance of the Bankruptcy Bill becoming law this Session, he did think that those two hon. Gentlemen would be very pleased to have an opportunity of speaking on this subject.

MR. RAMSAY regretted the waste of time, the more that it had arisen from the extreme courtesy of the hon. Gentleman, and his desire to prevent complaints. He thought they might pass this Vote; because, though they had had half-an-hour's discussion, no one had anything to say against the Vote itself.

SIR JOSEPH M'KENNA said, the Vote was one to which no reasonable objection could be made; and he therefore hoped the Motion would be withdrawn, and the Vote allowed to pass.

MR. RYLANDS asked for leave to withdraw his Motion.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. PARNELL said, there was a question of considerable importance involved in this Vote—the question of Local Bankruptcy Courts in Ireland. He was very anxious to discuss it; but he would give way in response to the appeals of his hon. Friends, and so was, practically, giving up his chance of discussing this matter in that Session; for though the Attorney General had a Bill on the Paper, he never got a day for his measures, so that it was not very likely to come on.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

(10.) £1,195, to complete the sum for the Admiralty Court Registry, Ireland.

CLASS VI.—SUPERANNUATION AND RETIRED ALLOWANCES, AND GRATUITIES FOR CHARITABLE AND OTHER PURPOSES.

(11.) Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £289,772, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1880, for Superannuation and Retired Allowances to Persons formerly employed in the Public Service, and for Compassionate or other Special Allowances and Gratuities awarded by the Commissioners of Her Majesty's Treasury."

MR. WHITWELL hoped the Secretary to the Treasury would not take so important a Vote at that hour, and moved to report Progress.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."—(Mr. Whitwell.)

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON hoped the Committee would not agree to the Motion. Although the Vote was an important one, it was never discussed, for it was only carrying out the pledges given by the Government to its Civil servants, and he could not conceive the hon. Member could wish that to be diminished or altered.

MR. MONK said, the grounds of the Motion were not quite understood. They had been steadily progressing through Supply for the last seven hours, and now one of the most important measures of the Session was about to be brought into Committee—the Customs and Inland Revenue Bill. His hon. Friend (Sir Henry Selwin-Ibbetson) seemed to think, because that was a Money Bill, that it could be taken at any hour. He might, technically, be right; but he certainly could not think that was the proper way to discuss it. He was sure it would facilitate Business if they were now allowed to report Progress, and to take the Customs and Inland Revenue Bill.

MR. WHITWELL thought that this subject could not be properly discussed at that hour. It was not right to take a Vote of £500,000 on a subject of this kind at that time; by so doing, the Committee pledged itself to pay large amounts of superannuation to persons who would receive it for the first time. It was time that the Committee should take into its serious consideration how far they should advance in the direction in which they were now going in this matter of superannuation. Although they might not be able to obtain any reduction in the Vote, yet he thought public attention should be drawn to this question of superannuation and allowances; and, as that could not be done at 12 o'clock at night, he should object to their proceeding further at that time.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 30; Noes 120: Majority 90.—(Div. List, No. 113.)

MR. RYLANDS said, that as he now observed the Leader of the House in his place, he would appeal to him not to go any further at that hour. They had been sitting in Committee of Supply for many hours—ever since 5 o'clock. If the Customs and Inland Revenue Bill were to be taken at all to-night, it could not be taken later than the present time.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER hoped that the Customs and Inland Revenue Bill would be taken that night. He was sorry they had not made so much progress in Committee as they might have done. However, after taking that one Vote, he proposed to report Progress, and to go on with the Customs and Inland Revenue Bill.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

House resumed.

Resolutions to be reported To-morrow, at Two of the clock;

Committee to sit again upon Wednesday.

CUSTOMS AND INLAND REVENUE BILL.—[BILL 150.]

(Mr. Raikes, Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Sir Henry Selwin-Ibbetson.)

COMMITTEE. [Progress 20th May.]

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

PART I.—Customs.

Clauses 1 to 14, inclusive, agreed to.

PART II.—Taxes.

Clause 15 (Grant of duties of income tax.)

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Clause stand part of the Bill."

MR. COURTNEY observed, that he had understood the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General to say recently, in answer to a question from an hon. Member, that any person who occupied agricultural land, and did not make a profit, could escape altogether payment of Income Tax. He could not see how that was reconcilable with this clause of the Bill, which was a repetition of the clause always inserted in the Income Tax Bills ever since the imposition of the tax. He wished to know whether the statement of the hon. and learned Gentleman was reconcilable with the clause? He should also like to be informed whether, if, as he had said, a farmer who did not make profit would escape being assessed for Income Tax altogether, he would, on the other hand, if he made additional profit, be bound to pay Income Tax upon more than the amount of half his rent? Could he, in such a case, be charged in addition to that rent? He should have thought that the principle of assessment was that the assessment of half the rent was to cover good and bad years alike, and was to be paid in all cases. If a farmer were not to be taken at his assessment of half his rent in England, and one-third in Scotland, when he made no profit, he thought some explanation should be given to the Committee of what happened when he made a large profit.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir JOHN HOLKER) said, that the answer he had given on the former occasion was made by him from instructions he received. That answer he thought to be accurate. But if the hon. Member would allow him to consider the operation of this particular clause of the Bill, he should be happy to give him his opinion. As at present advised, he thought that his former answer was accurate—that if a farmer did not make any profit out of his farm he would, then, escape the payment of Income Tax. Still, it might be that the answer was not accurate; and he should like his hon. Friend to give him a short time to consider it, in connection with this Bill, before he pledged himself to the accuracy of the answer. If his hon. Friend would repeat the question, either in the course of that evening, or at some other time, after he had considered the matter, he should be happy to give him his opinion with regard to it.

MR. RYLANDS considered that the reply of the hon. and learned Attorney General had placed the Committee in a most extraordinary position. The mode of assessment in the case of farmers for every 20s. of the annual value of the occupation of the land implied that a farmer, however large his profit might be, should not be charged on any larger sum than that determined by the amount of his rent; and, on the other hand, if he made a loss, that he should not be charged less than the sum provided for by the Act; and, in this way, he had always understood the amount chargeable upon farmers to be fixed and permanent, inasmuch as, unlike the charge upon ordinary trade profits, it did not fluctuate. But in what position had the Committee been placed? The Government, through their mouthpiece, the most learned authority in the House, had told the Committee that the clause was not understood, and that with regard to its meaning no answer could then be given. In answer to the hon. Member for Liskeard (Mr. Courtney), the Attorney General had asked that the Committee would allow this matter to go forward, and had promised at some future time, perhaps in answer to a Question put upon the Paper, to give the result of his mature judgment upon the point raised by the hon. Member. But, by that time, he (Mr. Rylands) wished to point out that the Bill would be passed and the clause enacted. If it was to be understood that during periods the most flourishing for agriculture, when farmers might make incomes considerably over the amount represented by half their rental, they were not to pay any more than the amount chargeable by this mode of assessment, the adoption of such a principle was, in his opinion, grossly unfair to other classes of the Income Tax paying community. Unless the hon. and learned Gentleman could tell the Committee what was the meaning of the clause, he hoped the hon. Member for Liskeard would move to report Progress, in order that the Committee might not be placed in the position of passing a clause of the meaning of which they knew nothing.

MR. SAMPSON LLOYD said, as far as he remembered, the terms of the present Bill were precisely the same as those of the Acts hitherto in force; and he wished to point out that the difficulty raised by the hon. Member for Liskeard (Mr. Courtney) had nothing to do with the question whether the Committee should proceed to pass the clause then under consideration in the usual way. The assessment under Schedule B was very much in the same position as that under Schedule D, by which a man assessed at more than his profits had a right to show, on appeal, that he had been over assessed. The Attorney General had expressed his opinion that a farmer had this right of appeal, and that the question was determinable by the Courts of Law. He (Mr. Sampson Lloyd) trusted that the clause would not meet with opposition, as all previous enactments had been in the same form as that now presented to the Committee.

MR. THOMSON HANKEY had always understood that the Schedule referred to by the hon. Member for Plymouth (Mr. Sampson Lloyd) was agreed to as a compromise in view of the exceeding difficulty of ascertaining the profits of a farmer in the same way as those of a mechanic. But the Attorney General had put the Committee into confusion, by saying that he did not understand the meaning of the clause; surely, therefore, it would be better to report Progress, in order to give the Government and the Attorney General time to consider what it really meant. He had no objection to the clause as previously understood; but if a new interpretation was to be put upon it, it should be made perfectly clear.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir JOHN HOLKER) thought that as the hon. Member for Liskeard (Mr. Courtney) had only called attention to the question as he was on the point of leaving the House, he might have been excused from expressing an opinion without some further consideration. But he begged to protest against the statement of the hon. Member for Peterborough (Mr. Thomson Hankey), that he had put the Committee in any difficulty with regard to this question; for if there existed any doubt as to the proper construction of the clause, it certainly was not he who had caused it. The question of the liability of farmers, under the circumstances indicated, would have to be considered by the Courts of Law; and all that was required of him, and all that could be expected of him, was to express an opinion as to what construction would be placed upon the clause by those Courts. The whole question turned upon the meaning of the words "annual value of the occupation." Some hon. Members were of opinion that the annual value of the occupation of land was the amount of the rent; but to that conclusion he could not assent, because if he found sufficient evidence that the rent was not the annual value of the land, but that, on the contrary, the tenant had been making nothing by it for a considerable period, he should conclude that the rent was very much higher than the value of the occupation of the land, and that the tenant who made nothing out of it, or who made less than the rent, would not be liable to pay the tax. That view might not be a correct one, and the hon. Member for Liskeard (Mr. Courtney) might be able to satisfy him that it was not. What he had stated, in answer to the Question put, not the other day but some time ago, was that—"If a tenant did not make any profit out of his farm he could escape payment of the Income Tax," and to that opinion he still adhered.

MR. RAMSAY thought, whatever might be the result of the discussion, that the question involved, and the opinion given by the hon. and learned Attorney General, were of very great importance. Whatever might have been the law, the practice had always been to charge farmers in respect of the rent paid for the occupation of the land, and from that practice he had never known of any case of appeal. Now, if it were the intention of the Government, as he understood from the observations of the Attorney General, that farmers should, in future, have the right of appeal in cases where it was found that no profit had accrued from the land in their occupation, that right ought to be made so clear as not to admit of doubt. Upon these grounds, therefore, and for the purpose of enabling the Government to make such change in the terms of the clause as would provide that farmers either should or should not have the right of appeal against an assessment in respect of the rent which they paid, he thought that the Government should agree to report Progress. No doubt, the hon. and learned Attorney General was quite correct in his view of the law; but it was of great consequence that the question should be definitely settled. He thought that those acquainted with the operation of the law in this country must be aware whether or not there had been any cases of appeal with regard to assessment on rental. As the case now stood, farmers had never within his knowledge been recognized by assessors of Income Tax as having any such right, and for that reason the law ought to be placed beyond all doubt.

MR. FAWCETT said, that the Government, and not the Attorney General, were held responsible in this matter. So far from being liable to blame, the Attorney General was entitled to the thanks of the Committee for pointing out the obscurity which existed in the wording of the clause, which certainly could not be interpreted by the Committee if it could not be interpreted by either the Government or the hon. and learned Gentleman. Without, on that occasion, attempting to express any opinion as to what ought to be the mode of assessing farmers for Income Tax—whether they should be treated in the same manner as ordinary traders, or be charged on half the rental of their land—the contention raised was simply that the law should be made clear, definite, and precise, so that it might not only be interpreted by the Attorney General or by the farmer in a certain way, but be understood by any ordinary man of business. When, therefore, the Attorney General rose in his place to say that he could not interpret this clause, and expressed the opinion that it would lead to litigation, he supplied an argument absolutely without answer in favour of reporting Progress, so as to give Her Majesty's Government the opportunity of bringing up a clause clear and intelligible, and which would embody their views upon the subject. The Committee ought to know—and the great agricultural interest ought to know—whether it was, or was not, the intention of the Government that the old rule should be rigidly kept—that farmers should be treated exceptionally, and that, unlike other traders, they should not pay Income Tax on their profits, but pay on a fixed proportion of their rents. If that was the intention of Her Majesty's Government, let it be so stated; and if, on the other hand, the Government intended to change the system which had been in operation ever since the Income Tax had been imposed, and to treat farmers in future in the same way as other traders were treated; if, when a farmer should go to the Commissioners and say—"I have made no profit; you must not charge me with any Income Tax," the Commissioners were to have power to say—"You have made profits, and we shall charge you upon an amount equal to the rent, or more than the rent," the Government should state that also clearly and explicitly, and embody the principle in the Bill in such a manner as would render misunderstanding impossible. The Attorney General, he trusted, would not suppose that the smallest blame was intended to be cast upon him; on the contrary, thanks were due for the manner in which he had come forward and frankly stated that he could not interpret the clause in the Bill introduced by the Government of which he was a Member. Under those circumstances, he (Mr. Fawcett) thought that no other course was open to the Committee but to further consider the matter; and, with that object in view, he begged to move that Progress be reported.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."—(Mr. Fawcett.)

MR. NEWDEGATE said, that the Income Tax was assessed by the Legislature on land in occupation in respect of the rent at the rate of half the rent, for the reason that land was an instrument, and it was thought unfair to tax an instrument of trade twice over—that was to say, first in respect of its possession, and again in respect of its occupation. It was admitted that the tenant farmer derived additional profit from the employment of capital, and it was thought that the capital ought to be assessed; but, inasmuch as the land already paid under Schedule A, and the capital belonged partly to the landlord and partly to the tenant, a compromise was effected, and the tenant was assessed at half the amount of the rent. Assuming that the Government intended to abide by the principle of assessment, which he had endeavoured to describe—and he should be surprised to learn that they proposed to place any additional burden upon landed property and the agricultural interest—he wished to ask, whether it was their intention to give the tenant farmer the right of appeal against his assessment, and the right to prove, if he could, that he had made no profit?

Mr. Ramsay

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Sir, I cannot help thinking there is some confusion in the minds of the Committee with regard to this clause. It is said that its meaning is not understood by the Government; but I do not think that is a fair description of the clause as it stands in the Bill. The clause is one for fixing for the current year the rate of the Income Tax which it is proposed to continue, and that rate is fixed in the terms which have been employed for a great number of years, very nearly in the same words as those used in 1842, when the tax was originally imposed. All that it does is to provide—

“That there shall be charged, collected, and paid for the year commencing on the Sixth day of April One thousand eight hundred and seventy-nine, in respect of all property, profits, and gains mentioned or described as chargeable in the Act of the Sixteenth and Seventeenth years of Her Majesty's reign, chapter thirty-four, the following duties of income tax; (that is to say,)—

“For every twenty shillings of the annual value or amount of property, profits, and gains chargeable under Schedules (A.), (C.), (D.), or (E.) of the said Act, the duty of twopence:

“And for every twenty shillings of the annual value of the occupation of lands, tenements, hereditaments, and heritages chargeable under Schedule (B.) of the said Act,—

“In England, the duty of twopence halfpenny.”

These words are intended to have, and, no doubt, they must have, the effect of continuing for the year the charge at these rates upon the descriptions of property named. Clause 16 provides that all provisions which were in force on the 5th of April last shall have full force and effect for another year from that time. There is no intention whatever by this Bill to make any change in the manner of raising the Income Tax upon Schedule B, or upon any other Schedule; and I cannot, therefore, understand why this Bill should be charged with anything like obscurity. Again, the question is raised as to what might be the effect of an appeal which might be made by an occupier of land, under Schedule B, against the assessment upon the principle on which he has always been assessed? But that is a question of a rather speculative character; and I am not aware that any such case has arisen, or that any such appeal has been made; but if such a case should arise, no doubt, the appeal would be properly heard and determined according to the law which has existed since the year 1842. The Government have no intention whatever to put any construction upon the law other than that which has been placed upon it since the time when the tax was originally enforced; and, therefore, no charge of any kind will be placed upon the tenant farmer, under Schedule B, beyond such as has been enforced already. But the question may be raised upon the point now suggested, which, perhaps, never occurred before—that is to say, whether it might not be open to a tenant farmer, who was charged according to the practice hitherto prevailing, to raise the question whether he was rightly charged, and, perhaps, appeal, and say that he ought to be charged less because he had made no profit. But, in that case, either he would be able to support his appeal or he would not; if he could not, nothing need be said; but if he could, he would get the advantage of his appeal, and, of course, the Exchequer would be losers in that proportion. If we thought there was any probability of appeals being made which would entail loss upon the Exchequer, and if we thought that it was not the wish of Parliament that such loss should be entailed, it would, of course, be open to us to propose a clause to meet the imaginary case which I say has not arisen. We are quite prepared to allow the law, as far as the collection of taxes is concerned, to stand upon its present footing; nobody is damnified, and no occupier of land is in any way injured thereby, because the law will continue to be the same as it has always been, and the Government do not apprehend that they will suffer any loss. For these reasons, I think there is no case whatever, either for our adjourning or, for putting off the progress of the Bill. All we are asking the Committee to do now is that which has been done for 37 years—namely, to continue the Income Tax from year to year upon its original footing.

MR. COURTNEY observed, that the Attorney General gave an answer to the Question put to him on the former occasion without the least hesitation or doubt. He said, most certainly, that if a farmer, was disposed to do so. He begged, however, to say that he had not the slightest sympathy with the sentiments expressed by the hon. Member respecting Scripture readers. On the contrary, he believed that they were generally very good, excellent, and useful men; he had, therefore, no objection to them on the grounds mentioned by the hon. Member. But he believed there was a disposition manifested by certain hon. Members of the House to unnecessarily increase the number of chaplains and paid officials; and, with regard to the present case, he certainly thought that a Presbyterian chaplain, a Church of England clergyman, and a Roman Catholic priest, if they discharged their duties properly, should be quite sufficient to give religious instruction to the prisoners in one gaol. His hon. and learned Friend the Member for Louth (Mr. Sullivan) had stated, a few evenings ago, when advocating an increase of Roman Catholic chaplains, that he had on one occasion voted in favour of a Presbyterian chaplain for a gaol in which there were only seven Presbyterian prisoners. Now, he (Mr. A. M'Arthur) could not help regarding that as altogether wrong, and a downright misappropriation of public money. In out-of-the-way places, where there were not ministers of all denominations, there might be some excuse for appointments of the kind; but in localities where there were numerous clergymen and ministers, and comparatively few prisoners, he thought it would not be unreasonable to expect that such ministers should have sufficient Christian zeal and charity to induce them to attend to the religious instruction of prisoners belonging to the Church with which they were connected without any pecuniary reward. He also believed that the adoption of such a policy would have a much better effect upon prisoners and convicts themselves; for when they felt that men were giving them religious instruction and advice in a professional way, and merely because they were paid for doing the work, the effect upon the minds of prisoners was not likely to be so salutary and beneficial as if they felt that ministers belonging to their own Church were, from a sense of duty and out of pure love to them, endeavouring to promote their best interests by giving them religious instruction gratuitously. Such instruction was highly valuable and necessary; but he again stated that there appeared to be a desire on the part of certain hon. Members to unnecessarily increase the number of chaplains and paid officials. He protested against that as a waste of public money, and he thought hon. Members on both sides of the House should give the subject their careful consideration and attention.

Mr. A. M'Arthur

Mr. SULLIVAN did not think that the economical mind of the hon. Member for Leicester (Mr. A. M'Arthur) should be vexed by the expenditure under this Vote. The objection raised to the Vote could not be supported on the broad ground of principle, because the doctrine which would have to be enunciated was that the ministers of religion should have to live upon air. Even Scripture readers and ministers of religion had to pay their butchers and bakers. And if the Government did not pay the ministers of religion, who was to do so? Some one must pay them. The moment the Government put themselves into a position of authority, either with regard to paupers or prisoners, they were bound to pay for their support, their medical treatment, and their religious wants. Upon what doctrine could the hon. Member for Leicester support his argument that the ministers of religion were not to be paid? He was surprised, on this occasion, to find a conjunction of Leicester and Cavan in the objection to this Vote. It seemed to him that if a Presbyterian required the services of a Scripture reader he was entitled to have them. He took the broad view that if a man were put into prison, where reformation and amendment, rather than torture and vengeance, were to be the guiding principles, the influences of religion should be brought to bear upon that man even more strongly than when he was out-of-doors. The more complete and full the influences of religion upon a man were, so would his amendment be the stronger and more sincere.

Mr. BIGGAR observed, that the hon. and learned Member for Louth (Mr. Sullivan) seemed to think that he was attacking religion. He begged to say that that was not the case; he thought it was very desirable that prisoners should have religious teaching, but he thought that all religious teaching should be given by authorized ministers of religion. He did not believe in irresponsible teachers, and it was for that reason he should take a Division upon the Vote.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 4; Noes 152: Majority 148.—(Div. List, No. 112.)

Original Question again proposed.

MR. CALLAN, observing that the sum of £200 was charged as salaries for "female Scripture readers," asked for a definition of the term, and also for information with regard to the item for a teacher of music to the female convicts.

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON could hardly conceive that any explanation of the term "female Scripture reader" could be necessary. With regard to the teacher of music, the object of employing that person was to enable the prisoners to sing in chapel.

MR. PARNELL explained that, although he had spoken against the Amendment of the hon. Member for Cavan (Mr. Biggar), he had voted for it, because the Government had not accepted what he (Mr. Parnell) considered to be a fair compromise, when he suggested that the salaries of the persons in question should be equalized all round.

MR. BIGGAR was not disposed to contest one of the items of the Vote. He was of opinion that a woman was quite as competent as a man for the purposes of religious instruction; but it seemed that the sum charged for salary to these female readers—namely, £100 each, was most extravagant; and as he thought that the services of one teacher only were sufficient, he begged leave to move the reduction of the Vote by the amount of £100, the amount of the salary of the teacher whose services he considered to be in excess of the requirements of the prison.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That the Item of £200 for the Salaries of Female Scripture Readers in Perth Prison be reduced by £100."—(Mr. Biggar.)

MR. SULLIVAN hoped the hon. Member for Cavan (Mr. Biggar) would allow the Vote to pass, and in recommending that, he took the opportunity of expressing the high respect which he entertained for his motives; but he could not help thinking that it was through a misconception that Irish

Representatives spoke upon questions like the present. He did not believe that the people of Ireland wanted any information as to the duties of female Scripture readers, whom they knew to be persons ministering to the spiritual wants and necessities of immoral females; and if the prisoners really had the benefit of the services of such functionaries, he could only say that he should be very sorry for the office to be done away with. He repeated his belief in the excellency of the motives of his hon. Friend, but appealed to him not to delay the passing of the Vote by a proposal that would be greatly misconceived out-of-doors.

MR. BIGGAR, after the appeal of his hon. and learned Friend, was not disposed to take a Division.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £65,521, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1880, of Criminal Prosecutions and other Law Charges in Ireland, including certain Allowances under the Act 15 and 16 Vic. c. 83."

MR. PARNELL thought the hon. Baronet (Sir Henry Selwin-Ibbetson) would recollect that the bringing on of these Irish Votes upon that occasion was in violation of a promise given by him shortly before the Whitsuntide Recess. The promise was given in reply to a Question as to the course of Business, made at the commencement of the Sitting, when the hon. Baronet stated that no Irish Votes should be brought on until the second Estimate night after Whitsuntide. [Sir HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON dissented.] The Secretary to the Treasury shook his head; but that was the distinct recollection of himself, and of many Irish Members; and, moreover, he noticed that the hon. Member for Galway (Mr. Mitchell Henry), who took a very strong interest in many of the Irish Votes, was not present. He thought the practice was a most vicious one, to put off the Votes from time to time, in order to suit the convenience of Members; but that was an entirely different thing to putting off the Votes, and bringing them forward before the time agreed upon. Perhaps the Secretary to the Treasury would state how many of the Irish Votes he proposed to take that evening; because many Irish Members, in consequence of what he contended was the promise of the hon. Baronet not to bring on the Votes until the second Estimate night, were not prepared to discuss them to the extent which they considered to be necessary. He, therefore, begged to move that the Chairman do now report Progress.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."—(Mr. Parnell.)

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON distinctly denied that he had given the promise referred to by the hon. Member, to defer the consideration of the Irish Votes until the second Estimate night after the Whitsuntide Recess. It would be in the recollection of the Committee, who, he believed, would bear him out, that he had never given any such promise. What he had said to the hon. Member for Galway (Mr. Mitchell Henry), who had, on more than one occasion, asked him to postpone certain Votes in which he took a special interest, was that he would not bring on those Votes until Irish Members were present in sufficient number to discuss them. But he had told the hon. Member for Galway, on that occasion, that he would take the Law Votes for Ireland on the night before the House rose for the Recess, or as soon as possible thereafter. Although he had given no pledge, if hon. Members had been misled by anything he had said, and were willing to go on with the other Classes down upon the Paper, he had no wish to force the Irish Law Votes upon their attention.

Mr. CALLAN asked if the promise to postpone the Votes referred to by the hon. Baronet was made in the House or in the course of private conversation? [SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON: In the course of private conversation.] Were the Committee to be told that Irish Members were to be bound by private conversations? The hon. Member for Galway was not the Leader of the Party to which he (Mr. Callan) had the honour to belong. The hon. Baronet, in his reply, had stated something to this effect, that—"As soon as he had reason to know that Irish Members were present in sufficient numbers, he would endeavour to bring on the Votes in which they were interested." The hon. Member for Meath (Mr. Parnell) was under the same impression as himself (Mr. Callan), that a pledge was given, or implied, that the Irish Votes should not be taken on the first night of the Estimates. He considered it to be absolutely essential that the Vote should be postponed, inasmuch as it was composed of several large items, of which no explanation whatever was afforded in the Estimates for the information of the Committee.

Mr. Parnell

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON, with the permission of the Committee, would recall what had really taken place with reference to the Irish Votes. Some hon. Members for Ireland raised the question as to whether the Irish Votes should not be postponed a second time—to such time as they could be fairly discussed? And, in answer to that, he had made use of the words just read by the hon. Member for Dundalk (Mr. Callan). He had also said that he would take care, as soon as hon. Members could attend, to bring on the Votes for the Queen's College and University in Ireland. Such was the purport of his speech just before the House broke up for the Recess. As he had already stated, he had no wish to force the Vote upon the Committee that evening upon a mere misunderstanding; but he trusted the Committee would allow the other Votes to be taken.

MR. CALLAN said, they might take Votes 24, 27, 28, and 29, as to which no question arose.

MR. PARNELL thought they must except Vote 28, as to which there would be some discussion. These Law charges, also, were a most important Vote, and would take a long time. But the others might be allowed to pass, as the hon. Baronet wished it, and that would meet the convenience of everybody. Of course, when he referred to an understanding, he knew nothing of a private conversation with the hon. Member for Galway.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. Gibson) said, not a single item in these Law charges had been altered or objected to for many years; but if the hon. Members wished to raise a discussion the Vote could be postponed, only he did not see what possible questions could be urged.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Original Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

(7.) £28,888, to complete the sum for the Chancery Division of the High Court of Justice, &c. Ireland.

(8.) £8,387, to complete the sum for Probate, &c. Registries, Ireland.

(9.) Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £7,574, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1880, for the Salaries and the incidental Expenses of the Court of Bankruptcy in Ireland."

MR. O'DONNELL said, there was a strong objection to this Vote.

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON said, really hon. Members must make up their minds as to what they thought. Hon. Members proposed that they should take Votes 24, 27, 28, and 29, and since then Vote 28 had been objected to. Now, here was another objection. It seemed, if they were to proceed at all, that they were only to proceed at the suggestion of hon. Members opposite. He did not wish to be misrepresented. He denied having ever said any such thing; but if he had been represented as saying that he would not take certain Votes till the second day after Whitsuntide, then he would not proceed with the opposed Votes. But there were certain Votes to which they had been told there was no objection, and those he must ask the Committee to pass.

MR. CALLAN said, the Votes he mentioned were 24, 27, 28, and 29, and since then an objection had been taken to 28. He did not name 25, for it was one to which he entertained the strongest objection.

MR. J. LOWTHER said, the Vote now under discussion was No. 28. Did anybody object to that?

MR. CALLAN replied that he did not.

MR. PARNELL said, this Vote was included amongst those suggested by the hon. Member for Dundalk (Mr. Callan); but the Committee would recollect that he (Mr. Parnell) immediately expressed his objection to it.

MR. NEWDEGATE remarked, that he began to question who was in charge of the Estimates. Of course, if it was a question of postponing one or two Votes in pursuance of some pledge, they expected that courtesy from Her Majesty's Government; but here was now a list of some seven Votes, with no reason for the postponement of any of them; and he would suggest to Her Majesty's Government, while they were thus considering the views of the few hon. Gentlemen who arrogated to themselves the representation of Ireland that the majority of the House had a right to expect from them the maintenance of such a continuity of Business as would enable Members generally to form some idea of what Business there was to be transacted.

MR. SULLIVAN said, if the hon. Member opposite (Mr. Newdegate) desired to have Business transacted, he would be less severe in his tones to the Treasury Bench, especially when it manifested the courteous and conciliatory disposition which it had been shown that night. [Laughter.] Hon. Gentlemen might laugh at that statement, and they no doubt desired scenes, which he and his hon. Friends desired to avoid. But the House would find out that the way to facilitate Business was to show the courteous spirit shown by the Secretary to the Treasury. The impression made by his conduct, and the generous spirit in which he had taken care, and more than care, that what he was represented to have said was carried out, would certainly tend to facilitate Business. The hon. Gentleman, if he desired that also, would do well to be less stern.

MR. NEWDEGATE replied, that a minority could not be allowed to command. He had seen the minority treated with very great forbearance; but there were limits to that forbearance, and if those limits were transgressed it became impossible for the great body of the House to do its duty.

MR. RYLANDS was quite prepared to support the Secretary to the Treasury in his impression of what he had said; but the fact remained that some hon. Gentlemen from Ireland were under a different impression. Accordingly, in the fairest way, the hon. Gentleman offered not to take the Votes at all. His own impression was that that would have been the best course; for then they would have been saved something which looked like haggling—one hon. Gentleman objecting to one Vote and one to another. He would suggest to the Government that they should not proceed further with the Irish Votes that night, as it was quite clear there had been a misunderstanding. He would move that they should now report Progress, and take the Customs and Inland Revenue Bill.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again." — (Mr. Rylands.)

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON hoped the Committee would adhere to the original arrangement and take these four Votes before it passed to anything else, as he hoped to ask them to take certain other Votes with the view of advancing the Business of Supply.

MR. BIGGAR thought the hon. Baronet had exercised a wise discretion in entering into a compromise with certain Members on that side of the House, for there was plenty of opportunity to raise several questions on the Votes just agreed to, and he was disposed to have done so but for the compromise suggested. As to the Bankruptcy Vote, the Attorney General for Ireland must know that the Members for Belfast had a very decided opinion in favour of a Local Bankruptcy Bill, and he was sure they would be disappointed if this Vote should be passed in their absence. He knew, of course, that the present Bill could not pass this Session; but still the hon. Gentlemen who were not now present might feel a satisfaction in being able to speak on the subject.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. Gibson) said, the matter would be discussed on its merits, and he felt sure neither of those hon. Members would wish the Vote postponed on their account.

MR. ERRINGTON thought nothing could be fairer than the conduct of the Secretary to the Treasury; but certainly his own impression was shared by many other hon. Members, that no Irish Votes were to be taken that night. He thought that the best thing to be done now was to accept the suggestion of the hon. Member for Burnley (Mr. Rylands).

MR. J. LOWTHER explained, that the offer of the Secretary to the Treasury was to withdraw all Irish Votes except those which were practically unopposed. As to this particular Vote, he did not share the misgivings of the hon. Member for Cavan (Mr. Biggar), that certain hon. Gentlemen, not usually very prominent in opposing Votes, would take exception to this one; and as no hon. Member present took any exception to it, he hoped it would be allowed to pass.

MR. CALLAN hoped his hon. Friend (Mr. Parnell) would withdraw his opposition to this Vote. The Judges were very efficient officers, and he thought of all the Votes this was one to which the fewest objections applied.

MR. BIGGAR knew that the hon. Members for Belfast did desire a Local Bill; and as there was not the least chance of the Bankruptcy Bill becoming law this Session, he did think that those two hon. Gentlemen would be very pleased to have an opportunity of speaking on this subject.

MR. RAMSAY regretted the waste of time, the more that it had arisen from the extreme courtesy of the hon. Gentleman, and his desire to prevent complaints. He thought they might pass this Vote; because, though they had had half-an-hour's discussion, no one had anything to say against the Vote itself.

SIR JOSEPH M'KENNA said, the Vote was one to which no reasonable objection could be made; and he therefore hoped the Motion would be withdrawn, and the Vote allowed to pass.

MR. RYLANDS asked for leave to withdraw his Motion.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. PARNELL said, there was a question of considerable importance involved in this Vote—the question of Local Bankruptcy Courts in Ireland. He was very anxious to discuss it; but he would give way in response to the appeals of his hon. Friends, and so was, practically, giving up his chance of discussing this matter in that Session; for though the Attorney General had a Bill on the Paper, he never got a day for his measures, so that it was not very likely to come on.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

(10.) £1,195, to complete the sum for the Admiralty Court Registry, Ireland.

Mr. Rylands

CLASS VI.—SUPERANNUATION AND RETIRED ALLOWANCES, AND GRATUITIES FOR CHARITABLE AND OTHER PURPOSES.

(11.) Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £289,772, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1880, for Superannuation and Retired Allowances to Persons formerly employed in the Public Service, and for Compassionate or other Special Allowances and Gratuities awarded by the Commissioners of Her Majesty's Treasury."

MR. WHITWELL hoped the Secretary to the Treasury would not take so important a Vote at that hour, and moved to report Progress.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."—(Mr. Whitwell.)

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON hoped the Committee would not agree to the Motion. Although the Vote was an important one, it was never discussed, for it was only carrying out the pledges given by the Government to its Civil servants, and he could not conceive the hon. Member could wish that to be diminished or altered.

MR. MONK said, the grounds of the Motion were not quite understood. They had been steadily progressing through Supply for the last seven hours, and now one of the most important measures of the Session was about to be brought into Committee—the Customs and Inland Revenue Bill. His hon. Friend (Sir Henry Selwin-Ibbetson) seemed to think, because that was a Money Bill, that it could be taken at any hour. He might, technically, be right; but he certainly could not think that was the proper way to discuss it. He was sure it would facilitate Business if they were now allowed to report Progress, and to take the Customs and Inland Revenue Bill.

MR. WHITWELL thought that this subject could not be properly discussed at that hour. It was not right to take a Vote of £500,000 on a subject of this kind at that time; by so doing, the Committee pledged itself to pay large amounts of superannuation to persons who would receive it for the first time. It was time that the Committee should take into its serious consideration how far they should advance in the direction in which they were now going in this matter of superannuation. Although they might not be able to obtain any reduction in the Vote, yet he thought public attention should be drawn to this question of superannuation and allowances; and, as that could not be done at 12 o'clock at night, he should object to their proceeding further at that time.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 30; Noes 120: Majority 90.—(Div. List, No. 113.)

MR. RYLANDS said, that as he now observed the Leader of the House in his place, he would appeal to him not to go any further at that hour. They had been sitting in Committee of Supply for many hours—ever since 5 o'clock. If the Customs and Inland Revenue Bill were to be taken at all to-night, it could not be taken later than the present time.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER hoped that the Customs and Inland Revenue Bill would be taken that night. He was sorry they had not made so much progress in Committee as they might have done. However, after taking that one Vote, he proposed to report Progress, and to go on with the Customs and Inland Revenue Bill.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

House resumed.

Resolutions to be reported To-morrow, at Two of the clock;

Committee to sit again upon Wednesday.

CUSTOMS AND INLAND REVENUE BILL—[BILL 150.]

(Mr. Raikes, Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Sir Henry Selwin-Ibbetson.)

COMMITTEE. [Progress 20th May.]

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

PART I.—Customs.

Clauses 1 to 14, inclusive, agreed to.

PART II.—Taxes.

Clause 15 (Grant of duties of income tax.)

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Clause stand part of the Bill."

MR. COURTNEY observed, that he had understood the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General to say recently, in answer to a question from an hon. Member, that any person who occupied agricultural land, and did not make a profit, could escape altogether payment of Income Tax. He could not see how that was reconcilable with this clause of the Bill, which was a repetition of the clause always inserted in the Income Tax Bills ever since the imposition of the tax. He wished to know whether the statement of the hon. and learned Gentleman was reconcilable with the clause? He should also like to be informed whether, if, as he had said, a farmer who did not make profit would escape being assessed for Income Tax altogether, he would, on the other hand, if he made additional profit, be bound to pay Income Tax upon more than the amount of half his rent? Could he, in such a case, be charged in addition to that rent? He should have thought that the principle of assessment was that the assessment of half the rent was to cover good and bad years alike, and was to be paid in all cases. If a farmer were not to be taken at his assessment of half his rent in England, and one-third in Scotland, when he made no profit, he thought some explanation should be given to the Committee of what happened when he made a large profit.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir JOHN HOLKER) said, that the answer he had given on the former occasion was made by him from instructions he received. That answer he thought to be accurate. But if the hon. Member would allow him to consider the operation of this particular clause of the Bill, he should be happy to give him his opinion. As at present advised, he thought that his former answer was accurate—that if a farmer did not make any profit out of his farm he would, then, escape the payment of Income Tax. Still, it might be that the answer was not accurate; and he should like his hon. Friend to give him a short time to consider it, in connection with this Bill, before he pledged himself to the accuracy of the answer. If his hon. Friend would repeat the question, either in the course of that evening, or at some other time, after he had considered the matter, he should be happy to give him his opinion with regard to it.

MR. RYLANDS considered that the reply of the hon. and learned Attorney General had placed the Committee in a most extraordinary position. The mode of assessment in the case of farmers for every 20s. of the annual value of the occupation of the land implied that a farmer, however large his profit might be, should not be charged on any larger sum than that determined by the amount of his rent; and, on the other hand, if he made a loss, that he should not be charged less than the sum provided for by the Act; and, in this way, he had always understood the amount chargeable upon farmers to be fixed and permanent, inasmuch as, unlike the charge upon ordinary trade profits, it did not fluctuate. But in what position had the Committee been placed? The Government, through their mouthpiece, the most learned authority in the House, had told the Committee that the clause was not understood, and that with regard to its meaning no answer could then be given. In answer to the hon. Member for Liskeard (Mr. Courtney), the Attorney General had asked that the Committee would allow this matter to go forward, and had promised at some future time, perhaps in answer to a Question put upon the Paper, to give the result of his mature judgment upon the point raised by the hon. Member. But, by that time, he (Mr. Rylands) wished to point out that the Bill would be passed and the clause enacted. If it was to be understood that during periods the most flourishing for agriculture, when farmers might make incomes considerably over the amount represented by half their rental, they were not to pay any more than the amount chargeable by this mode of assessment, the adoption of such a principle was, in his opinion, grossly unfair to other classes of the Income Tax paying community. Unless the hon. and learned Gentleman could tell the Committee what was the meaning of the clause, he hoped the hon. Member for Liskeard would move to report Progress, in order that the Committee might not be placed in the position of passing a clause of the meaning of which they knew nothing.

MR. SAMPSON LLOYD said, as far as he remembered, the terms of the present Bill were precisely the same as those of the Acts hitherto in force; and he wished to point out that the difficulty raised by the hon. Member for Liskeard (Mr. Courtney) had nothing to do with the question whether the Committee should proceed to pass the clause then under consideration in the usual way. The assessment under Schedule B was very much in the same position as that under Schedule D, by which a man assessed at more than his profits had a right to show, on appeal, that he had been over assessed. The Attorney General had expressed his opinion that a farmer had this right of appeal, and that the question was determinable by the Courts of Law. He (Mr. Sampson Lloyd) trusted that the clause would not meet with opposition, as all previous enactments had been in the same form as that now presented to the Committee.

MR. THOMSON HANKEY had always understood that the Schedule referred to by the hon. Member for Plymouth (Mr. Sampson Lloyd) was agreed to as a compromise in view of the exceeding difficulty of ascertaining the profits of a farmer in the same way as those of a mechanic. But the Attorney General had put the Committee into confusion, by saying that he did not understand the meaning of the clause; surely, therefore, it would be better to report Progress, in order to give the Government and the Attorney General time to consider what it really meant. He had no objection to the clause as previously understood; but if a new interpretation was to be put upon it, it should be made perfectly clear.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir JOHN HOLKER) thought that as the hon. Member for Liskeard (Mr. Courtney) had only called attention to the question as he was on the point of leaving the House, he might have been excused from expressing an opinion without some further consideration. But he begged to protest against the statement of the hon. Member for Peterborough (Mr. Thomson Hankey), that he had put the Committee in any difficulty with regard to this question; for if there existed any doubt as to the proper construction of the clause, it certainly was not he who had caused it. The question of the liability of farmers, under the circumstances indicated, would have to be considered by the Courts of Law; and all that was required of him, and all that could be expected of him, was to express an opinion as to what construction would be placed upon the clause by those Courts. The whole question turned upon the meaning of the words "annual value of the occupation." Some hon. Members were of opinion that the annual value of the occupation of land was the amount of the rent; but to that conclusion he could not assent, because if he found sufficient evidence that the rent was not the annual value of the land, but that, on the contrary, the tenant had been making nothing by it for a considerable period, he should conclude that the rent was very much higher than the value of the occupation of the land, and that the tenant who made nothing out of it, or who made less than the rent, would not be liable to pay the tax. That view might not be a correct one, and the hon. Member for Liskeard (Mr. Courtney) might be able to satisfy him that it was not. What he had stated, in answer to the Question put, not the other day but some time ago, was that—"If a tenant did not make any profit out of his farm he could escape payment of the Income Tax," and to that opinion he still adhered.

MR. RAMSAY thought, whatever might be the result of the discussion, that the question involved, and the opinion given by the hon. and learned Attorney General, were of very great importance. Whatever might have been the law, the practice had always been to charge farmers in respect of the rent paid for the occupation of the land, and from that practice he had never known of any case of appeal. Now, if it were the intention of the Government, as he understood from the observations of the Attorney General, that farmers should, in future, have the right of appeal in cases where it was found that no profit had accrued from the land in their occupation, that right ought to be made so clear as not to admit of doubt. Upon these grounds, therefore, and for the purpose of enabling the Government to make such change in the terms of the clause as would provide that farmers either should or should not have the right of appeal against an assessment in respect of the rent which they paid, he thought that the Government should agree to report Progress. No doubt, the hon. and learned Attorney General was quite correct in his view of the law; but it was of great consequence that the question should be definitely Improvement Provisional Orders Confirmation * [176]; Local Government Provisional Orders (Aspull, &c.) * [161].

Third Reading—Local Government Provisional Orders (Castleton by Rochdale, &c.) * [160]; Local Government (Ireland) Provisional Orders (Killarney, &c.) * [178]; Elementary Education Provisional Orders Confirmation (Brighton and Preston, &c.) * [177]; Elementary Education Provisional Orders Confirmation (London) * [176]; Local Government (Ireland) Provisional Orders Confirmation (Cashel, &c.) * [141]; Local Government (Ireland) Provisional Order Confirmation (Downpatrick) * [140]; Metropolis (Whitechapel and Limehouse) Improvement Scheme Amendment * [184]; Inclosure Provisional Order (Matterdale Common) * [171]; Inclosure Provisional Order (Redmoor and Golberdon Commons) * [172]; Inclosure Provisional Order (East Stainmore Common) * [174], and passed.

The House met at Two of the clock.

PRIVATE BUSINESS.

FELIXSTOWE RAILWAY AND PIER BILL [Lords] (by Order).

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
“That the Bill be now read a second time.”

COLONEL JERVIS, in moving, as an Amendment, that the Bill be read a second time upon this day three months, said, he regretted that it was his duty to object to the second reading of the Bill. In 1874, a Bill was introduced for the construction of a railway from Ipswich to the sea coast on the east side. That Bill was not approved by Parliament, on the ground that it gave no accommodation whatever to the district through which it was proposed that the line should pass. In 1875, a fresh Bill was brought in, with a new plan; and a railway was to be made which was to give the fullest accommodation to the whole of the district. A number of witnesses were brought up from the County of Suffolk and from the town of Ipswich, including mayors and ex-mayors, solicitors, traders, and others, who gave evidence that the line, as then proposed, would give the fullest accommodation to the district; and on the strength of the evidence given before the Committee, Parliament approved of the Bill. But before the line was completed, it was disputed by an Inspector sent down from the Board of Trade, who found that no stations were erected on the line; that the accommodation which was to be given to Ipswich was something more than a mile off from where it was to have been; and that the final station was in the middle of an agricultural district, a couple of miles out towards the sea. A deputation then waited upon the Board of Trade. The deputation consisted of the Members for the Eastern Division of Suffolk, the town of Ipswich, the hon. and learned Member for the County of Cambridge (Mr. Rodwell), who thoroughly knew the locality, various mayors and ex-mayors, of Ipswich; and, what was still more striking, it was accompanied by the country rectors of all the parishes, while no other inhabitants besides the rectors were asked to go with the deputation. The Board of Trade stated, in reply to the representations made to them, that they extremely regretted that they had not the power to interfere; that the Act was passed, and that their only power was to see that the line was constructed in a manner consistent with the safety of the public. Beyond that, they had no power whatever. It was also found that the Railway Commissioners had no power to interfere in the case; and, therefore, it was deemed advisable to wait until the Company came forward for additional powers, or to obtain fresh capital. The Company now came to Parliament for that purpose, and he must say that when a Company had taken such extreme liberty with the Forms of the House as to obtain an Act of Parliament under the plea of giving accommodation to the public, and then to prevent any accommodation being given to the district, it became his duty, for that and other reasons which it was not necessary now to enter into, to ask the House to inquire into the matter, and to interfere. He had brought the matter under the notice of the Board of Trade, and they had agreed to undertake, in the event of a clause being inserted in the Bill, to ascertain what stations were required and what accommodation ought to be given to the district. If the promoters of the Bill were willing to accept such a clause, and to allow the matter to be settled by the Board of Trade on behalf of the public, he would not further oppose the second reading of the Bill; but if they refused to accept such a clause, he should certainly divide the House against the second reading of the Bill. He had felt it his duty to bring the circumstances of the case under the notice of the House. During the 20 years he had been a Member of the House he had never known a similar case. He had appealed to every official of the House, and to some of the most learned counsel who had been in the habit of practising at the Parliamentary Bar upstairs, and they all told him they never remembered a similar case—where a railway had been obtained under the pretence of benefiting the public, but where every attempt had been made to prevent the public from obtaining any accommodation whatever. He begged to move the Amendment of which he had given Notice.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day three months."—(Colonel Jervis.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'now' stand part of the Question."

MR. RODWELL said, he should like, as he had been interested in the question before, and as he had attended the deputation to which his hon. and gallant Friend (Colonel Jervis) had alluded to, to state that he entirely concurred in what his hon. and gallant Friend had stated. While he disclaimed any intention of throwing an obstacle in the way of the passing of the Bill, he thought, on public grounds, that this was a legitimate opportunity for the House of Commons to interpose, and to ask that the accommodation which was promised to the public should be given to them. It was a well-understood rule that when the promoters of a Bill came to Parliament for an extension of time, or for power to increase their capital, they brought the whole of their proceedings under the review of some tribunal. The only tribunal in this case was the House of Commons. The Board of Trade was powerless in the matter, and the Railway Commissioners were equally powerless. Up to the present stage, the promoters of the Bill had defied the public. They were now obliged to ask for fresh powers, and, without going further into details, he thought the House would do well to see that the Company now gave proper accommodation to the public. Nothing could be more reasonable or more fair, and he could not conceive upon what ground the promoters of the Bill could decline to entertain the proposal of his hon. and gallant Friend, that the Board of Trade should be the parties to say what, in the interests of the public, was required. He understood that if the promoters assented to this course, his hon. and gallant Friend would withdraw the proposition he had made for the rejection of the Bill. He (Mr. Rodwell) took part in the matter simply upon public grounds. He was well acquainted with the locality, and he knew the line; and he thought it was a great scandal that the public did not possess the accommodation which they so well deserved, which was agreed to be given to them, and on the faith of which the Bill was originally granted.

MR. RAIKES said, the course which had been taken by the hon. and gallant Member for Harwich (Colonel Jervis) might form a sound and useful precedent, though he hoped that he would not persevere with his Motion to throw out the Bill. It should be well understood by all those who were interested in railway management that when a Company came to that House for an extension of the privileges and powers which Parliament had already granted to them, they must be prepared to submit their conduct generally to the review of Parliament, and to challenge any judgment which Parliament might think fit to exercise as to the way in which they had used their powers up to the present time. But he confessed that, with regard to this particular Bill, he thought the object which the hon. and gallant Member for Harwich, and his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Cambridgeshire (Mr. Rodwell), had at heart would be best accomplished by allowing the Bill to be read a second time, care being taken in Committee to consider the objections which had been raised. But none the less was it desirable that, where a Railway Company almost avowedly neglected the purposes for which it was created, exception at the proper time should be taken in Parliament against its proceedings. With regard to this particular railway, he understood that it went almost from nowhere to nowhere; that instead of starting from the town of Ipswich, which was a large and important town, and connecting it with the rising watering place of Felixstowe, it started from a point somewhere about two miles from Ipswich on the main line; that it was there almost entirely unconnected with the train service on the main line; that it proceeded then, at its own sweet will, towards the common which had been graphically described by the hon. and gallant Member for Harwich, passing, at as great a distance as it conveniently could, the town which it proposed to connect with Ipswich—and, in fact, forfeiting all title to be considered a convenient or useful means of traffic for the locality. But more remained behind; for he understood that the Company declined to make any sufficient use of any intermediate stations on the line, and, therefore, they excluded the inhabitants of the district from the advantage which they might derive from the use of intermediate stations. At the present time, therefore, the railway did not answer the purposes for which Parliament originally granted its powers; and it appeared to him a proper course for a Committee to consider how far supervision should be exercised by the Board of Trade, or by the Railway Commissioners, or by any other sufficiently strong public body, to compel the Company to perform a duty which the public had certainly a right to expect at their hands. He thought that, under the circumstances of the case, the best course both for the locality and for the general public would be that the Bill should be read a second time. If the Amendment now before the House were withdrawn, he would undertake that the points to which his hon. and gallant Friend the Member for Harwich had called attention should be considered by the Committee appointed to inquire into the Bill, and he had no doubt they would see that Ipswich and its neighbourhood was dealt with in a manner as satisfactory as that tribunal could carry out. Of course, if his hon. and gallant Friend was afterwards not satisfied with the course taken by the Committee, he would still have a remedy by opposing the third reading of the Bill. In the meanwhile, he hoped the course taken would be such as to satisfy his hon. and gallant Friend, and those whom he represented, that substantial justice would be done to the locality interested.

COLONEL JERVIS said, that after what had fallen from the hon. Gentleman the Chairman of Committees, he begged leave to withdraw the Amendment.

Mr. Raikes

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Main Question put, and agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed.

QUESTIONS.

RAILWAYS—THE BOARD OF INLAND REVENUE—SEASON TICKETS.

QUESTION.

MR. W. H. JAMES asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, If inquiry has been made of the South Eastern Railway Company by the Board of Inland Revenue, as promised in the letter of their Under Secretary, Mr. Adam Young, in a letter dated 4th January, quoted in "The Times" of 9th January 1879, in which Mr. Young stated that he was desired by the Commissioners of Inland Revenue to inform his correspondent—

"That they did not know what was meant by the 'increased charges' of that Department, which were alleged to have rendered necessary the addition of the Government Duty to the rates for season tickets, but they thought it due to the Company that opportunity should be afforded them of explaining the meaning of the statement," and that "inquiry should be made accordingly;"

and, whether that inquiry has extended also to the London, Brighton, and South Coast Railway Company; and, in such case, what has been the result?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Sir, I find that the Board of Inland Revenue did make the inquiry referred to from the South-Eastern Railway Company, and that they received an explanation in reply, that the phrase "increased charges" was not intended to imply that any addition to the duty had been made, but merely that the duty demanded of it had increased in amount. No inquiry was made from the London, Brighton, and South Coast Railway Company, because it did not appear that that Company had alleged or implied that any increase of the duty had been made.

ITALY—THE ITALIAN POLICE.

QUESTION.

SIR EARDLEY WILMOT asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether the violence and arbitrary conduct of the Italian police towards British subjects in Italy has been checked or punished by the authorities there, since the warning circular issued by Lord Derby to intending travellers in Italy; and, if not, whether Her Majesty's Government will inform the public how the question now stands, by the publication of Correspondence on the subject between the two Governments, and especially by that relating to the wrongful imprisonment of William Mercer at Castellamare in 1873?

MR. BOURKE: Sir, since the occurrences happened, which called forth the recommendation of Lord Derby that all travellers in Italy should provide themselves with passports, no outrages of a serious kind have, to the knowledge of the Foreign Office, been committed by the Italian police, and no complaints of a serious nature have been furnished to Her Majesty's Government. Some minor complaints have been received, and the Italian Government have, upon representations being made to them, done all that could be expected of them in the matters in question. As to the Correspondence regarding Mercer's case, the House is aware that the Correspondence extended over a great number of years—from 1872 to 1876. I have myself answered many Questions on the subject, and I do not think that any public advantage would arise from the publication of that Correspondence. Therefore, it is not the intention of the Government to lay any Papers before the House with regard to Mercer's case.

THE CUSTOM HOUSE—SANITARY IMPROVEMENTS.—QUESTION.

MR. FAWCETT asked the Secretary to the Treasury, Whether he is aware that Sanitary improvements have not been carried out in the Tea and East India Department Offices in the Custom House; and, if so, whether he has ordered, or will order, that these improvements shall be carried out without further delay?

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON, in reply, said, with regard to contemplated sanitary improvements in the Offices referred to by the hon. Gentleman, he found that, after the Treasury sanction was given, the Inspector from the Board of Works discovered that larger improvements would be necessary to effect the object. A Report was placed in his hands last night, and he should lose no time in bringing the matter under the notice of the First Commissioner of Works, in order that the necessary sanitary improvements, which he admitted were necessary, might be made for the comfort, and, indeed, the health of the clerks. These improvements would be carried out as soon as the plans were decided upon.

CYPRUS—ADMINISTRATION OF THE ISLAND.—QUESTION.

SIR JULIAN GOLDSMID asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether Sir Garnet Wolseley, before leaving England, resigned his office as Governor and High Commissioner of Cyprus; and, whether Colonel Biddulph has been appointed to succeed him?

MR. BOURKE: Yes, Sir; both parts of the Question of the hon. Baronet may be answered in the affirmative.

ARMY DISCIPLINE AND REGULATION BILL.—QUESTIONS.

MAJOR O'BEIRNE asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether, having regard to the fact that it is proposed to institute an inquiry by a Royal Commission or a War Office Committee into the whole state of the Army, it is the intention of the Government to proceed with the Army Discipline and Regulation Bill this Session?

COLONEL STANLEY: Yes, Sir; it is very much the intention of the Government to proceed with the Army Discipline and Regulation Bill this Session.

SIR HENRY HAVELOCK asked the Secretary of State for War, When he expects to be able to lay before the House the draft of the additions or adjuncts to the Army Discipline and Regulation Bill by which he proposes in the future to regulate Courts of Inquiry and to prevent the abuse of their being substituted for courts martial, which he promised on the 1st May last to bring forward at an early date?

COLONEL STANLEY: Sir, I hope to do so next week; my excuse for the delay is the pressure of other Business.

ARMY ORGANIZATION—THE DEPARTMENTAL COMMITTEE.—QUESTION.

MR. GOURLEY asked the Secretary of State for War, If he will be good enough to inform the House of the object and nature of the War Office inquiry about to be made with reference to our existing military organisation; and, whether it is intended that all branches of the Service (Regular and Auxiliary) are to be represented, or only those of the Regular Army, through officers who have hitherto failed to carry out in detail the objects intended to be accomplished under the Depôt Centre system? He should also like to know whether a Royal Commission or a Committee was to be appointed?

COLONEL STANLEY: Sir, I am afraid I should be obliged to go into a great deal of detail if I were to explain the whole object and nature of the War Office inquiry. Speaking generally, I may say that it is to ascertain all the points in the short-service and reserve system and the localization system requiring amendment, so as to make those systems work properly. With regard to the representation of the different branches of the Service, the Committee will consist wholly of officers serving in the Regular Force; but some of those officers are intimately acquainted with all the requirements of the auxiliary branches. I must demur, if I am allowed to do so, owing to the form of the Question, to the last part of it. I cannot accept that as a correct statement; but I may say that, as far as possible, I am endeavouring to obtain a Committee which shall be composed of officers wholly unconnected with the present administration of the Office. There are two officers who, owing to their positions, will be included in that inquiry who are in some degree connected with the Office; otherwise it will be a Committee composed from the outside. It will be a Committee, and not a Royal Commission.

PARLIAMENT — ARRANGEMENT OF PUBLIC BUSINESS.—QUESTION.

In reply to Sir DAVID WEDDERBURN, THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said: Sir, it does not lie entirely with me as to when the East India Loan Bill shall be proceeded with; but I propose to arrange the Government Business for Thursday as follows:—We will first take the adjourned debate on going into Committee upon the East India Revenue Accounts. I do not know the length to which the debate will run; but as soon as it has concluded, and when you, Sir, have left the Chair, the passing of a formal Resolution upon the accounts would not take any great length of time. Of course, it is possible that a discussion of some duration may arise, and then it may be necessary for my hon. Friend the Under Secretary to offer some observations. Then I would propose to put next the second reading of the East India Loan Bill (£5,000,000). Upon that I see there are two Notices of Amendments; and, of course, I cannot anticipate what length the discussion may run to. Next to that I would put the East India Loan (Consolidated Fund) Bill. To that there is an Amendment raising a different question, and we must be guided by circumstances and the convenience of the House as to how far we shall proceed. I should be glad to make progress in each Bill.

SOUTH AFRICA—THE ZULU WAR.

QUESTIONS.

SIR ROBERT PEEL: I wish, Sir, with the permission of the House, to ask a Question of Her Majesty's Government about the state of affairs in South Africa. We understood, before separating some little time ago, that the Government would be in a position to make some announcement, after the Whitsun Holidays, about the state of affairs in Zululand. We expected a statement of the information in their possession. I should like to ask what is the limit of the number of troops to be sent out to the Cape? It appears that during the last few days reinforcements to the number of 2,000 troops have been sent out to reinforce the Army of 26,000 or 27,000 already lining the Frontier of Natal, under the command of a General who has been superseded in the field before the enemy. It would be desirable to know what is the limitation to be put to the reinforcements; and I, therefore, wish to ask the Secretary of State for War, Whether it is intended to send out any more troops to that part of South Africa?

COLONEL STANLEY: Sir, I think it would be convenient if the right hon. Baronet had given me some Notice of his Question. All I can say is this— with regard to the information in my possession, I have always taken the earliest opportunity of making it known to the public, who take a deep interest in this question, by means of the public Press. All the intelligence I possess was sent to the papers on Sunday night, and appeared in yesterday morning's papers. That is all that has reached me. As regards the necessity of sending out further troops to reinforce those already in South Africa, I am not aware that at the present moment there is any such necessity; but if further troops are required, it would, of course, be the duty of a person holding my position to advise that they should be sent.

SIR JULIAN GOLDSMID asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether he had any information to give the House as to the health of the troops in South Africa?

COLONEL STANLEY: Sir, the last accounts I have heard are that the health of the troops is improving, and the last medical Report—I cannot remember the exact date of it—is certainly to that effect.

ARMY ORGANIZATION—THE DEPARTMENTAL COMMITTEE.

OBSERVATIONS.

MR. GOURLEY said, that in consequence of the answer which had been given to his Question by the Secretary of State for War, he wished to call the attention of the House to the dépôt centre system, and to point out how he thought that the proposed inquiry should be conducted by a Royal Commission and not by a Committee. To put himself in Order, he would conclude with a Motion. When Lord Cardwell's national system of dépôt centres was introduced, it was contemplated that at those centres there should be deposited a sufficiency of commissariat to meet any demand which might be made in an hour of emergency. But that object had not been carried out. The Militia and Volunteers, as well as the Regular Forces, still had their own independent Staffs. The commissariat was still deposited at Woolwich and other large centres, and the various dépôt centres had no commissariat whatever. The result was that the troops which had been sent out from this country to South Africa eventually landed there without a proper commissariat; and, so far from the great object of Lord Cardwell having been carried out, and a sufficiency of commissariat establishments provided at the dépôt centres, the Commissariat of the War Department had entirely broken down. With regard to the Committee which was about to be appointed by the Government, he believed it would not be satisfactory either to Parliament or the country. Instead of being composed entirely of officers of the Regular Army, the Committee ought also to include officers connected with the Auxiliary Forces, with the Marines, and other branches of the Service; and he contended that unless that were done the Committee would entirely fail in its object, which was to decide upon and carry out a national scheme which would be impartial in all its details. That end, he held, would be much better accomplished by the appointment of a Royal Commission, which could travel about and collect the best evidence it could find throughout the country; whereas a Committee sitting in London would be bound, to a great extent, to procure its evidence from the Horse Guards, to whose shortcomings and want of system in details we owed in a large measure our failure in the Transport Department, not alone in the Zulu, but also in the recent Afghan campaigns. He protested most strongly against the proposed constitution of the Committee, and maintained, as he had already stated, that it should be composed of officers representing all the various branches of the Service, including the Marines. He begged to move the adjournment of the House.

SIR HENRY HAVELOCK, in seconding the Motion, said, he believed he expressed the opinion of many hon. Members of the House, and of many persons outside the House, when he said that it would be regarded as much more satisfactory if the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War had given a little more detailed information as to the character of the proposed Committee, for it was a subject to which the public were giving considerable attention, and many were looking forward to it with some degree of misapprehension. The right hon. and gallant Gentleman said there were two distinguished officers whom he proposed to nominate on the Committee, and whom he considered to be desirable representatives to be placed upon it. He (Sir Henry Havelock) understood him to refer to those two very distinguished officers, Lord Napier of Magdala and Sir Henry Norman, who were both officers of very great experience; but there were scarcely any other two in the whole Army List whose acquaintance with the existing Army system, as applied at home, was more limited than theirs. He wished it to be distinctly understood that he had no desire to reflect upon or to depreciate the knowledge and well-known—indeed, world-known—merits of those two distinguished officers; but he was within the mark when he said that Lord Napier of Magdala had no experience whatsoever of the working of the present system, except as regarded the limited number of regiments which had served under his command at Gibraltar. And in the case of Sir Henry Norman, with all his great and acknowledged merits, he had absolutely no acquaintance whatsoever with the working of the Army under the existing system, or with regard to its organization, short service, or recruitment, in any portion of their details. It was well known that he had been charged for many years with the organization of the Indian Army, and those two officers were prominently in the public mind as having been primarily concerned in the organization of the Indian Army, which, although it had gone, in a manner, through a recent war, had not had applied to it such a strain or test of its efficiency as a war would be to the British Army if it were called into the field. They laboured under a disadvantage in being connected in the public mind as being the authors of the Indian Army system, which was now, and must for many years to come be, on its trial, and had not proved a success. The Indian Army, it was well known, was not only distinguished for its costliness, but for its want of stability and want of power to resist the strain of war, to an extent that was not known in any other Army in the world. If the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War had not definitely decided upon the names he proposed to place on the Committee, he thought it was highly desirable that he should select from the large field of choice open to him the names of officers who, by their previous experience, were well acquainted with the working in all its details of the system which it was proposed to put upon its trial. He hoped he might gather from one part of the right hon. and gallant Gentleman's statement, that it appeared to be recognized that the existing system, although not perfect, was sound as regarded the main lines on which it was laid down, and that it required altering, not in its great principles, but in its details.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
 "That this House do now adjourn."—
 (Mr. Gourley.)

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON regretted to hear the remark made by the Secretary of State for War with regard to the members of the Committee being selected from persons outside of the Departments. If that mode of selection were acted upon, those officers would be excluded from it who, from their previous experience, were most competent to advise the Government, while officers much less acquainted with the working of the present system would find a place upon it. He alluded to the omission from the Committee of the Adjutant General and the Quartermaster General of the Army—two officers who would have to carry into effect any recommendations the Committee might make, and who occupied their present offices owing to their knowledge of any details. Officers of the largest experience of the present system ought to be selected, and it was only by such a selection that any recommendation the Committee might make would be received with goodwill and respect, for it was of the greatest importance that their recommendations should be carried out with goodwill by those in Office. Some time ago a Royal Commission was appointed, at which 10,000 questions were asked and 10,000 answers were given, and yet absolutely nothing was done. He thought that a Committee would be much more useful.

MAJOR O'BEIRNE said, he highly approved of the plan of selecting the members of the Committee entirely from outside the War Office. He trusted that one object the Committee would have in view would be to do away with the short service system altogether, or so to modify it as to make the Army efficient, and not to bring the Army, as it had already been nearly brought, to disgrace. He trusted that they would also break up the brigade depôts, which had cost us an enormous sum—upwards of £5,000,000—and which had utterly and absolutely failed, proving the most humiliating and costly military failure we had ever had. He foresaw that the object of the Secretary of State for War was to break up the brigade system, and to do away with the linked battalion system, and he welcomed the prospect of such a result.

Sir Henry Havelock

COLONEL STANLEY said, he hoped that, as the discussion had arisen in a somewhat irregular form, he might be excused from replying in any great detail to all the points which had been raised. Hon. Gentlemen opposite had launched into quite a prophetic vein. They had prophesied many things which might or might not come to pass. The question was, however, very simple. Matters of principle must be left for the consideration of the Government and the House. There were many matters of detail which, if they affected principle, would, of course, be brought under the cognizance of the House. A great many points were points of detail important in themselves, and which would go a long way to correct the defects hitherto experienced. In introducing the Army Estimates, he had frankly explained what he conceived to be the faults of the existing system. He had spoken with some reserve as to the steps which might have to be taken hereafter; and, although he did not go back from the substance of the opinions which he had previously expressed, he could not help feeling that in a matter of that vast importance a careful inquiry and examination of facts by the best technical minds which they were officially able to command would be of advantage to the Government and the House in considering the steps which might be required to perfect our Army system. He did not wish them to express an opinion for or against the depot-centre system; that was a matter fairly worthy of inquiry. He did not conceive that the Committee would be justified in laying aside the short service and the Reserve system; nor did he think they would be right in departing from the principles of the localization scheme. Feeling strongly on the matter himself, and knowing that many others had expressed their opinions for and against the system, he had been anxious to obtain the services on the Committee of officers who, while having great knowledge of the subject, had not committed themselves strongly to pre-conceived opinions. He wanted to have as perfect and as impartial an inquiry as possible. It would then remain for the Government to consider what steps should be taken, and if they had occasion to come to Parliament, it would be his duty, or his Successor's, to make the necessary representations to the House. He wished at the present moment to keep his mind perfectly clear on the matter, and to be assisted by the authorities to whom he had referred in arriving at the best result on the evidence which would be obtained by the Committee. There appeared to be some misapprehension in the House as to the functions of a Committee; but he knew of nothing that could be done by a Royal Commission which could not be done equally well by a Committee. There would be no more difficulty in a military Committee going to different localities, if that was desirable, than for a Commission to do so. As to officers of the Marines serving on the Committee, the system of the Marines was entirely distinct; they had their own barracks, and they were not interwoven with the military system of this country at home. They had distinct functions to discharge, they were in no way concerned in the inquiry of the proposed Committee, and it would not be convenient or even right that they should be members of it. He had explained in general terms the object and scope of the Committee; and one prominent consideration which had weighed with him was that by appointing a Committee, and not a Commission, they might obtain more promptly the recommendations which the military authorities might think it requisite to make. He did not think it would be convenient or right for him to say more on the subject. As to the statement that officers had failed to carry out Lord Cardwell's system thoroughly, his Lordship did not expect his system would be carried out in a day; but it would be generally admitted that great progress had been made in carrying out the system, and still continued to be made. He was not aware that it was ever intended that the brigade depôts should be centres of commissariat arrangements. It would be absurd if regiments having their depôt in the middle of England, and having to go to a port of embarkation, were to have their waggons and stores in the heart of England, instead of finding them nearer the port of embarkation. As to the systems adopted in other countries, it ought to be remembered that we had our own particular lines to pursue, which were forced upon us by our insular position. That position gave us great advantages, although it also had its disadvantages; and we could not blindly copy any foreign system, however good it might be. He hoped that, after those explanations, the Motion for the adjournment of the House would be withdrawn.

MR. J. HOLMS said, he was glad that the officers who were to conduct the inquiry were to be selected outside of the War Office; but he thought a Royal Commission ought to have been appointed in preference to a Committee. He was also glad to hear from the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War that the Government were determined to adhere to the short service and the Army Reserve systems. What was wanted in the way of inquiry was a calm consultation between military men of large knowledge of the subject and men who were large employers of labour, so that they might come to a sound decision as to the principles upon which they ought to proceed. The present system, there was no doubt, had broken down most completely, for it was quite obvious to everybody that the men, or rather, boys, who were now being sent to fight the Zulus were not exactly the type of soldiers that were required. He would suggest that it would be well if the Government re-considered their decision, and appointed a Royal Commission instead of a Committee.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL said, that the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War took no notice in his remarks on what was the most important point in the question before the House—namely, that the Committee was to be composed of officers of the Regular Army alone, and that officers of the Militia and Auxiliary Forces were to be excluded from it. He thought it would be satisfactory to the country if the proposed investigation were to be of a less one-sided character than that suggested. The problem to be solved was how to combine the institutions of the country so as to combine what might be called an armed nation for the purpose of defence with an Army for foreign service, and that was a problem which it seemed to him totally impossible for the members of one branch only of the Service to solve.

MR. PARNELL said, that the short-service system was designed by the late Government when our foreign policy was very different from the policy pursued by the present Government. Short service gave us a large number of Reserves, as had been proved last year; but these Reserves could not be sent to Afghanistan, Africa, or Burmah, to carry on petty wars. If the present foreign policy of the Government was to be persisted in, they would require a very different, and a far more extensive, Army organization; but he warned the House not to be led away by the apparent failure of the short-service system in South Africa—not to be led away into sanctioning an organization of the Army which would enable an ambitious Minister to enter upon aggressive wars, either large or small, all over the world.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, whether the conversation which was now being carried on was or was not directly in Order he would not say; but it was important to call the attention of the House to the exceeding inconvenience of the course which they were now pursuing. It must be generally admitted that there was nothing of greater importance for the conduct of Business in the House than that they should know, with some degree of certainty, what Business they were called upon to discuss when they met, and especially when the meetings of the House were fixed for Morning Sittings with a special view to the discussion of particular Bills. Those hon. Gentlemen who came down to the House at some inconvenience to themselves might fairly expect that they would be allowed to proceed with the discussion of the Business for which they were assembled. He was perfectly aware that it was within the Rules of the House that any hon. Member might move the adjournment of the House, and that upon that Motion he had a right to offer such remarks as he might think necessary to justify what he had done. But it was a distinct abuse of the Motion for adjournment, if that opportunity was taken to introduce subjects which had not been put upon the Notice Paper, and for which no opportunity of discussion had been regularly sought, and to bring them on in anticipation of the regular Business of the day. Hon. Gentlemen would see easily enough to what mischief that system might lead. For instance, on an ordinary day some hon. Member who had a Motion to bring forward stood first; but another who had not been equally successful in the ballot might cut in, and, saying that he was not satisfied with an answer he got from a Minister, might move the adjournment of the House and raise the whole question. If hon. Members would consider it as a matter of fairness among themselves, they would see that it was not right to resort to such a course, except in a case of emergency, which nobody would say the present case was. But beyond that, this was a mode by which Business might be indefinitely, and to any extent, retarded and, in fact, rendered impossible. The House must remember the circumstances of the Bill which was down for discussion that day. It was a Bill of very great importance; it was one to the preparation of which the Government had given very great attention; it was of considerable magnitude; and had been discussed, he was afraid to say on how many occasions, at very great length. There was still a great portion of the Bill to be dealt with, and the Government were prepared to give a large part of the time that remained of the Session to its discussion. They did not desire to limit the discussion on the Bill; but it ought to be clearly understood, not only in this House, but out of the House, that it was impossible for Business to be carried on in a way which was advantageous to the country, or creditable to the House itself, if it was not done with something of regularity. And he must say that the discussion which had been going on for half-an-hour or an hour, whatever the intention of the hon. Gentleman who had originated it, or whatever the interest which he admitted attached to the question which had been raised, was now taking a turn which would have the effect simply of obstructing the progress of the Business of the House. That might be a matter of great satisfaction to some persons. It was a course which the House might be content to condone, or even to approve; but it was right that the circumstances should be known which, in the present state of things, rendered it impossible for the House to make that progress with the Business of Parliament which the country expected at their hands. Of course, he admitted that the Question put to his right hon. and gallant Friend was one of great importance—one which at another time might be made the subject of a debate, or of a Question; but his right hon. and gallant Friend having given an answer, he thought they might have been allowed to proceed to the Business of the Day. But now they had had, not only further discussion upon particular Business, but the hon. Member for Meath made it the occasion for raising a general discussion on the foreign policy of the Government. It seemed to him utterly impossible, if that was the way they were to conduct Business, that they could get on with Business at all. He did not know that he could object in point of form to what had been done; but it was only right that the House and that others should be informed that it was impossible that the Business of the House could be conducted if such proceedings were of frequent recurrence.

Colonel Stanley

MR. GOURLEY said, that with the permission of the House he would withdraw the Motion. At the same time, he hoped the Chancellor of the Exchequer would always act up to the good advice he had just given them.

MR. PARNELL: Upon this question I beg to say a word or two, and I shall not take up one-fourth of the time which the right hon. Gentleman has taken up. ["Order, order!"]

MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Gentleman has already exhausted his right to speak. Is it the pleasure of the House that the Motion be withdrawn?

MR. PARNELL: No.

MR. SPEAKER: Then the Question is that the House do now adjourn.

Question put, and negatived.

SOUTH AFRICA — INSTRUCTIONS TO SIR GARNET WOLSELEY.

QUESTION.

MR. PARNELL wished to repeat the Question he had put to the Chancellor of the Exchequer as to the Instructions given to Sir Garnet Wolseley. The right hon. Gentleman declined to answer the Question on the plea that the Instructions, if communicated to the House, might, by being telegraphed to Madeira, reach the Cape before the officer who was to carry them into effect. But as there was no telegraph from Madeira, he wished to know, Whether the Chancellor of the Exchequer would state what the Instructions were after Sir Garnet Wolseley had left Madeira for the Cape?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Sir, I shall be obliged if the hon. Member will give Notice of the Question.

ORDER OF THE DAY.

ARMY DISCIPLINE AND REGULATION BILL—[BILL 88.]

(Mr. Secretary Stanley, Mr. Secretary Cross, Mr. William Henry Smith, The Judge Advocate General.)

COMMITTEE. [Progress 8th May.]

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Punishments.

Clause 44 (Scale of punishments by court martial).

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON said, the object of the Amendment, standing in his name, was to include in the scale all the punishments which could be inflicted by courts martial. If hon. Members would turn to page 146 of the Blue Book laid before the House, they would find that the Bill presented to the Committee contained in the scale of punishments those which he now proposed to add to the present Bill. He thought the Committee ought to be informed why the Secretary of State for War had departed from the arrangement which was laid before the Select Committee, and which was approved by the Commissioners. It was only yesterday he had read in the leading journal, that after the very careful manner in which this Bill had been considered and approved by the Select Committee, it was unnecessary further to discuss it. But if the Committee would compare the two Bills, they would find that that which was now under discussion had been almost entirely altered and redrafted; and although he was a Member of the Committee, and had paid great attention to the Bill laid before it, he was hardly able to find his way through the present measure, on account of the alterations which he had mentioned. The scale of punishments had been altered in this way. The former scale was made by enactment of the House of Commons, which declared the leading punishment which courts martial were to have the power to award; but by the Bill now before the Committee, Parliament did not enact all the punishments which were to be awarded by courts martial. The Bill only enacted some of the punishments, while others were put down in the form of a Proviso, or left to be awarded under Royal Warrant. This proceeding, which was an entire departure from established practice, was, to his mind, perfectly unintelligible; and, inasmuch as the Mutiny Act had always laid down the punishments which courts martial could award, he could see no reason why that course should be departed from. He, therefore, moved, in page 19, after line 7, to insert, "n. Forfeitures, fines, and stoppages," to restore the scale of punishments to be awarded on conviction by court martial to its original form—the form that was included in the Bill of last year, and the form in which he contended it should always remain. He also wished to remark that the mode of inserting the Provisos relating to exemptions, which, in the present case, were as important as the clause itself, was a departure from the course instituted by Parliament.

COLONEL STANLEY said, perhaps the hon. and gallant Member (Sir Alexander Gordon) had not heard that he had said the word "agreed" across the Table of the House. The term "stoppages" might be open to the technical objection that it was not, perhaps, the right word, inasmuch as the punishment indicated was a matter of course; while the restoration, which often took place, was an act of grace. With that reservation, he accepted the words of the Amendment.

Amendment agreed to.

MAJOR NOLAN said, with reference to the new punishment of reduction to a lower grade in the case of soldiers and non-commissioned officers, that its insertion was not a question of drafting, but of principle. He was not quite certain as to the meaning of the word "soldier," as employed in this Bill.

Mr. Parnell

The Secretary of State for War had introduced the punishment of reduction to a lower rank in the case of non-commissioned officers in a subsequent clause. It was left out of its proper place at the time the Bill was drafted; and he had some little fear that, unless the present clause was amended, they might be precluded from providing for that punishment later on.

COLONEL STANLEY said, the suggestion of the hon. and gallant Member was, he believed, already noted and, in effect, agreed to. He apprehended that it would be safer to insert the punishment at the part of the Bill now reached; but would confer with those who were competent to give an opinion on the subject.

SIR WILLIAM CUNINGHAME hoped his right hon. and gallant Friend the Secretary of State for War would say "agreed," as he had done in the case of the last Amendment, to that which he now begged to submit to the consideration of the Committee; in which event, he begged to assure him he would give great satisfaction. He ventured to point out what, to his mind, appeared a strong objection to this clause, which was that it enacted that—

"All officers when cashiered shall be incapable of again serving Her Majesty in any capacity, military or civil."

The sub-section 3, therefore, which made this provision, he proposed to omit, on the ground that the Proviso was novel and unreasonable as well as unnecessary. First, with regard to its novelty. He ventured to point out that reference was made in the margin of the Bill to two sections—Nos. 76 and 87—of the Mutiny Act. Now, one of these two sections, he admitted, did refer to a similar Proviso which existed under the old Act; but it had only reference to the case of an officer who sheltered someone under his command from being brought before the civil power; but in the case of the other section, he begged to point out to the Committee that it had no reference whatever to the subject of the 3rd sub-section of the present measure. Again, as far as his recollection went, he had no knowledge that the disability to serve Her Majesty in any capacity ever did follow the sentence of cashiering by court martial; and for these reasons it appeared to him that the proposal that it should henceforward follow was entirely novel. He maintained that officers of the Army had been managed hitherto by the simple punishment of being removed from the Service, and by no other; and he could not understand why it was now considered necessary to institute a more severe punishment for the purpose of keeping them in order; and he could not, for his own part, avoid expressing his surprise that a soldier in the position of the Secretary of State for War, who had passed a long time in the Service, should have concurred in casting this slur upon officers of the Army. Again, with regard to the unreasonableness of this Proviso. He considered there was no offence which an officer could commit of a non-military character, save one, which it would be reasonable to visit with such severe punishment as that provided for by this sub-section, and that was treason, which all hon. Members would agree could not be punished too severely. But the punishment now proposed was a civil disability. He, for one, would have had no objection to it had it been dependent upon sentence of court martial; and he was certain the officers of the Army had such confidence in the justice of the sentences of courts martial that they would not object to this power being conferred upon them; but against the disability as it stood in the Bill there was the very strongest objection. It would, of course, be said that the sentence would not be imposed except in very grave cases, and in cases in which it was deserved. For his part, he thought it unfortunate that the Bill should prescribe the two sentences of cashiering and of dismissal from Her Majesty's Service. To his mind, cashiering was the only sentence possible in former times by sentence of court martial; but it appeared that this punishment was now to be regarded as something more than dismissal—it was dismissal from the Service with ignominy. He contended that the word "cashiering" ought to be omitted in all the other sections of the Bill, which could not possibly justify such punishment, if it was a fact that the sentence would only be passed in cases of great gravity. For instance, in Clause 19 it was provided that cashiering might be inflicted for the simple offence of drunkenness; but he could not admit that any case of drunkenness should be of such an aggravated character as to render a man who might be guilty of the offence liable not only to be turned out of the Service, but to be made incapable of serving Her Majesty in any civil or military capacity. Again, the section relating to suicide showed the propriety of omitting the word "cashiering," inasmuch as the offence contemplated could not justify the disability to serve Her Majesty in a civil capacity. The Secretary of State for War, he trusted, would favourably consider this proposed Amendment, which, in his opinion, was of great importance to the Service, an opinion which he thought was greatly borne out by the way in which his proposal had been received by the Committee. Another argument in favour of the Amendment was, no such punishment was possible in the case of privates and non-commissioned officers. The Committee had heard a great deal about the officers being affected by the Bill in the same way as the men; but, as a matter of fact, the latter could be dismissed from the Army without being rendered incapable of serving Her Majesty. It was further to be remembered that if an officer committed a crime of such a character as to render it right that a court martial should prevent him in future from serving Her Majesty in any capacity, either civil or military, there would be very little opportunity for his obtaining any such employment; therefore, the sub-section did not add to the real gravity of the punishment. But it was not the less objectionable on that account, because it was quite conceivable that an officer might be seriously affected, who had not committed an act of so grave a character. Further, it was quite possible that an officer of Militia or Volunteers might be brought up for an offence of a purely military character, and, for the sake of discipline, it might be found necessary to cashier him, the result of which would be that he would find himself prevented from serving Her Majesty in any capacity for the future, and that merely for a purely military offence. Having now shown that, in his opinion, sub-section 3 was both novel and unreasonable, as well as unnecessary, he begged to move that it be omitted from the Bill, and to express a hope that the Secretary of State for War would consider his Amendment in a favourable sense.

GENERAL SHUTE was satisfied that hon. Members would not feel that his right hon. and gallant Friend the Secretary of State for War had, with reference to this sub-section, cast any slur upon the officers of the Army. It was to be remembered that, until recently, when an officer was cashiered from the Army, he was most fearfully fined as well; and it was formerly no joke for a man commanding a Cavalry regiment, for instance, to lose £15,000, as well as to be dismissed. With regard to the applicability of the Proviso to cases of drunkenness, he maintained that an officer who was offensive or misconducted himself under the influence of liquor was guilty of conduct unbecoming the character of an officer and a gentleman, and should be proceeded against in that light. It was not desirable to open the door to the possibility of an inferior accusing his superior officer of having, for instance, left the mess table drunk, or even a servant going to the colonel and stating that his master had gone to bed intoxicated, and demanding his trial on the plea that all ranks should be treated alike. The greatest distinction, he maintained, should be observed in every respect between the officer and the soldier. He maintained that discipline in the Army had been, in a great degree, the result of the strongest and the most marked social distinction, upon which was founded the respect which a lower class felt toward a superior class; and when this ceased, there was an end at once of what he might call natural discipline. The French Army, since it had got rid of social distinctions, had never maintained with the same facility its discipline in the field. An old soldier in the English Army would feel respect for the youngest cornet, because he looked upon him as a superior, and well educated, and would obey him with greater readiness than he would one of the oldest and most distinguished of his comrades who had been promoted from the ranks.

Sir William Cuninghame

SIR HENRY JAMES said, one result of the operation of the sub-section would be that if an officer were cashiered he would for life be prevented from being made a Justice of the Peace. A young man of 20 who had committed a practical joke might, by the means of this sub-section, be made incapable for the remainder of his life of filling any position in Her Majesty's Service; and a man who had been represented to have committed a great fault might, at a later period, be found to have committed one of a venial character only. But if the sub-section were adopted, the Crown would never have the power of exercising its discretion in such a case.

COLONEL ALEXANDER intended to support the Motion of his hon. Friend (Sir William Cuninghame). He found that in 1811 a certain officer was sentenced to be cashiered; but being recommended to mercy, His Royal Highness the Prince Regent remarked that it was not expedient to give effect to the recommendation any further than to mitigate the sentence into one of dismissal, which showed that dismissal was not so severe a punishment as cashiering. Cashiering really meant "breaking," and an officer sentenced thereto suffered social ostracism. Again, in 1816, an officer was sentenced to be cashiered and rendered incapable of ever serving His Majesty in any capacity, either civil or military. Only that part of the sentence involving cashiering was carried out, and the court was informed that it was ultra vires to sentence a prisoner to incapacity to serve His Majesty. Another case was that of Lord George Sackville, who, after the battle of Minden, was tried by court martial for having disobeyed the orders of Prince Ferdinand of Brunswick, and judged unfit to serve His Majesty in any military capacity; yet, subsequently, as Lord George Germain, he filled the office of Secretary of State. The whole of the present measure erred on the side of excessive severity; and although hon. Members were told that it was merely a consolidating Bill, it was, in fact, very much more. He did not say that the increased severity was in accord with the ideas of the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War, who was only obeying the behests of Sir Henry Thring, whose finger was apparent in every clause of the Bill; and although that gentleman might be a good draftsman, he knew nothing whatever about the feelings of the officers of the Army. He (Colonel Alexander) was sure that the Articles of War would be found to give the Secretary of State for War as many opportunities for exercising severity as he could desire, and therefore hoped that the Motion of his hon. Friend would be agreed to.

COLONEL STANLEY said, that he had done his best to declare the law as he considered it to exist. So far as he understood the authorities quoted by his hon. and gallant Friend, they showed that there had always been a distinction between dismissal and cashiering; and if he could point to a single case where an officer who had been cashiered had again been employed in a military or a civil capacity by the Crown, he (Colonel Stanley) would be willing to omit this section. It seemed to him that the matter cut both ways; for there was a great deal in what had fallen from the hon. and learned Member for Taunton (Sir Henry James), to the effect that what was proposed would interfere with the right of the Crown to bring any person back to its Service. Still more than that, it was plain that it might occur that an officer early in life was cashiered for some fault, and it was hard that he should not have any locus penitentiae. He hoped that the Committee would understand his difficulty, and permit him to withdraw this section.

Amendment agreed to.

Sub-section 3 struck out.

CAPTAIN MILNE-HOME moved, in page 19, line 19, after sub-section 3, to add—

"An officer who joined the Army before the abolition of purchase, when sentenced to be cashiered, shall not forfeit any portion of any sum of money to which he may be entitled from the Purchase Commissioners, unless the sentence of the court otherwise directs."

The object of the Amendment, he stated, was to give to courts martial, when sentencing Purchase officers to be cashiered, a discretionary power to add to their sentence deprivation of commission money. In no authority had he been able to find that cashiering inflicted forfeiture of commission money. He knew this had been the practice in the Purchase days, and he did not wish to complain of that; because then all officers, whether they had paid for their commissions or not, served on equal terms. But in these days, circumstances were altered. For in the same regiment were men who had paid hundreds, if not thousands, for their commissions, serving side by side with others who had paid nothing; and thus one man might be fined heavily for committing an offence, while another for the same, if not a more flagrant crime, would get off scot free. To place both classes of officers on the same footing, it would seem natural to assent to the proposal of the hon. and gallant Member for Leitrim (Major O'Beirne) in the Committee upstairs, which accorded to Purchase officers, on all such occasions, their purchase money. But he (Captain Home) did not altogether concur in this view; because a court martial might consider the gravity of the offence warranted their depriving the officer of his money. On the other hand, it must be recollected there were—there had been—introduced into this Bill several venial offences, for which an officer might be cashiered, and for which it would be hard to mulct him of his money. He need not multiply instances, but would simply refer to the speech of the hon. and learned Member for Taunton (Sir Henry James), the whole of which was in favour of this Amendment. He would allude to the crime of drunkenness off duty; and, without going back on the discussion over Clause 19, it was clear that that offence must often be of a venial character. He was the last person to palliate the crime of drunkenness in anyone calling himself an officer and a gentleman; but he felt there might be cases where the court might be glad to have the opportunity of acting leniently. They might, moreover, consider it best for the interests of the Service to dismiss the officer; but might pause before passing such a sentence if they felt they would be in this way depriving the man of all means of livelihood. There was one other method of placing the two classes on the same terms—namely, to fine the non-Purchase officer a sum equal to what his commission would have cost, had he bought it. But he (Captain Home) feared this proposition would not be entertained; and, therefore, he suggested his Amendment as a fair compromise. One of the principles of the Bill was the definition of Military Law, and he contended the Amendment met that view, and it was, therefore, not inimical to the principle of the Bill: whereas, if it were not passed, the accurate meaning of the word “cashiered” must remain in its present obscurity.

MAJOR O'BEIRNE cordially supported the Amendment. In the 141 battalions now in the Service, there were 4,178 combatant officers, of whom 2,674 were Purchase officers. Considering, therefore, how large a percentage they formed of the officers of the Army at the present time, he did not think it would be either wise or just to disregard their feelings in this matter. To show under what circumstances an officer went into action at the present day, he would state that the money lost at the battle of Isandlana, by eight officers of the 24th Regiment being killed in action there, was £13,500. That would give a pretty good idea of the value of the money in question in regard to those 2,674 Purchase officers now in the Army. They were liable to forfeit the money to which they were otherwise entitled by the sentence of a court martial. The injustice of the matter was evidenced by what took place at the Criminal Court at Guildford, when Colonel Valentine Baker was tried and found guilty of an offence. In addition to his imprisonment, he was fined, by the Judge who tried him, £500; but beyond that, the authorities of the Horse Guards thought fit to fine him £4,500 more. The law of England was that no man should be punished twice for the same offence; and he was sure that when Mr. Justice Brett, who tried Colonel Baker, sentenced him to pay a fine of £500, he had not the slightest idea that the authorities at the Horse Guards would impose any further fine upon him. Indeed, in sentencing Colonel Baker, the Judge said that, having regard to the high character which he had received, and for the sake of his family and children, he would be allowed an opportunity of continuing to serve Her Majesty, and he did not believe that the fine would have been inflicted if the Judge had known that Colonel Baker was to be cashiered. The injustice of the present state of things was that a purchase officer was punished much more severely in being deprived of his commission than a non-Purchase officer; and that, in point of fact, his wife and family were punished as well as himself. For these reasons, he thought there should be some difference made between Purchase and non-Purchase officers in punishing them for offences, and that one class should not be punished so much more severely than the other.

COLONEL STANLEY was not able to accede to the Amendment. He would ask the hon. and gallant Gentleman to consider how the matter stood. He had no intention to follow the hon. and gallant Member who had last spoken into Colonel Baker's case, and of the loss by the Purchase officers at Isandlana, which he thought had nothing to do with this matter. The Army Regulation Bill of Lord Cardwell dealt with the matter in this way—it put the State into the position of the officer who formerly purchased a commission from another. They could no longer have an officer as the purchaser of the commission; but the State stepped in, and paid the value of the commission. Therefore, an officer had not now a saleable commission; and what happened was that the State stepped in and said that he should have the sum of money which he could have obtained from his brother officer in former times. When the officer was cashiered in former times, the step went as a matter of course, and no officer paid for it. They must remember that the State had simply taken the place of the officer who formerly purchased the step. There was not the slightest difference made in the manner in which Purchase and non-Purchase officers served side by side. One had paid money for his commission, and the other had not. Not the slightest difference had been made in the position of the Purchase officer, except, that whereas in former times, under certain circumstances, he was entitled to the value of his commission from his brother officer, now he was entitled to be paid that money by the State. What was now asked to be done was, that the commission of a Purchase officer, which was not saleable in former times, and for which he received nothing, should now be paid for by the State.

Captain Milne-Home

GENERAL SHUTE believed that the Amendment of his hon. and gallant Friend was thoroughly just and proper. With regard to what had been said as to the loss of money by the deaths at Isandlana, he might say that he knew of some very hard cases which he intended to bring before the House in a Motion which he had entered upon the Paper. He would, however, mention to the Committee one instance of an intimate friend of his, who was of a most generous disposition, and who obtained high promotion upon the death of his colonel, thus obtaining his regiment for nothing. But this gentleman, being a fairly rich man, presented the money he would otherwise have given for the step to the widow of the colonel and brother, for whom he and all under him had a great regard, she being left badly off. He would ask if the State would have done such an act as that?

MR. RYLANDS was extremely glad that the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War had refused to entertain the Amendment. He did not hesitate to say that Purchase officers had no reason to complain of any niggardliness on the part of the State; they had been treated in a manner for which, in his opinion, they ought to be extremely grateful. He supposed that the result of the Amendment, if carried, would be this—that if a Purchase officer in the Army were cashiered, he would be put into a much better position than he would have been under the old system of Purchase. And let it be remembered that the Amendment contemplated that an officer so cashiered should receive from the State not only his regulation price, but his over-regulation price. He had no hesitation in saying that the terms granted to the Purchase officers, by which they were placed under the new system in the same position as they occupied before, was a most advantageous arrangement to them, for it gave the sanction of law to what was known to be an indefensible practice on the part of the officers of the Army. The over-regulation price was paid under conditions not creditable to the Army; for every officer had at one period to take a solemn oath that he had not gone through any such transaction. Up to the last day on which the Purchase system existed an officer of the Army had had on his honour to declare that no over-regulation price had been paid. Yet, in spite of that, a constant violation of the law took place; and when the Government agreed to pay over-regulation prices—which he was very sorry they did, for he believed they were thus doing a great injustice to the public generally—they gave terms to the officers of the Army which he thought were perfectly outrageous in the generosity with which they recognized their claims. If the hon. and gallant Gentleman wished to re-open this question, then it would be necessary to consider the whole circumstances of the matter; but, for his part, he should say that it would be best not to disturb this settlement. The effect of the Amendment, if carried, would be that the Purchase officer in the Army would be in a better position, in relation to the value of his commission, than he was when under the old system. The adoption of the Amendment would be a disturbance of the settlement come to by the late Government; and he hoped that the hon. and gallant Gentleman would see that, under the circumstances, it was undesirable to press his Amendment. He was fully in favour of cashiering being made not to have any effect which was not reasonable and proper; but he must say that the present proposal went far beyond that, and would be very unjust.

COLONEL ALEXANDER wished to point out that the Crown had now a power, if it chose to exercise it, of ordering that an officer sentenced to be cashiered should receive the full value of his commission. In his opinion, the best way would be to leave the matter in its present position.

MR. MUNTZ considered that it would be unwise to interfere with the arrangements made in 1871. Both sides of the House had now acquiesced in that arrangement, although when under discussion he fought the matter out to the last, and he was sorry that his efforts were unsuccessful. He was convinced that the wisest course was not to interfere with that settlement. What was the condition of officers before the abolition of Purchase? If they were tried by court martial and sentenced to be cashiered, they forfeited both the regulation and the over-regulation prices of their commissions. That was all that happened now, although the Crown had the Prerogative of ordering that they should receive the value of their commission, if it thought proper.

MAJOR O'BEIRNE observed, that when a soldier was tried by court martial and sentenced to punishment he did not thereby forfeit his money in the savings bank. But this was a reversal of the adage of one law for the rich and another for the poor, for it was one law for the poor and another for the rich. He thought that a Purchase officer ought to receive the money which he had placed in the Military Chest in the shape of his commission, just as much as the soldier received the money which was due to him from the military savings bank.

GENERAL SHUTE wished to know whether the Crown had the power to say, in case an officer was cashiered, that he should receive the value of his commission—that was to say, the same amount as in the case of his selling out would be awarded by the Purchase Commissioners?

COLONEL STANLEY was not able to answer the question of the hon. and gallant Gentleman; all he could say was that, so far as there was any existing right, it would not be affected by the Bill. Perhaps he would be better able to answer the question on another occasion.

MR. PARNELL did not think that this question was looked at in a right way. The Secretary of State for War defended the position he took up in refusing to accept the Amendment on this ground—that formerly, under the old system of Purchase, an officer who was cashiered got nothing, but the step went in the ordinary way in the regiment without purchase, and the same thing now happened. In his opinion, they ought to consider whether that was entirely a just arrangement. It was true that by the Act of 1871 the justice of that plan was acknowledged; but there was no reason why they should not rectify any injustice by the present Bill. If there were any inequality in any respect, or any injustice, he could not see why it should not be rectified. They ought to consider whether it was just or unjust that an officer of the Army, because he had given a considerable sum of money for his position, besides undergoing the sentence of the court martial, should be additionally punished by losing the money he had paid. Under the old system of Purchase, an officer could not receive this sum of money, but lost his commission; and the reason he obtained nothing was that he had no longer any step to sell. That system had now been done away with; and he thought they might fairly modify the inequalities and injustices left, if it were made plain that they existed. He would suggest to the Secretary of State for War, that they might so far modify the Act of 1871 as to give a court martial a discretion to say whether, in the event of an officer being cashiered, he ought to receive the regulation value of his commission. At the present time, a lieutenant who was cashiered was punished much less than a general officer. Why should a lieutenant be punished, irrespective entirely of the sentence of the court martial and of the magnitude of the offence, in a much less degree than an officer of a higher rank? It might be that the offence for which a general officer was cashiered was of a much less grave nature than that for which a subaltern, under the new system, was cashiered. Yet, from the mere fact of the sentence of cashiering being passed, the power was taken away from the court martial to prevent the Purchase officer losing the money invested in his commission in addition to undergoing the sentence of the court. He should support his hon. and gallant Friend opposite if he went to a division upon this Motion; for he did not see that there was any right to punish a man twice over—first, by the sentence of the court martial, and, again, by the loss of his money. He thought it wrong to punish a man by a sort of Act of Parliament which did not take such a case into its consideration; and, in fact, by an additional sentence, which not only punished the person himself, but, in all probability, his wife and children.

SIR WALTER B. BARTELOT observed, that a statement had been made that the Crown had the right to give the value of his commission to any officer who had been cashiered. He believed that that right existed; and he thought the wisest course would be to withdraw the Amendment and repeat it again, supposing it might be discovered that the Crown had not that right.

SIR HENRY JAMES asked for the assistance of the Law Officers of the Crown upon this matter.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL (Sir HARDINGE GIFFARD) stated that he was unacquainted with the subject.

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON said, that the Crown frequently remitted the punishment of forfeiture of the money. It was not a question admitting of the slightest doubt. The cases which had been put might be further exemplified. A regimental officer who had invested money in his commission, and a Staff officer who had not, might be both sentenced by a court martial for the same offence; but the sentence upon the one was much more severe than upon the other. He was sorry that the Secretary of State for War could not accept the proposal.

CAPTAIN MILNE-HOME said, that perhaps it might be more in accordance with the feelings of the Committee, and certainly with the feelings of hon. Gentlemen upon that side of the House, that he should withdraw his Amendment, pending the reply to the question of which the hon. and gallant Member for Brighton had given Notice. He might say, however, that he knew a great number of officers, not only in that House but out-of-doors, who felt very strongly upon this subject. He did not wish to enter into any of the questions brought forward by the hon. Member for Burnley (Mr. Rylands), nor did he wish to say anything with regard to the regulation and the over-regulation prices. What he asked for was simply common justice to the officer who had purchased his commission. He believed, also, that whatever opinion might be held as to purchase or non-purchase of any grade in the Army, that no greater similarity could be brought about between the two classes of officers than by adopting this Amendment. In the meantime, he begged to withdraw his Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. PARNELL moved, in page 19, line 23, to leave out from the word "imprisonment," to the word "punishment," in line 25, inclusive. The hon. Gentleman said, the Amendment was in continuation of the discussion which took place on the last day when the House was in Committee upon this Bill before the holidays, in reference to the question of corporal punishment. The subject was not very fully discussed, or dealt with, on that occasion. They were asked at that time—and it was strongly pressed against them by those who believed in corporal punishment—that there was no alternative for punishing a soldier if he were not flogged. It was said that if a man could not be flogged, the only other punishment that could be given to him was capital punishment. At the time he was not prepared to answer that argument, because he wished to make inquiries amongst military men, who were better acquainted with the details of punishments which could be inflicted under certain circumstances. He had now made inquiries amongst several officers of the Army, and he had been told that there would be no difficulty in punishing a man sufficiently in a simple manner without flogging him. He was able to state that there were many punishments which could be inflicted upon a soldier that would tell in a much greater degree upon him than flogging, unless he were of a very degraded character. If a man were caught plundering, or doing any act which was prejudicial to discipline or the conduct of an army in the field, he was now usually punished by the provost marshal by flogging. But he might have his hands tied behind his back, and his rifle slung behind him, and made to carry two or three knapsacks, and the nature and quality of his offence written upon a placard upon his back. In that state he might be made to march along with his comrades in the ranks, pointed out as a black sheep, subject to the derision of everyone who saw him. That would be a sufficient punishment for the offences he had indicated in the field, without flogging having to be resorted to. There were, in fact, 50 ways of temporarily disgracing a soldier and making him an object of derision, which would be far better punishment than flogging him. If the authorities only chose to exert themselves, they would soon find out plenty of means; but it should not be thrown upon civilians to find out a substitute for such a disgraceful and degrading punishment as flogging. It was a punishment which had been abandoned amongst all foreign Armies in Europe. The Prussians did not use it, and the Russians never beat their soldiers. He was aware that Russia had acquired an unenviable reputation for the use of the lash; but he knew perfectly well that Russia never beat her soldiers—she might beat her subjects; but she never beat her soldiers. In France they did not find that the punishment of flogging was ever in use, or was necessary. He hoped that the Secretary of State for War would take one further step in the direction of the abolition of this punishment; and as he had only retained the punishment of flogging for armies in the field, and for troops on board ship not being ships of war, he would abolish it altogether. If he did so, his rule in his present Office would be one which would be looked back upon with satisfaction by everyone who wished well to the British Army. He begged to move his Amendment.

Mr. Parnell

Amendment proposed,

In page 19, line 23, to leave out from the word "imprisonment," to the word "punishment," in line 25, inclusive.—(Mr. Parnell.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Clause."

COLONEL STANLEY was not quite sure whether the hon. Member saw the effect of the Amendment which he proposed. As regarded corporal punishment, the House considered the subject at some length on a previous occasion, and the necessity of retaining the punishment was affirmed by a very large majority. Even if he were willing to assent to the abolition of the punishment, he could not accept the alteration proposed by the hon. Member. This was not a matter in which he would be in Order in explaining, for the effect of the Amendment proposed would not be to touch the liability of the soldier to corporal punishment. He might still be sentenced to corporal punishment; there would be no power, if the Amendment were adopted, afterwards to discharge him with ignominy from Her Majesty's Service. It would, therefore, be very inconvenient to adopt any such Amendment as that proposed.

MR. RYLANDS said, that when this question was before the Committee on a former occasion, it was under circumstances which led to a restriction of the opportunities which might have been desired on the part of hon. Members to express their opinions. This was a matter upon which he entertained a very strong opinion. He should be willing to retain the punishment of flogging, or any other punishment, if it could be shown that that punishment was absolutely necessary. But, in this case, he did not think any necessity had been shown for the retention of the punishment. He did not wish to look at this matter as a mere question of sentiment. He regarded it from a much wider and broader point of view. He would ask, how far did the fact that this punishment could be inflicted under certain conditions upon soldiers in the Army affect or prevent any man who wished to enlist from doing so? The matter should be looked at in a practical way. In former times, when flogging was very frequent in the Army, officers generally accustomed to flogging during their military experience were of opinion that the punishment could not be abolished without detriment to the discipline of the Service. He supposed that opinion was not now entertained, for the step taken in the nearly total abolition of flogging in the Army was now admitted to be the wisest thing that could have been done. There had been no evil effects resulting from it, and no detriment had been experienced to the Service; on the contrary, there could be no doubt whatever that the Service had received very great advantage. The advantage to the Service had been in two ways; first, it was clear that if a man were flogged he was degraded; and, secondly, he was made a worse soldier. Consequently, it must be admitted that if flogging were prevalent in the Service, there must be a shrinking on the part of respectable men from joining a Service in which they would be exposed to punishment of that kind. Flogging had been very much diminished; and it might be said, therefore, that they need not trouble themselves about the exceptional cases in which the punishment could now be inflicted. Let hon. Gentlemen remember that the exceptional case might be the one in which a man enlisting could be brought under. Regiments were frequently sent abroad, and they were not always sent in vessels of war; and if a man were sent abroad in a ship not being a vessel of war, he was liable to be flogged; and he thought that the knowledge that he was liable to such a punishment would prevent many a man from enlisting who might otherwise have joined the Service.

THE CHAIRMAN said, he must point out to the hon. Member that the subject to which he was now referring would be more relevant to another clause of the Bill. The question now before the Committee had no reference to the infliction of this sort of punishment. The only question that arose upon the clause was whether a soldier sentenced to corporal punishment might not, in addition, be sentenced to be discharged with ignominy from Her Majesty's Service. He did not think that it was desirable upon this Amendment to consider the question of corporal punishment per se.

MR. RYLANDS said, that unless this clause were re-modelled with respect to this particular punishment, there would be an inconvenience in the argument of his Amendment to strike out corporal punishment from another clause.

THE CHAIRMAN wished to point out to the Committee that the sub-section k, in the earlier part of the clause, empowered the infliction of this punishment. When that was under consideration was the proper time for debating the propriety of inflicting corporal punishment. The effect of the Amendment would not be to diminish the power given by the Act to inflict corporal punishment; but only to prevent a soldier, upon whom corporal punishment had been inflicted, being afterwards discharged with ignominy from Her Majesty's Service.

MR. RYLANDS had no doubt that the Chairman was quite right in his ruling; therefore he should reserve his point, and make the observations which he intended to make when the hon. and learned Member for Stockport (Mr. Hopwood) proposed his Amendment.

MR. PARNELL observed, that the effect of the Amendment would be to prevent a soldier being discharged with ignominy, in addition to receiving corporal punishment. As Mover of the Amendment, he wished to restrict further punishment, and to prevent any punishment being added to corporal punishment. Surely they were entitled to speak of the effect of corporal punishment. That was the way in which the matter occurred to him when he moved his Amendment. He had only risen for the purpose, not of continuing the discussion on the question of corporal punishment, but to point out to the Committee that the arguments made use of against his Amendment did not affect its propriety. It had been said that the effect of his Amendment would be to prevent a soldier who had been flogged being afterwards discharged with ignominy. The right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War said that that was a consequence which he did not wish to see realized; but he should submit that the right hon. and gallant Gentleman had offered no argument in respect of that view. They had been told that it was necessary to punish certain offences in the field quickly and sharply. He would ask, whether the discharge of a soldier with ignominy from Her Majesty's Service was a punishment of that character? If discharging a soldier from Her Majesty's Service with ignominy was a suitable punishment, why was it necessary to score his back with the lash in addition? He thought that the arguments used against it tended strongly in favour of his Amendment. They might flog a soldier because they desired to retain him in the Army; but if it were desired to get rid of him, what was the reason for flogging him?

Mr. A. H. BROWN said, that under this clause they could only inflict corporal punishment upon a soldier when on board ship or on actual service. These two conditions were necessary before corporal punishment could be inflicted. Now, this part of the clause said, that in addition to imprisonment or any other punishment, which might be corporal punishment, a soldier might be discharged with ignominy. The question then arose, first, how could he be discharged with ignominy when on board ship on a voyage? He could not be discharged until the end of the voyage. And, secondly, when on actual service, it seemed to him that that was certainly not a time when a soldier should be discharged with ignominy, but rather that he should be kept in the Service. It was possible that when on actual military service a soldier might want to be discharged; and, therefore, it would be surely undesirable to allow him to be so. Therefore, he thought there would be harm in allowing a soldier to be discharged with ignominy after receiving corporal punishment.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 160; Noes 43: Majority 117.—(Div. List, No. 116.)

Mr. HOPWOOD said, if his opinions were regulated by the results of divisions in that House, he should be so much discouraged by the one just taken as to fear moving his next Amendment. But he and his Friends were so convinced of the good that was done by the repetition of argument, that they would not hesitate to seize every opportunity to discuss this most cruel, useless, and pernicious punishment. He, therefore, should offer no apology for again pressing this discussion on the Committee; and he could not understand how so many officers of high rank and ripe experience could sit silent and dumb when they must have many arguments in support of this punishment, derived from their own experience, to offer to the Committee. Why did they leave the kind-hearted Secretary of State for War to defend this punishment, and maintain that an Army of his countrymen was made of such materials that they could not be managed in the field, or during transport across the seas, without this excessive and terrific punishment? Yet that was their position at the present time. Englishmen were very Pharisaical. They thanked God that they were not as other men were—not even as those poor Russians. That was the idea which passed through the rather crude and uninformed minds of many gentlemen. They really did not know what was done in Russia; while as to other countries, he was amazed at the levity with which people said—"Oh! they don't flog soldiers in France and Germany; they shoot them." Where was the authority for it? Did anyone mean to tell him that an officer would have a man shot for the same offence for which he gave him 50 lashes? They were always talking about Russia; although he believed that many of those who talked so glibly about the knout did not know that it had been abolished there for 15 years. In out-of-the-way parts and corners of Russia illegal acts might be done; but flogging was against the law. Therefore, Englishmen might cease comparing themselves in their inflated vanity with other nations in this respect. When he spoke of the severity of the punishment, he was told that he was talking of the good old days when the "cat" flourished. An hon. and learned Friend of his (Mr. Sullivan), on a former occasion, was supposed to have exaggerated in describing the results of the lash, and it was denied that the lash caused blood to flow. But Mr. Buxton, a former Member of that House, stated in one of his speeches, reported in Hansard—

"At the first blow the blood spurted out some yards; and after he had received 50 lashes his back, from the neck to the waist, was one stream of blood. The man was disabled, often for many days, sometimes even for weeks, as in the case of a man flogged last autumn at Woolwich."

These recitals were painful, but so was the lash; and if they were to have it, do not let them put the consequences on one side with solemn contemptuous indifference, and throw the blame on the military authorities. He knew there was always a natural jealousy between two Professions as to the interference of one with the other; and an hon. and gallant Gentleman the other night had talked of the tinkering this law had received from the lawyers. He did doubt, on the other hand, whether the training of an officer was quite the training by which a man best learned the way to keep men to their allegiance, and to make them perform their duty with the smallest amount of suffering and the least need of punishment. It was not the fault of military men, but of their training, that they saw matters from a small and narrow standpoint, and had not the inestimable advantage which a training in law gave—that it taught a man to consider crime and punishment from an entirely different aspect. Therefore, he hoped the military men in that House would not altogether reject the gentle suggestions they might receive from lawyers. Civilians had discarded this punishment of flogging long ago. They tried it for a number of years, and then, with universal execration and by universal consent, they discarded it as not only doing nothing to stop crime, but as doing a great deal to injure the population; and, above all, as inflicting an irreparable injury on those who inflicted it. Though 50 lashes was the talismanic number allowed by this Bill, no Judge, even in the worst cases, now thought of giving more than 20, or at the most 25. Another person, describing a flogging, said—

Mr. Parnell

“As each was cast off after the punishment, his neck and back presented to view a belt of livid flesh, about seven or eight inches across, and reaching, as we have said, in a slanting direction from shoulders to waist, so that no part of the back escaped the blows of the lash. Each of the prisoners appeared to suffer in much the same degree in intensity; and each gave indications of the severity of the pain by screams and cries repeated at every stroke. These cries, we are told, continued for some time after the punishment was over; and, indeed, so painful was the scene, and so distressing the cries of the prisoners, that the officials themselves had some difficulty in sustaining it.”

No doubt, the non-commissioned officers and men who had to look on while their comrade was being flogged must be deeply touched and pained. But such scenes could not be repeated before these men without depriving them of their proper feeling of sensibility. Therefore, he should like to lower this punishment to the lowest possible amount. The Bill said the maximum was to be 50 lashes; but, in reality, it was 450—it was nine times 50, for each lash had nine tails. He was told, also, that the most muscular men in regiments were employed to lay on the lash. The drummers were employed, he was told, because by long practice they had acquired great muscular power of arm and wrist; while in Cavalry regiments the farrier-sergeant was told off to be the degraded executioner. In this continuation of flogging in the Army every Member of the House who did not oppose it was concerned. For that reason, he would protest as long as he was able, and whenever he could get the chance, determined to free himself, at any rate, from having any part or share in the responsibility for its perpetuation. He wished to know why, if 50 lashes were named in the Bill, the instrument by which they were to be inflicted should have nine thongs? Perhaps the Secretary of State for War would be good enough to explain this. Now, as the right hon. and gallant Gentleman asked for 50 lashes which, owing to the construction of the instrument by which they were to be inflicted, meant 450, he (Mr. Hopwood) proposed to give him six, which would, in effect, be 54; and that number he trusted the Committee would present to Her Majesty's Government as being the right number to be inserted in the Act. He, therefore, begged to move, in page 19, line 27, to leave out “fifty,” and insert “six,” thereby securing discipline, securing order, and securing the repression of crime—if such a punishment could secure these objects—and substituting, in reality, 54 lashes for the 450 which, by a covert falsehood, was represented by this Bill as 50.

COLONEL STANLEY thought the hon. and learned Member had more than once apologized in the course of his harangue for his ignorance in matters relating to Army discipline; and, although he had no wish to press the point, he could not help remarking that he had just ground for excusing himself on account of that disqualification; because some of the arguments used by him could not in any way apply to the clause before the Committee. The principle of corporal punishment had been fully debated by the House a few days back, when its retention was confirmed by a very large majority, after three hours' discussion. He was obliged to presume that the plan adopted by the hon. and learned Member, of picking holes in this portion of the Bill by the Amendment which stood in his name, was intended to make his arguments hang together with some degree of consistency. The hon. and learned Member went on to say that the prescribed number of lashes should be inflicted "with an instrument or whip of not more than one thong or tail." But it was of no use lingering on those petty points of detail. As the Act was drawn, there was nothing whatever to prevent the use of a whip of steel, or, in short, a much more formidable instrument being prepared than was at present in use. He was not aware whether there was any sealed pattern of the instrument for use in the Army, as in the case of the Navy and prisons, which prevented their being made of any excessive dimensions; but if there were not, he thought it perfectly right that there should be. He was, however, bound to say that there had never been any complaint of excessive punishment; and, so far from there being any desire on the part of the authorities to inflict the punishment more severely than was strictly consistent with what was believed to be their duty, the feeling was quite of a contrary character. It would, therefore, be his duty to oppose all the Amendments of the hon. and learned Member who had just addressed the Committee.

MR. RYLANDS rose with the object of considering this question from an entirely different standpoint to that occupied by the hon. and learned Member for Stockport (Mr. Hopwood). He was prepared to look at this matter solely in view of its effect upon the administration of the Army and the good of the Service; and, leaving aside altogether the painful impression caused by this mode of punishment, to proceed upon a broad ground, and ask, was it or was it not desirable that this kind of discipline should be maintained in the Army? He held in his hand an annual Return from the Army, which went back to 1865, in which year he found that corporal punishment in the Army had been inflicted in 600 cases. The number of cases in which this punishment had been inflicted went on decreasing down to the year 1868, when, in fact, there were none, in consequence of the alterations of the Mutiny Act which took place in 1867. Further, by the Mutiny Act of 1868 the punishment was abolished, except upon active service, and on board ships not in commission, and that was the provision which it was intended to continue in the present Army Regulations. As the result of this alteration of the law, between the years 1869 and 1877 there was only one case of infliction of corporal punishment in the Army, according to the Returns. There had, however, very recently been some cases on board ships, to which allusion had been made in the House; but, practically, for several years the punishment had been done away with altogether, and the same change had been made in the Navy. Now, the right hon. and gallant Gentleman had stated—and he believed with perfect truth—that in the case of a great number of commanding officers there would be the greatest reluctance to the infliction of this punishment. He (Mr. Rylands) had already stated—and he repeated his belief—that amongst the officers of the Army there were men as humane and as anxious to maintain discipline by kindness as amongst any other class of Her Majesty's Service. But there was no doubt whatever—and the right hon. and gallant Gentleman knew it better than he did—that while this was the general character of the officers of the Army, there were officers of a very different description. There were men who were violent, and who, by their temper, were disposed to impose punishment in a manner which caused a bad impression upon the men under their command, and which was, therefore, detrimental to Her Majesty's Service. Therefore, in looking at this question, they should not set up a standard of character on the part of officers in the Army generally; but they must consider how this particular power might be exercised by men not of very good judgment, and probably by men of infirmity of temper. So far as he was able to judge, the change in the Mutiny Act, under which the administration of corporal punishment had been brought down to a minimum, had effected a great alteration in the administration of the Army, and one which hon. and gallant Gentlemen knew was very much opposed by officers of the Army before that change took place; but it was now plain that it had been altogether beneficial. He had never heard that there had been any objection raised since to the change which had taken place by reason of the limitation of this flogging in the Army. But was it a fact, or was it not, that the power to inflict corporal punishment in certain cases tended to produce a feeling, on the part of the people outside the Service, which would prevent their coming to our regiments? He was quite sure, from his knowledge of the working classes, that the fact of a soldier being liable to this degrading punishment, and the knowledge that when a soldier had been punished in this way his self-respect was reduced, and he was lowered in every way, had a very deterrent effect in preventing men from joining the Army. Now, he should support, during the progress of this Bill, every proposal the effect of which would be to induce a higher class of men to join the Army. In the book which he held in his hand, he found records of crime that were perfectly alarming. He found that the number of men punished for crime in the Army was almost incredible. Until the Return presented to Parliament was examined, one could not imagine there could be found such a large proportion of the men guilty of offences. In 1877 the number of punishments proportioned to offences tried by courts martial was 15,793; the offences themselves, of a serious character, numbering no less than 24,199. In addition to these offences of a serious character, there was a large number punished by the regimental officers; and he found that under that head the number of minor punishments inflicted was something enormous, the total number in 1877 being 282,687; so that what between the major and minor punishments, there existed a state of crime and disorder in the Army which was certainly of a very unsatisfactory character. That state of things, in his opinion, arose, to a great extent, from the fact that under the present condition of the Service the country was obliged to get recruits from the very lowest characters of the population. It was found that men of high character amongst the working classes shrunk from going into the Army. Now, he held that rather than resort to men of low character, men of good character ought to be induced to enlist, and not those of disorderly habits. By attracting men of this character, with naturally vicious habits, the Army was rendered a hot-bed for the rearing of men in the constant habit of committing crimes, and who were continually being held to punishment by the decision of their superiors; and this large proportion of men undergoing punishment, as hon. and gallant Members knew perfectly well, very much interfered with the efficiency and available strength of the Army. Therefore, on the grounds of economy, efficiency, and the maintenance of the character of the Service, he held that, if there was the slightest suspicion that the infliction of this punishment, or the knowledge that it could be inflicted, deterred men of the highest character from enlisting, flogging was one of the worst things that could be adopted for the interest of the Army. There was another point which, when the subject of punishment was being dealt with, it was of the greatest possible importance to bear in mind, and that was that punishments should have no reference to the rank of the offender—they should simply regard the enormity of the offence. If it was thought necessary that there should be a particular punishment for certain offences, let it be applied to all ranks in the Army—to the officer, as well as to the private soldier. He would remind hon. Gentlemen that in the days of the First Napoleon a proposal was made to introduce corporal punishment into the French Army. The Emperor resisted that view; but upon pressure from certain officers connected with the Army, he at last consented that a Committee should be appointed to inquire into the propriety of the introduction, with the condition, however, that if it was decided that corporal punishment should be introduced, it should be made to apply to all ranks of the Army alike; and the result was, that the officers who had pressed the matter on the Emperor allowed it to drop, and nothing more was heard of it. He intended to vote in favour of the abolition of this punishment in the British Army, not because he was prepared to take the position that, under no circumstances, could it be beneficial, but with the view of regarding the interest of the Army, and of securing the highest class of recruits; for he maintained that by getting rid of corporal punishment the country would get rid of what, in his opinion, deterred the better class of men from joining our regiments.

Mr. BIGGAR remarked, that the Secretary of State for War had said this was not a pleasant subject; but he had added that no complaints were made against corporal punishment, and that, in fact, the system gave great satisfaction. He (Mr. Biggar) presumed that this was the view of those who had to inflict the punishment, and liked to see it inflicted on others; but he was convinced it could not be the view of those who were liable to it themselves. With regard to the very important point raised by the hon. Member for Burnley (Mr. Rylands), as to whether this punishment, in the interests of the Army, should be allowed to continue, it was well known that, at the present time, the recruits were of the very worst description. Over and over again it was stated in the House, and it was notorious out-of-doors, that it was impossible to obtain the proper class of men for recruiting our regiments; the class which now joined being physically and morally unfit for the Service. Did any hon. Member think for a moment that a man of decent character and in fair employment would join the Army, while he ran the risk of having corporal punishment inflicted on him by the whim of an officer? Even, therefore, from the most selfish point of view, so far as the interests of the Army were concerned, the system was inexpedient. It was well known that the Armies of France, Russia, and Germany could hold their own in the field without this system; and not as the British Army had done in Afghanistan, by bribing the heads of the Tribes; while it was equally the fact that, in Zululand, our Army could not make its way at all. He thought the officers of the Army should unite to get rid of the punishment of flogging altogether.

Mr. PARNELL thought the Committee had every reason to complain of the tone which the Secretary of State for War had assumed with regard to the Amendments of the hon. and learned Member for Stockport (Mr. Hopwood), which he affected to treat as entirely beneath his notice, and unworthy of discussion. The history of this matter had been that when, upon former occasions, the annual Mutiny Act was passed as a matter of form, and

hon. Members had ventured to ask that some attention should be given to the question of flogging in the Army, they were told by the War Office authorities, and by the then Secretary of State for War, that this question, among others, should be inquired into, and receive the attention of a Select Committee, and that afterwards the Government would frame a Bill to deal with the subject. But the result was that, so far from the question of flogging receiving the attention of the Committee upstairs, it received no attention whatever. One of the last things which he (Mr. Parnell) had done on the Committee was to move for further evidence upon the subject, but the Motion was rejected. After this, it was felt that the proceedings of the Committee were of an useless and entirely unsatisfactory character, and that the result was not to be in any way relied upon. It was, therefore, the duty of hon. Members interested in the abolition of this punishment to see that their proceedings on the present occasion were not of the same useless character, and that the question raised by the hon. and learned Member for Stockport should receive proper consideration at the hands of the Secretary of State for War. He (Mr. Parnell) submitted that it was not in accordance with the traditions of the House to go over a series of Amendments and reject them before they had received the consideration of the Committee; it showed a desire, on the part of the right hon. and gallant Gentleman, to forestall argument, which would certainly not facilitate the progress of the Bill. The hon. and learned Member for Stockport had asked that if the punishment of flogging could not be done away with altogether it should, at least, be limited in extent of application; and, in so doing, he only went upon the precedent furnished by Government in drawing up the Act, when they showed that there were occasions upon which corporal punishment should not exceed a certain number of lashes; nay, more, they had shown, in many instances, by their practice, that it was not right to inflict this punishment to its fullest extent. He asked why, if never more than 25 lashes were inflicted in the Army, 50 should be inserted in the statute? If officers and surgeons in the Army found 50 lashes too many, why should you put more in the statute than were considered proper by the men who had to execute the law which had been placed in their hands? In other days there were men who defended the infliction of 2,000 lashes—men of humane character—just as there were at the present day to justify the infliction of 50 lashes. Nevertheless, that punishment of 2,000 lashes had been gradually brought down to 50; and he hoped that the number would be further brought down until none of it remained. Therefore, he trusted the Committee would not dismiss the question too hastily, and without full discussion. The question had its human, as well as its political aspect; and on that ground it demanded the fullest consideration. Again, it was absurd to suppose that they could get a desirable class of men into the Army while the terror of the lash hung over them. From a professional point of view, it should be a matter of delight to a soldier, when war was commenced; but to the English soldier it could be but a matter of apprehension, because he knew that in time of war he was liable to this degrading and brutal punishment of flogging. The Secretary of State for War had told the Committee that it was not his desire to inflict this punishment in a brutal way; but, nevertheless, although it was not his desire, it was inflicted in as brutal a manner as it was possible to inflict it. The strongest man in the regiment was told off for the purpose; that strong man was not supposed to be able to inflict more than 12 strokes at the time; the surgeon stood by, and the sergeant said "one;" the executioner, who stood with the lash in his hands, proceeded with the utmost force to bring it down on the shoulders of the sufferer, bringing it back again to the attitude of "attention." As soon as the sergeant saw that the strong man had had time to prepare himself for another stroke, he gave the order for another lash. Now, if that was not done with the intention of giving as much pain as possible by the punishment, he would like to know what could be? He deprecated the forestalling, in any way, of the Amendments of the hon. and learned Member for Stockport, as had been attempted by the Secretary of State for War; and, at the same time, trusted that the Committee would mark its sense of the motives of the hon. and learned Member by supporting him in the division.

Mr. Rylands

MR. HOPWOOD pointed out that it was an error to assume that corporal punishment could be inflicted gently, and asserted that unless it was administered with the greatest possible severity the officer charged with its execution did not do his duty; the lashes must be of the full tale of severity. There must be no blinking of the question; the punishment was of a brutal and beastly kind; if any hon. Member thought it was not, let him stand up and say so. He should like it to be known in the House of Commons what Member would stand up and say that flogging was not a brutal and beastly punishment. But he saw no inclination on the part of any hon. and gallant Member to rise and say even that it was a punishment to be admired for its effectiveness in maintaining discipline in the British Army. It did not quite become the Secretary of State for War to remark that it was not usual to employ a steel whip in the Army; and he could not help thinking that the manner of his reply lost some of its pungency, when he undertook to say that he (Mr. Hopwood) had apologized for his ignorance in discussing this matter. In making the admission referred to, he desired the Secretary of State for War to understand that he had but done what he should do when occupying ground not usually trodden by him. But the right hon. and gallant Gentleman had done more. He had said—"You ought not to go into these matters at all." Well, he was repentant. But why did he not take his hand, as a child's, tenderly, and say—"Your experience is not like mine; let me tell you, you are wrong?" Had he done so, he (Mr. Hopwood) would most certainly have apologized, and said—"I have wronged an hon. and gallant Member; I have overstated my case; I have done an injustice." But the fact was, the Secretary of State for War had hoped, by the use of oratorical artifice, to get rid of his arguments.

SIR HENRY HAVELOCK was not disposed to listen in silence to charges thrown out against men who, in pursuance of what they believed to be their duty, were prepared to vote in favour of retaining for the present a mode of punishment which they considered to be indispensable to the maintenance of discipline in the Army under circumstances of war. He held that the

hon. and learned Gentleman had no practical acquaintance whatever with the circumstances which made this punishment necessary; and had it not been for the challenge thrown out by him, he would not have troubled the Committee with any observations on that occasion. But as the hon. and learned Member had thrown down a challenge, he would tell him that he (Sir Henry Havelock) yielded to him not one inch in his desire to remove corporal punishment from the Army as soon as it was possible to do so with safety. But it was nothing more than a perversion of language and sentiment to say, as the hon. and learned Member had said, that flogging was a disgrace to the Army. The officers of the Army argued, from a melancholy acquaintance with the facts, that in the present circumstances of the Army, and under the temptations amongst which soldiers were thrown in time of war, that the punishment in question was one which it was necessary to maintain. The difference between our Service and that of foreign countries was this—that whereas we were compelled to resort to corporal punishment in the case of certain offences, they, on the other hand, for the like offences, applied, were applying, and would, in his opinion, always in future apply, the punishment of death. Was it the desire of hon. Members, by inflicting the punishment of death, to shut out every chance of retrieval in cases where men now received a punishment which was disgraceful, certainly, but which was for that very reason efficacious? How often did hon. Members require to be told that under no circumstances could the punishment of flogging be given except by court martial? [“No, no!”] [Major NOLAN: The Provost Marshal.] He was not referring to active service. He was glad to hear the hon. and gallant Member for Galway make some remark himself, because he was often contented to act as the instigator of those around him. If the hon. and gallant Member would look at the statistics he would see that in the year 1877, while 30,000 soldiers were on their passage to and from India and the Colonies, not one single instance of corporal punishment had occurred on board ship. Again, although the country had been carrying on war for some months past, he believed that neither in Afghanistan nor in Zululand had corporal punishment yet been inflicted; and he hoped that the latter war would be brought to an end without that necessity arising. Corporal punishment was mainly used during actual warfare, for crimes that were in themselves a disgrace to humanity. It was futile, as well as absurd, to suppose that men of the class of which the British Army was composed—men who were ready to risk anything and to dare anything, who carried their lives daily in their hands, to whom the risk of death and mutilation was a part of the bargain into which they had entered—would be deterred from crime by the mere physical pain of a few lashes. The efficacy of the punishment was entirely due to its disgraceful character. If this punishment was to be done away with in the few cases in which it was retained, what substitute was it proposed to supply? Amongst the various proposals which had been made was the ridiculous suggestion that a card should be hung round the neck of the offender; but he wished to point out to the hon. Member who had made that suggestion (Mr. Parnell), that though this would undoubtedly be ridiculous, the ridicule would justly fall, not on those who suffered, but on those who attempted to apply it. He could assure the Committee that there was no class of men in the world who were more glad to see improvements in the condition of the soldier than were the officers of the Army, who on that occasion had been so much maligned. He sincerely hoped that the time might soon come when corporal punishment would die out, because it was no longer needed; but he was obliged to remark that in such an event the House would owe nothing to the arguments of hon. Members below the Gangway. What monopoly of the feelings of humanity, he desired to know, belonged to those hon. Members? In conclusion, he wished to say that no class of men would rejoice more than the officers of the Army when this punishment could be done away with; but until this occurred the good soldiers knew that they were in perfect security, because there was not the slightest risk that, by any possibility, corporal punishment would be inflicted upon them.

Sir Henry Havelock

MAJOR NOLAN said, he was not going to imitate the example of the hon. and gallant Gentleman who had just sat down by endeavouring to obtain a cheer from hon. Members opposite. Notwithstanding that he had attempted to persuade the Committee that no flogging was inflicted in the Army except by sentence of court martial, he (Major Nolan) was in a position to state that from three-fourths to nine-tenths of the floggings took place without any court martial whatever. The reason of his remaining silent during the discussion was that he desired to reserve his observations until the Amendment which stood in his name was reached, and which Amendment was intended to afford a guarantee that a man should not be flogged except by order of court martial. The hon. and gallant Member, in his speech, had made a most extraordinary statement in saying that no good soldier was liable to the lash, or could, by any possibility, be flogged; but, on the contrary, he (Major Nolan) maintained that a good soldier was just as likely to be flogged as a bad one, inasmuch as two-thirds of the floggings were for breaches of the most trivial camp rules. If hon. Members doubted his assertion, let them read the last Blue Book issued, and they would find that a number of Zulus gave it as a reason for leaving our Service that they were flogged for breaking camp rules which were not explained to them. Under such circumstances as these, if the hon. and gallant Baronet was in the position of a General commanding in the field, he would see very little flogging going on, and could, therefore, write home and say that there was no flogging in the Army, because it would go on without his knowledge. Without receiving specific orders to flog the soldiers, the provost marshal, in order to carry out the wishes of the General with regard to camp rules, caught the first man who broke them and flogged him; no returns were kept of the number of floggings that took place; and, as he had said before, the best soldier under that system was just as likely to be flogged as a bad one, because he was just as likely to break the camp rules. He had no doubt that upon this principle in Afghanistan and Zululand between 300 and 400 men had been flogged during the wars in those countries. This would be known when the men came home, and would reach the places from which recruits came, by word of mouth, just the same as if it had been published in the newspapers; and the more so, because it was endeavoured to suppress it. He maintained that the class of soldiers must be raised; and one step in that direction was to remove the stigma cast upon them by corporal punishment. And he believed that if the punishment of flogging was kept up, the enthusiasm of the men would be damped when the country entered upon any great war, and that it would be very difficult, indeed, to get men into the ranks. The hon. Member for Meath (Mr. Parnell) had said that a soldier should be most pleased when a time of war arrived; but, as matters now stood, he would say—"This is the time for me to be flogged."

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON briefly pointed out that the discussion had been carried on as if corporal punishment was confined to the Army. It seemed to have been forgotten that it was practised in the Navy, and even to a greater extent than it was in the Army. A captain of a man-of-war could order the punishment to be inflicted if the sentence was approved by two other officers. But this seemed to have been forgotten. ["No, no!"] Yes; it had not been alluded to to-day, nor yet a few days ago, when the hon. and learned Member for Louth (Mr. Sullivan) spoke on the subject. He could not see why the retention of the punishment should be held to be so degrading in the Army and not so in the Navy. The good men of the Army did not object—they knew they were exempt from the punishment; but they also knew it was necessary to retain the punishment as the only means of keeping in order a class of men with whom they had to associate. The hon. and gallant Member for Galway (Major Nolan) talked of what happened in Abyssinia; but he (Sir Alexander Gordon) had seen larger Armies than were engaged in Abyssinia, and he knew the most important operations of war might be carried on without flogging, if the men knew there was the power to inflict the punishment. The question had been sufficiently discussed; and he only wished to say that the Navy was subject to the same punishment, and to this no objection had been raised in this debate.

MR. O'DONNELL said, in consequence of the persistent and thorough manner in which military men insisted on retaining the honour of flogging for the private soldiers of the British Army, he gave Notice that in all cases where the flogging was retained for the soldier, he would move on the Report of the Bill that the honour should be extended to the officers of the Army.

SIR HENRY HAVELOCK said, the discussion would soon extinguish itself; but he desired one word to give the Committee the opportunity of judging of the value of the statements of the hon. and gallant Member for Galway (Major Nolan). His remarks implied that under the power given by this Act the provost marshal in the field was enabled, almost whenever he liked, to inflict the punishment, and, practically, without supervision. But if he believed that, he could not have read the Bill. If he referred to the Bill he would find among its provisions one that had been in existence almost as long as the British Army, by which this power to inflict corporal punishment was strictly limited to those cases of gross and violent offences in the field of which the provost marshal had been a personal eye-witness. The provost marshal was restricted to this by his commission, which could only be varied by the General commanding. He could only exercise his power in those cases where he had himself witnessed violent or disgraceful offences; in other cases, he had to refer to the decision of the commanding General. Clause 72, on page 40, would show this; and, under the circumstances, he did not think this power of the provost marshal was in excess of the requirements of warfare.

MR. O'CONNOR POWER said, two statements had been made, not very well reconcilable. The hon. and learned Member for Stockport (Mr. Hopwood) had been charged with engaging in a debate upon a subject on which he had no knowledge; and, later on, his hon. and gallant Friend (Major Nolan) had been alluded to as the instigator of certain proceedings in connection with this subject. Whatever want of knowledge there might be on the part of the hon. and learned Member for Stockport was fully made up by the practical experience of the hon. and gallant Member for Galway (Major Nolan). Why did the

hon. and gallant Baronet (Sir Henry Havelock) allude so positively to the action his hon. and gallant Friend had taken; and what was the meaning of the wild shout from the opposite Benches when the observation was made? The only interpretation he could put upon it was that it was an attempt to intimidate the hon. and gallant Member in the discharge of his duty. It was not the first time that intimations had been made to hon. Gentlemen connected with the Service, who chose to adopt a peculiar line of policy, that they would be marked men. If that was what was intended in the present instance, the sooner it was known and understood in Ireland the better; and he was glad his hon. and gallant Friend had met it in the spirited way he had; and, if the hon. and gallant Baronet expected to limit opposition by his remarks, he had mistaken his man. With reference to this subject of flogging, he did not intend to go over the ground occupied by other hon. Members; but it was surprising to him that when Parliament said that there should be a regulation whip used in the Prisons and in the Navy, that the authorities at the Horse Guards had not adopted a similar regulation in the Army; it was a matter to which the Secretary of State for War would do well to direct his attention. In the case of the prison rules and regulations, it was required that a copy should be laid on the Table of the House. A similar course might be adopted with the Army whip, so that Members might test the weight of the instrument; and, even if so disposed, subject themselves to the discipline, and so get practical knowledge of what the poor fellows suffered whose backs were lacerated. On whom should rest the stigma of calling the Army a collection of scoundrels and blackguards? Certainly not on those who endeavoured to get the punishment of flogging abolished in the Army. This was a most serious subject; and, as they had failed to induce the Government to make the slightest attempt to meet the Amendment, he hoped no division would be taken to-day. He trusted the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War would not press this matter any further; but that he should be allowed to adjourn the question until he had more time to give it consideration.

MAJOR NOLAN said, the hon. and gallant Baronet (Sir Henry Havelock) had impugned his statements, and had referred to Clause 72, which authorized the appointment of provost marshals. But the law with regard to provost marshals was extremely strained, or the facts which he (Major Nolan) had referred to would not have happened. He had been speaking of the law as it actually existed, and not of this Bill. He (Major Nolan) had carefully read the clause in this Bill, and he failed to find what had been stated by the hon. and gallant Baronet. He thought provost marshals might flog men for almost anything under the clause. He wished hon. Members to see this clause, and to examine the powers given under it. Certainly, as to the class of evidence, the clause was terribly stringent; because it said that the provost marshal himself might see the offence committed, or one of his assistants might see it; while the provost marshal could have any number of corporals, or lance corporals, or even private soldiers as his assistants. This provost marshal had it in his power to flog men for the most trivial offences; so that where they found the clause simply protecting the soldier for an offence he did not commit, then, on the other hand, it allowed the provost marshal, practically, to flog for almost anything. For instance, the clause said—

“And the powers of such provost marshals shall be regulated according to the established usages of war.”

Now, that simply meant that if anyone in the camp said he had known a man to have been flogged for such and such an offence—it might be 20 years before—then that might be construed into a warranty for flogging. In another place it said—

“The General or other officer commanding the Forces on active service shall cause the provost marshals to exercise the powers intrusted to them in such manner and under such circumstances as he may consider to be best calculated to prevent and instantly to repress offences injurious to the discipline of the Forces under his command and to the Public Service.”

On the whole, he should say there never was a clause drawn up more expressly to cover every possible case than this clause. But he would turn to the latest and best evidence that could be got—namely, the last Blue Book from Zululand, and he defied the hon. and gallant

Baronet to say that the men were not there flogged in large numbers for the most trifling offences. True, they were Zulus, and not European soldiers; but he had himself seen Europeans flogged for very nearly the same things, and they now found that those things were going on at the present moment. He did not see what better evidence they could have than this book, which was published on the authority of the Government. The provost marshal, it seemed, did not keep the returns; but there were statements in this Book which were supposed to be correct. He should like either the hon. and gallant Baronet, or the hon. and gallant General (General Shute)—who had been out with large Armies, and both of whom had had larger Forces under their command, and more experience than himself—to say whether five men, or even 10 men, had not been flogged every day amongst those Forces? Could they say they knew that was not the case? Had they made inquiry to satisfy themselves that in a Force, say, of 20,000 men, that was not the common average? They would not know, perhaps, unless they took the trouble to ascertain the fact. But he believed that in every British Army in the field a very fair amount of flogging usually went on—it was such a very convenient punishment. They had nothing to do but to catch a man and to tie him up to the nearest post, and give him 20 lashes, and say nothing more about it. It need not be reported to anybody, and there the matter ended. He dared say the man would not commit the same offence again. He dared say the punishment was tolerably effectual; but its great merit was that it was so extremely convenient, and because it was convenient it was used, and that was the reason of its retention. He should like to see it abolished altogether, if possible. He acknowledged he did not hope to get it abolished; but he intended to propose such Amendments as would limit it down to what had been stated in that House should be the limit—that was to say, to limit it to cases in which foreign nations used it. That, he thought, would diminish it by 9-10ths.

MR. JACOB BRIGHT said, a great many references had been made in the course of the debate to the hon. and gallant Baronet the Member for Sunderland (Sir Henry Havelock), and he was not surprised, seeing that his was the only speech which had been made in the debate in favour of the necessity of flogging. Well, he (Mr. Bright) congratulated hon. Gentlemen opposite that they had left to that (the Opposition) side of the House the task of defending that unfortunate institution. But the speech of his hon. and gallant Friend the Member for Sunderland had, he thought, entirely failed in convincing anybody that flogging was necessary or desirable. If he (Mr. Bright) had previously been in favour of flogging, he thought he would have been convinced by that speech of the folly of it. Why, the hon. and gallant Baronet made a deliberate statement that in the Zulu and Afghanistan Wars not a single individual had been flogged. There had been no necessity for flogging in those two wars; and he further said that he believed that when the Zulu War had ended, it would then be found that nobody in the Army had been flogged. Surely, he (Mr. Bright) might appeal to the hon. and gallant Baronet, and ask him to give up this wretched rag which still remained, after so much had been removed and reformed. He would ask him to give that up, as we could so well do without it—that we could carry on two wars without any necessity for using the cat. When the question was last debated before the Recess, he remembered the argument relied on by those who defended flogging was this—it was said it would be impossible on the line of march to find a substitute for it, and that, therefore, they must have flogging on the line of march. Well, the hon. Member for Meath (Mr. Parnell), in the course of this debate, had shown, he thought, very clearly that there were other deterring punishments that might be adopted; and although his hon. and gallant Friend the Member for Sunderland referred to the speech of the hon. Member for Meath, he did not deal with those substitutions which the hon. Member for Meath suggested. On the contrary, he dealt with only one of those suggestions, which he seemed to think was somewhat ridiculous; but not with the others, which were of more importance. The hon. and gallant Baronet said this was a most disgraceful punishment. Yes, it was disgraceful to the individual who received it, disgraceful to the Army wherein it existed, and, in his opinion, disgraceful to the country which permitted it. He believed this country would stand better before the eyes of foreigners by abandoning this punishment, as they had already abandoned it. He trusted that when the hon. and gallant Baronet reflected a little more on the matter, he would assist those who objected to this disgraceful punishment in getting rid of it. He (Mr. Bright) believed, as the hon. Member for Burnley (Mr. Rylands) had said, that this punishment kept men out of the Army who would otherwise come to it, and that it lowered the standard of the Service.

Mr. Jacob Bright

SIR HENRY HAVELOCK remarked, that a pointed allusion had been made to him by the hon. Gentleman who had just sat down, and for whose opinion he had a just respect. He must compliment his hon. Friend on the very marked contrast between the tone of his moderate speech and that of those very excited speeches which preceded him from hon. Members a little lower down.

It being 10 minutes before Seven of the clock, Committee report Progress; to sit again upon Thursday.

The House suspended its sitting at Seven of the clock.

The House resumed its sitting at a quarter after Nine of the clock.

MOTIONS.

LONDON SCHOOL BOARD EXPENDITURE.—RESOLUTION.

MR. J. R. YORKE, in rising to call attention to the rapidly increasing expenditure of the London School Board, and to move—

“That the rapidly increasing expenditure of the London School Board requires the early attention of the Government, with the view of imposing on it some more effectual checks than appear at present to exist;”

said, it would not be necessary for him to go into the whole question of education, or beyond the financial question arising out of the proceedings of the London School Board, inasmuch as, these being hard times, and times in which they ought to look narrowly into all the different items of expenditure, which pressed heavily on the ratepayers, the only matter with which it was necessary for him to deal was as to the channels into which the expenditure of the country flowed. The taxpayer had many friends, who sought a cheap popularity by pecking at small economies. The ratepayer had fewer friends, who were stauncher, and had made stubborn fights in his behalf. It was always assumed that education was a pearl of great price, and the particular branch of expenditure that affected education had not any attractions for the popular speaker; but the time had come when all real economists should scrutinize very carefully the cost of education in this country. He proposed to confine his remarks to the area of the Metropolis, and, as far as that area was concerned, he should be able to show that the expenditure for educational purposes had been so excessive as to be dangerous, not only to the cause of economy, but to the cause of education itself. He thought a review of the Metropolis in its efforts on behalf of education in late years would show that education had not been advanced by the action of the London School Board, notwithstanding its extravagant expenditure, and there was evidence that a strong necessity existed for the Government to impose some check upon this action. He proposed to call attention to the financial position of the School Board in 1871, 1875, and 1879, and then to inquire into the causes of the absolute and relative cost of the system; how far it was due to defective machinery; or the unsound policy of the Act; or to extravagant administration; and to specify the different heads under which it showed itself, and to point out one or two ways in which it might be remedied; for it was supposed, when the Education Act was passed, that in London the School Board rate would not amount to more than from 2*d.* to 3*d.* in the pound; but this estimate had been very much exceeded. At that time, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bradford (Mr. W. E. Forster) said the rate would not exceed 3*d.* in the pound; the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich stated the same thing; and the now Leader of the House (Sir Stafford Northcote) moved an Amendment, that any sum beyond that amount should be divided equally between rates and taxes. The hon. and learned Member for Oxford (Sir William Harcourt) also saw that it was absolutely necessary to limit the rate; and he (Mr. Yorke) looked forward to the hon. and learned Gentleman's support that evening. It would be well for hon. Gentlemen to bear in mind that a rate of 1*d.* in the pound produced £100,000 a-year. In 1871 the first School Board for London provided schools for 104,000 children, at a cost of £11 per head, which was defrayed by the imposition of a rate of 2*d.* in the pound. He contended that, although the Education Department was powerless to remedy the existing state of things, there was yet a means of applying legislative agency to cure what was generally admitted to be a crying evil. In 1875 the state of things had alarmed the Vestries of the Metropolis. They met together, and determined to wait upon the noble Lord (Viscount Sandon), who was at that time Vice President of the Education Department. They stated, in the first place, that the neglected classes only should be provided for, whereas at that time many other classes were provided for. The Duke of Richmond, the President, in answer to that, said that the neglected classes were those to whom the Act was in the first instance intended to apply, but that they would hardly get the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bradford and his Colleagues to agree that it was not intended for other classes of the population. They said that sites too near to voluntary schools had been selected by the School Board. To that the noble Lord (Viscount Sandon) replied, that in many instances the Education Department had restrained the School Board from building too near to voluntary schools to interfere with their action. They also complained that the standard of education was too high. The answer was that that was a question for the ratepayers, and that the Education Department could not go into all those matters; that it had no right to restrain the action of the School Board unless it acted improperly; and that if the ratepayers thought the standard of education was too high the remedy was in their own hands. In that year the rate rose to 4½*d.* in the pound, and the average net cost for the education of the children, estimated for the year ending March, 1880, was £1 13*s.* 6*d.* per head on the rates; whereas in 1875, the average net cost per head was £1 2s. 9d., which had to be defrayed out of the rates. Coming to the year ending March, 1880, the Board had already borrowed £3,184,500, and the rate to be levied this year would amount to £551,247, equal to 5½d. in the pound on £24,000,000, the rateable valuable of the Metropolis. The increase last year was equal to £58,000. The Board stated that the total number for which accommodation was to be provided was 261,237; and, in the course of the next three years, they proposed to borrow £1,355,852, which, added to the sum already borrowed, would bring the total to £4,540,532. These figures showed that their loans had been increasing, and would continue to increase, at the annual rate of £500,000; and, looking to the future, it might be expected that in three years from the present time the rate would be 8d. in the pound. He thought he was not overstating the case in saying that, and that the expenditure of the Board would go on increasing at the rate of £75,000, for which a rate of ¾d. in the pound would be required. Indeed, the possibilities of the increase of the rate might be described as indefinite, if not infinite. If what he had stated did not reveal an alarming state of things, he did not know what would. This increase, it should be remembered, was exclusive of the present increase of the population. In these bad times, did anyone suppose that the cost of sites and buildings continued to increase? It was far more likely that it had decreased. In 1871 the cost of sites and premises averaged £11 per head of the children provided for; but now it was £20 17s. 7d. There was no reason whatever why this should be so, as labour and materials were not more expensive now than they were in 1871. The Education Department had pointed out that in 10 schools the cost per child for premises amounted to £23, while in two schools it reached £41, and that the final cost exceeded the preliminary estimate by 38 per cent. The cost of teaching was, in 1873, 12s. per child; in 1875, 16s.; and in 1878, 21s. 6d. There was no reason whatever why there should be this gradual increase. He thought it was to be accounted for by the fact that there was an impression on the School Board that no cost was too great to pay for education, and that when they had a large fund to draw upon it was a comfortable thing, and they might go on drawing from it without compunction.

"Suave est ex magno tollere acervo."

Of seven of the largest towns in England, London stood first, with a cost of £2 13s. 5d. per child, Liverpool coming next at £2 7s. 4½d., and Sheffield standing the lowest, with a cost of £1 19s. 6d. per head. Whichever way they looked at the matter, they would find that the cost of education under the London School Board was more expensive than the same kind of education elsewhere; while, with regard to getting in the fees, on the contrary, the case was just the reverse. In that respect the London Board schools stood far below the voluntary schools. They were at the top of the list in expenditure, and at the bottom in getting in the fees. The present system was Communistic in its working. Elementary education, like physical existence, was guaranteed to everybody by the State from motives of public policy. This was very proper; but the moment they outstepped the limits of what was reasonably necessary they trenched upon Communism. Every man had a right to live, but not to live luxuriously; and, in the same way, all had a right to be educated, but not to be educated luxuriously. The Act of 1876 laid down the principle that it was the duty of every parent to educate his child; but in London it was practically the rates that educated the children, while the parents paid only a small subsidy. The cost of education and accommodation was about 16d. per week for each child, of which sum the parents paid on an average only 2d. Moreover, as a matter of fact, the lowest class were not educated at all, though it was their ignorance which formed the pretext for all this expenditure. The other day he had gone with his hon. Friend the Member for South Leicestershire (Mr. Pell) to visit the parish of Limehouse, in the East End of London. They found that before the passing of the Act there had existed several large ragged schools in that locality for the poorest class of children. These schools were now closed, being superseded by the Board schools, and the children who were formerly taught in them were left to run about the streets. Around an organ-grinder they were able to count

Mr. J. R. Yorke

about 50 of these children dancing to the music within 300 yards of a School Board school, which they subsequently visited and found to be filled with children belonging to quite a superior class, the parents of some occupying houses of from £40 to £50 per year rating. They inquired how this was, and were informed that even if the ragged children came to the Board schools they were dismissed on trivial pretexts, such as want of cleanliness, their places being filled by the class of children to whom he had just referred; and the reason for this was quite obvious—the master had a direct interest in passing as large a number of children as possible, and he found the better class more remunerative. They were even told—though he could not vouch for the truth of the report—that there was connivance between the schoolmasters and those who worked the public machinery in order to bring this result about. The middle-class schools in that district were being destroyed by the Board schools, and numbers of brass plates had now disappeared from the doors, although they had reduced their fees to the lowest possible amount. In one of the schools young ladies learnt music, and drawing, and French, and they were told that some of the scholars lived beyond the London district, and actually came in by train in order to attend the school. The master, when asked if this was so, said he discouraged it as much as possible. The master of the Bethnal Green School provided some 60 books, costing about 5s. each, as prizes for his best scholars. This was a sort of mutual co-operation; the master gave the good scholars books, and the good scholars by their attainments were remunerative to the master. This was the way in which the fees were being used. They were, practically, trespassing on the ground of middle-class education, and providing for the well-to-do classes an education at the cost of the public, and the same results had occurred in other districts. In a letter to The Times to-day Mr. Rodgers said that it was ludicrous to maintain that too many schools were being built. Of course, if they continued to pursue the present system, they could not build schools enough. The more schools there were the more the middle classes would come in to fill them up, and the ragged children outside would not be touched, because it was to everybody's interest to keep them out. Their whole policy must be altered. Another point important to be observed was the decrease of the voluntary schools. The Marquess of Ripon had said in the House of Lords that it should be our object to maintain and foster the existing system; and the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bradford had declared that we must take care not to destroy the existing system in introducing a new one. In spite of these declarations, there were cases now in London in which the voluntary schools were being starved out, because they were underbid by the Board schools, which, in many cases, seemed to be established with this very object. In the parish of Limehouse, for example, within half-a-mile of the parochial schools, seven Board schools had been established, most of which charged only 1d. where 4d. had been charged before, and an eighth was being built. The result had been that the children in the voluntary schools had been reduced from between 2,000 and 3,000 to 500. In St. John's, Walworth, the attendance in the voluntary schools had been reduced from 1,500 to 900, and in Plumstead they were about to be given up. Their action was also detrimental to the discipline of the voluntary schools. It was a great advantage to a Board school teacher, from a pecuniary point of view, to get as pupils children whose education had been already rough hewn in the voluntary schools. In some cases there was an absolute refusal to take in gutter children. He would not weary the House with instances of voluntary schools being closed in consequence of the competition of the School Board schools. They were numerous. Only the other day he heard of a voluntary school in Westminster being closed after being in operation since 1830. It was more important to examine the relative cost of the two systems, and with that view he would premise that there were three factors in the finance of these schools—in the voluntary schools, subscriptions, fees, and grants; and in the Board schools, rates, fees, and grants. Let them omit the two last factors in each case and compare the cost of subscriptions and rates. When they had done so, the House would, perhaps, be surprised to find that the annual cost of the maintenance of children in voluntary schools was only 8s. 10½d., while in School Board schools it was £2 7s. 10d., or a little more than five times as much. In other words, for every child that could be educated under the School Board system five could be educated under the voluntary system; and the educational results, as shown by examinations, were within a trifle the same. Hon. Members must surely be very much enamoured of the School Board system of compulsion, if they thought it worth while to undermine and destroy the voluntary system, in order to substitute one which was so expensive and troublesome, and which produced no better result. The London School Board schools cost in building £20 17s. for each child; and they contained, as a rule, 800 places, and the certificated teachers were in the proportion of one to every 60 scholars. The average annual value of the head-master's place was estimated at £250; but many head-masters had £300, and some in exceptional cases as much as £400, £500, and £600. The average annual value of the head-mistress's place was £150, and that of the assistants from £100 to £150. A very objectionable feature of that payment was that part of it depended upon the passes at the Government examination; for the head-masters under the London School Board obtained half the education grant, which was, on the average, 15s. per child, and the other half was divided among their assistants. Thus, the ratepayers were first rated to maintain all this expensive machinery, and then taxed just in proportion to the success it achieved. Now, that, he contended, was a misapplication of the system of education grants, which were originally designed to stimulate voluntary effort. The schools, in his opinion, ought to receive grants, not in direct proportion to the amount of money they managed to extract from the pockets of the ratepayers, but in inverse ratio. The result of giving them indiscriminate aid was that since 1874 the education grant, which was, of course, paid out of taxation, had increased from £2,100,000 to £3,600,000, and there was no prospect of its diminishing. It appeared to him, also, that, considering the large class of Visitors and Superintendents, the compulsory clauses of the Act were not very satisfactorily carried out. The result was that the attendance of middle-class children was encouraged to the exclusion of the class which most required education. Occasionally, however, the agents of compulsion made themselves odious by cases of hardship. One of these he heard the other day from Mr. Serjeant Cox. A blind man's son, who had passed the 1st Standard, surreptitiously left school and took service as a page. Before he had been long in his place he was discovered by one of the School Board officers, stripped of his buttons, and sent back to school in rags to learn the higher subjects, and the blind man presumably suffered in consequence. He now came to the details of the alleged extravagance of the School Board. There was first the machinery of compulsion. The estimated increase on that head this year was from £18,000 to £19,000. It consisted of 11 Superintendents and 213 Visitors, and the establishment was unsatisfactory, because there was no means of supervising its action. When one came to look at the budget of the School Board, one was struck by the enormous scale on which everything was conducted. Everybody seemed to get about 50 per cent more than similar persons in other departments of life. Not to speak of the famous 400-guinea carpet or the general furniture of the School Board offices, which was said to be exceedingly sumptuous, he found that they did things in what might be thought very handsome style. For instance, they had three Inspectors at £450, one at £375, and one at £350; one singing Inspector at £300, one deaf-and-dumb Inspector at £300, one needlework Inspector at £175, one kinder-garten Inspector at £190, one Inspector of the blind at £90, one drill Inspector at £170, which was a handsome addition to the pay of a retired sergeant; one shorthand clerk at £375. Even the messenger was well paid, for he had £80, and the hall porter £75. This was an arrangement with which everybody would be satisfied, except the ratepayers. In the architect's department the architect had £1,000 a-year, with an assistant at £360; an inspector of furniture, £245, with two assistants at £139 each. The total cost of the architect's department being £4,495. He now came to the details of the Shaftesbury training-ship. It was originally called the Nubia, and the Home Secretary approved of the purchase, on the understanding that it should cost not more than £15,000. It was to receive 350 boys under the age of 12.

The result was that the total amount expended, instead of being £15,600, was £43,474 14s. 8d. That startled the Board, and they accordingly appointed a committee to investigate the matter; and, to do them credit, they did not attempt to screen the members responsible for the extravagance, and freely criticized some of the details of the expenditure. They reported that there had been unnecessary expense—amounting, in some cases, to extravagance—in the mode of furnishing the vessel. Referring to special items of expenditure, they pointed out that two rugs were bought for the ships at a cost of £16 each, and three carpets at a cost of more than £18 each; £36 had been spent in furnishing a seat in the stern of the ship; 12 rugs had been provided at a cost of 21s. each, and nine Caspian rugs at a cost of 30s. each. These rugs had been placed in various parts of the ship, and even in the quarters of the carpenters and stokers. The committee recorded their opinion that the articles mentioned above were entirely unsuited to an industrial school. They regretted that extravagant sums should have been spent on Oriental rugs, and on the fittings of two rooms intended for members of the Board on the occasions of their visits to the ship, and in the purchase of a piano for the use of the captain's wife. The cost of furnishing these rooms amounted to £273 19s. 8½d. One of the most remarkable things, however, to which he wished to call the attention of the House was the fact that the staff of officers for the ship was complete and costing a large annual sum at a time when there were hardly any boys in the vessel. At the end of August there were on board the ship only 30 boys, 17 being the number of the officers, who were being paid at the rate of £1,758 per annum. The number of boys on board had, no doubt, increased since then; but as yet the vessel had not her full complement, although the staff had been complete ever since August. In fact, the vessel was not expected to receive her full complement of boys until 1880; and yet, with these naturally inadequate duties to perform, the salaries of these officers had already been increased. He would compare the cost of the boys on board the Shaftesbury with the cost of the boys in Greenwich Hospital School, which was a very successful school maintained by the Admiralty. In the ship the average cost of maintenance for 350 boys was £25 per head, the average cost at Greenwich School for 983 boys being £18 12s. 7d. per head, a result which was highly creditable to the Admiralty. Again, the gross amount of the salaries of the staff in Greenwich Hospital School was only £2,716, or one-third more than the gross amount paid to the officers in the Shaftesbury, which was now £1,958, though the number of boys in the former school nearly trebled the number of those in the latter. What he mainly objected to, however, was the kind of teaching which was carried out. The compulsory teaching provided in Board schools should not, he maintained, go beyond the three R's. That amount of education was all that the State owed to the children. Any additional subject should be optional and paid for by the parents. Great expense was caused by the presence in all Board schools of teachers competent to teach a host of subjects in addition to the elementary ones which he had indicated; for he found the ordinary course not only included them and Bible knowledge, but also book-keeping, mensuration, elementary instruction in physical science, the history of England, elementary geography, and elementary social economy, whatever that might be. A knowledge of the last-named subject was, he thought, very much needed by the members of the Board themselves. To these might be added music, drill, and several other accomplishments. The subjects which he had named were the ordinary compulsory ones; but there were others which were discretionary, and which presented a still more formidable curriculum, as it included Euclid, Algebra, physical geography, French, Latin, chemistry, animal physiology, botany, and many other equally abstruse subjects, the understanding of which would be an education suited to the higher classes of society, domestic economy being one of them. Why domestic economy should be discretionary, when social economy was compulsory, he quite failed to see. Anyone who should go through all the subjects taught by the Board would issue forth into the world better furnished for the battle of life than many hon. Members who had received expensive educations.

["Hear, hear!"] Yes; but he wished those who cheered to recollect that these children were expected by the Board to learn all these subjects while they were between five and 10 years of age; but they were enough, if properly followed out, to occupy for a long time the attention of persons of mature years. The House would, therefore, be able to imagine what a hopeless hotch-potch the head of the boy would be who had drilled into him, before he was 10 years of age, the rudiments of the many different subjects to which the Board turned the attention of its scholars. He held that common sense suggested that if rudimentary education of this character was to be imparted by the Board to a child, it should have some practical reference to the object of the child's life—to the pursuit by which he was to gain his bread; that the boy who was to become a groom should learn how to manage horses, and that the boy who was to become a gardener should learn to dig. Boys who were to be artizans, and who were turned out into the world with a certain amount of knowledge of albumen and other abstruse matters belonging to organic chemistry would hardly digest the information that had been decanted into them. As instances of the confused ideas which children so universally instructed carried away with them, one was that at an examination he had heard a question asked what was a monitor, and the answer quickly given was, "an iron-clad." Then, again, in a girls' school, when the subject was "Milk as the best possible food," one girl said it was so, because God made it; another, because puppies and kittens thrive on it; and, another, because it contained starch. He would go no further into that branch of the subject. What he wished to show was that, at the present time, there was no effectual check upon the action of the Board. The Education Office, the Local Government Department, and the House of Commons had left the whole thing in the hands of the School Board to do practically as they liked. Of course, he knew that the Education Department in the pre-compulsory epoch, was invented for the purpose of stimulating the action of voluntary schools; and it was no wonder that, after having so long applied the whip and the spur, they should find themselves unable to apply the curb to

Board schools. Practically, all they had done in regard to the Board was to say—"Well, gentlemen, so long as your constituents do not pull you up, we do not feel it necessary to interfere." Lately, however, a change of policy had been adopted by the Department; and in stopping the supplies they had, he was glad to say, surprised the Board with reference to financial matters, and had placed them in a somewhat awkward position. The Board, in the correspondence in the hands of hon. Members, however, had declined to admit that they were the least in the wrong, and they gave no sort of assurance that they would confine their expenditure within proper limits. The Local Government Board had since then taken the matter in hand, and their Auditor had surcharged the Board with the charge for interest on temporary loans. The Law Officers of the Crown, who had been consulted on that proceeding, were, unfortunately, at variance; and while the Attorney General upheld the Board, the Solicitor General upheld the Department. Meanwhile, it was evident that the Board had not repented, for it was now endeavouring to borrow another £20,000 of the Bank of England for temporary purposes; and what was there to prevent them doing so—from borrowing money at interest whenever they wished to carry out any new proposal? He was glad to see that the Bill of the Government in regard to the Public Works Loan Commissioners would have some effect in checking the action of the Board, inasmuch as it would restrict its borrowing powers to £100,000 per annum, and spread the re-payments over 30 instead of 50 years. The House, however, would remember that that would impose no real check, unless something could be done to prevent them from obtaining these temporary loans. They would only go into the open market, where they would have to pay a higher interest, so that the last stage of the ratepayers would be worse than the first. He thought he had shown that the Board had indulged in excessive expenditure of which no probable end—unless it was stopped—could be seen, and that, therefore, the subject was one which urgently demanded attention from the Government. He wished to cure those evils, and thought that, in accordance with the resolutions recently adopted by delegates in the Metropolis, a limit ought to be placed on the amount of the School Board rate. In 1870 a limit of 3*d.* was suggested; but that, alas! was a limit to which there was now no chance of reverting, still he thought some limit should be fixed. Again, when the Board wished to build new schools he thought they ought to be compelled to come to Parliament in the same way as any other municipality which wished to execute public works, and before they obtained consent be compelled to prove their necessity to a Committee. He thought, moreover, the rate-defrayed educational standard ought to be limited to "the three R's," and that anything and everything beyond that standard ought to be paid for by the parents. Then, again, the payments for results should be less in rate-supported schools than in voluntary schools; and he thought undue competition with voluntary schools should be further limited by fixing the maximum fee in Board schools at 2*d.*, as, if they got below that sum, they underbid the voluntary schools and made the Board schools practically free schools. There was one other suggestion which he would add, and that was that the School Board rate should be collected separately and not added on to the other rates, for the first necessity was to bring the situation home to the people who had to pay. If it were separate, those who paid for it would, at all events, see, not only what they had to pay, but what they were paying for. He would say, in conclusion, that he had moved in the matter as a friend of economy in the first place; but he hoped he would not be regarded as opposed to education. He was willing to admit that the London School Board had done a great deal of work; for, while it had not educated a large number of children who ought to have been educated, it had, doubtless, provided for many who would not otherwise have been touched, although it had done it at an enormous expense; but he thought that if the Board continued to indulge in such an educational carnival as had for some time been going on, they would soon witness a violent re-action in the public mind, for that educational hot fit would soon be over. In his opinion, it would be a cause of regret if the policy of 1870 had to be revised. For the reasons which he had stated, he begged to move the Resolution of which he had given Notice.

Mr. J. R. Yorke

SIR BALDWIN LEIGHTON: I beg leave to second the Motion of the hon. Member for East Gloucestershire (Mr. J. R. Yorke). It is not my intention to traverse the ground or the figures already gone over so ably by him; but rather to confine myself to a few facts and some suggestions; to concentrate the observations I shall venture to trouble the House with on them, and to be rather practical than statistical. It is quite unnecessary, I trust, to disclaim any Party feeling in this matter. Fortunately, the cause of education among the poorest classes has not yet been made the battle ground of Parties, and I trust it never may be. What discussion there has been on the subject has been chiefly on religious or denominational ground. Well, I will say at once, I do not intend to refer to that, and I trust no one else will. It has ceased, I believe, to be a difficulty in the way of education. But what I desire to premise is the ground on which I second this Motion, in which my hon. Friend agrees; but, perhaps, he did not make it as clear as could be desired. It is not expenditure, qua expenditure, if the work were thoroughly done that we find fault with. It is that the work is not done, though all this expense is incurred, and that, in some cases, even the work seems to be getting undone. In short, it appears to me, and I shall submit the facts with perfect frankness to the judgment of the House—it seems to me that the spirit of the Act is not carried out. We are not, therefore, in hostility to the School Board or the Acts, which I quite acknowledge to be an urgent necessity of the times; but I want to see it made more efficient, and, if possible, more economic. I want to see the work effectually done without any further waste of time or money, in the spirit of the Act, which should not any longer be used to undo the work of the voluntary schools. From that point of view, it might, perhaps, have been better to have asked for a Select Committee for inquiry, in which the School Board might have answered, if they could, some of the facts brought forward, and a few impartial and earnest men might have considered if the spirit of the Acts could not be better carried out; or else the Act itself amended. Now, Sir, let us see what are the Acts and their spirit; and then, what are the facts and their results. There is the main Act of 1870, and the two Amendment Acts of 1873 and 1876. It is hardly necessary for me to quote the words of these Acts; they are familiar to every hon. Member who has attended to the subject. The main principles are three:—First, that there shall be schools provided within reach of every child; 2nd, that the children shall be compelled to attend; 3rd, that the teaching shall be efficient. The Act of 1873 recites particularly that schools shall not be built unless the Education Department is satisfied of their necessity; and that the rates shall only be used for purposes of elementary education. The Act of 1876 provides that Boards of Guardians shall be the attendance committee where there is no school board, and particularly dwells on the responsibilities of parents and their liability to provide education for their children. But now, what is the spirit of the Act, and where are we to look for it? Why, in the speech of the Minister who introduced the Act, and who represented the mind of his Government and the purpose of his Party—the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bradford (Mr. W. E. Forster). In taking the liberty of reading a few sentences from that speech, I should like to say I not only entirely agree in them, but I agree in every word of that speech, and if the right hon. Gentleman will allow me to say so, it is an utterance, not only of the usual ability and sound sense of the right hon. Gentleman, but shows a statesmanlike foresight of what might happen if certain courses were followed; it contains a creation and a forecast of facts which have, I fear, been fulfilled in some cases contrary to his intention. In that speech the right hon. Gentleman said—

“First of all, we must not forget the duty of parents. Then, we must not forget our duty to our constituencies, our duty to the taxpayers. . . . Still, we must remember that it is upon them that the burden will fall. And, thirdly, we must take care not to destroy in building up—not to destroy the existing system in introducing a new one. In solving this problem there must be, consistently with the attainment of our object, the utmost endeavour not to injure existing and efficient schools. . . . The main principles. . . . are two in number. . . . Legal enactment, that there shall be efficient schools everywhere throughout the kingdom. Compulsory provision of such schools if and where needed, but not unless proved to be needed. . . . Who are to pay for it? . . . Shall we give up the school fees? . . . I at once say that the Government are not prepared to do it. The parents paid in school fees last year about £420,000. If this scheme works . . . that £420,000 per annum would have to be doubled, or even trebled. Nor would it stop there. This would apply to the elementary education chiefly of the working classes. The middle classes would step in and say—‘There must be free education also for us, and that free education must not be confined to elementary schools.’ . . . The cost would be such as really might well alarm my right hon. Friend the Chancellor. . . . We do not give up the school fees, and, indeed, we keep to the present proportion—namely, of about one-third raised from the parents, one-third out of the public taxes, and one-third out of local funds.”—[3 Hansard, cxcix. 443-4, 454-5.]

That is the spirit of the Act of 1870, as set forth by the right hon. Gentleman opposite, the Member for Bradford, who introduced it. Well, such are the Education Acts and the spirit of those Acts; but what are the facts? I have thought it better to confine my examination to one district which I have taken at haphazard, District A on School Board block plan, which represents Westminster. It was found that there were 8,000 children in that district, and accommodation for all but about 150 already provided by voluntary schools. Let me say a word here about educational statistics; they are thoroughly fallacious, even if the number of children exists which they compute; their deduction for absentees is very much below the right number. They allow for 5 per cent absentees, and sometimes for as much as 10 or 15; but the real number should be 25 to 30. You cannot get more than 75 per cent into the schools, experience shows, especially in a place like Westminster. But supposing we accept these numbers, the offer was made to provide the additional accommodation required, which was at once rejected, and the School Board determined to provide for 620 children. Now, that is not, I think, the spirit of the Act. Besides, it is evident that so small a number as 150, or 2 per cent on the whole number, would be certain to be absorbed by truant schools or industrial schools. But let all that pass. I maintain that, before they were entitled to build, they were bound to see that the existing schools were filled. And then a very important point arises. The London attendant officers or visitors, as they are called, do not seem to think it necessary to see to the attendance at voluntary schools, but only their own Board schools. That is surely a great weakness in the whole administration. It is like pouring water into a sieve. I do not see how you are ever to get the children educated at that rate, until you have covered London with Board schools and destroyed every voluntary school, at a cost of £1,500,000 a-year or more. Well, this school was built in the Horseferry Road, and what was the result? One school with 370 places was immediately closed, and six or seven more had half their scholars taken from them to fill this Board school. Out of the 600 children who came into that school there were only 20 who were not taken out of voluntary schools. Sir, is this the spirit of the Act? This is not supplying a demand; it is destroying a supply; it is creating a hiatus. Meanwhile, the "wastrel" children are still about the streets; and I believe it could be shown that after eight or nine years of expenditure there is not a single child in Westminster being educated, or being better educated, who was not being similarly educated before the Act, for there are 500 or 600 places more in the district than are required. It might be said the people are too poor to send their children. That is not the case. I visited at a ragged school, under Government inspection, which was only half full—60 children—where there was room for 120. They took in barefeet children and charged nothing. As regards these ragged schools, I would not say one word about the managers or promoters of them. They have been, as it were, the volunteers or pioneers of the educational movement, and all honour to them; but it seems to me that to maintain in the present day an inefficient school, as some of these are, is an anomaly and an anachronism. If they cannot make them all efficient, they should reduce their number. And as I desire to be impartial, and perfectly frank with the House, I should like to say here that some of the charges brought against the Board in Westminster, at least, are unfounded; the education they gave was similar to the voluntary schools; their fees nominally the same, though there were some allowances for books, &c., which offered superior attraction, and I did not notice any unjustifiable expense thrown away on the buildings. It may be different in other parts; but I speak only of what I have seen. But this is not all; not content with knocking up these voluntary schools, and having hundreds of places in excess of the number required, the Board next proceeded to build another school, and bought what is known as the Ebury Street site. Then, the Education Board stepped in and refused its consent. Sir, I ask again, is this the spirit and intention of the Act, as set forth in the words of the right hon. Gentleman opposite—

Sir Baldwin Leighton

"The least possible expenditure of public money, the utmost endeavour not to injure existing and efficient schools?"

Surely, it is a travestie of the work intended. Then as to the expenditure. I must say a few words about the Shaftesbury training ship. My hon. Friend (Mr. J. R. Yorke) has gone over the items, so I shall only call attention to the form of the Report of the Committee of Inquiry. I do not wish to press this matter hard on the School Board, because I am informed that they acknowledge it has been a gross miscarriage of administration. But if the work in Westminster is a travestie of the Act, surely the Report of this Committee is a very parody of an inquiry. Out of a Committee of 10 only three sign the Report, less than one-third, and they condemn the extravagance, and point out certain informalities which I should have thought are illegalities. Two, being the principal offenders, write a separate Report of their own in justification; one, a lady—Mrs. Elizabeth Surr—with the courage and devotion of her sex, does rap out the truth in a solitary paragraph signed by herself alone, in which she says the Report conveys but an inadequate idea of the waste incurred and the conduct of the committee; and the remaining four members, including the Chairman and Vice Chairman of the School Board, decline to be responsible for anything contained in the Report. Sir, I have had some experience on Committees and as Chairman of Committees of Inquiry; but I never read such an extraordinary discussion as this. It is said, in mitigation, that this is the only case of extravagance. I should be glad to think so; but, unfortunately, several others have reached me. The central offices of the Board on the Embankment were to have cost £40,000; but £70,000 has had to be paid. Then one school was built so near a bone boiler's premises that £4,000 had to be spent in buying him up. A reduction of 25 per cent was made in an estimate, owing to an observation of a member of the Board, in some schools at Sydenham. And there is the case of the Ebury Street site, which will have to be sold at a great loss. Speaking as one who has given some attention to Public Business and administrative economy, I characterize these as instances of reckless expenditure. I have limited these observations to a few facts; but there are other districts just as bad. In Bloomsbury, Board schools have been built in the midst of several voluntary schools, of which five have been closed and two half emptied; while one expensive master, at a salary of £250 a-year, is employed to teach a sort of rough ragged school of the lowest class. In Wandsworth, the same sort of thing goes on, and the wastrel children are still as neglected as ever. Now, what are the cures for this? It has been said that the system is in fault, not the members of the Board, who, excepting two or three, find it impossible to look into the finance, which is left to officials. Well, surely, they could sub-divide their districts. Then, a visitor of the School Board told an informant of mine that—"You—the voluntary agencies—can deal better with those gutter children than we can." Well, that is a candid admission. It seems to me, first speaking with great deference, that the School Board should be, in the first instance, an attendance committee, and then, where the necessity existed—that is, where they have managed to fill the schools—they should proceed to supply accommodation by building. They should not be guided by theoretic statistics, but by the fulness or emptiness of existing schools. Then, secondly, they ought to charge proper fees, and not remit them or wink at their not being paid, which is demoralizing to the children. If the scale of fees adopted at Bradford and Leeds were insisted on in London, it would bring in some £50,000 a-year more, and the parents could, no doubt, afford to pay it. Then there ought, lastly, to be some better audit and control. Supposing that after the rate exceeded 3d., which we were told was to be the maximum, one-half was payable by the Treasury, some such financial check well devised, we should have less of the reckless expenditure, because it would be some one's interest to look after it. But, Sir, if this system of displacing all the voluntary schools with expensive Board schools is to obtain, it cannot stop with London, it must extend to every town and every parish in England; and we shall have some £15,000,000 or £20,000,000 a-year charged on the rates with no better education given than now. That is a serious consideration. This London School Board has already got to loggerheads, however, with the Education Department and the Local Government Board, and a case is now being tried in the Law Courts on a surcharge of £16,000. I should like to make one suggestion here. There is a Commission sitting on the City Charities at present, and £100,000 or £200,000 a-year will have to be re-applied. I believe no better object could be found for some of these funds than secondary education arising out of elementary schools; something just above the three R's, which ought, no doubt, to be provided by the Board or by voluntary schools. Sir, I venture to hope that Her Majesty's Government may see their way to adopting the spirit of the Motion, and taking counsel, perhaps, with the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. W. E. Forster), will see their way to bringing the expenditure and administration of this School Board into harmony with the spirit and intention of the Acts. I beg to second the Motion.

Sir Baldwyn Leighton

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That the rapidly increasing expenditure of the London School Board requires the early attention of the Government, with the view of imposing on it some more effectual checks than appear at present to exist."—(Mr. Reginald Yorke.)

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, he should be glad to have given way to any member of the School Board, either present or past. Two or three of those members were now in the House; and he (Mr. W. E. Forster) hoped they would hear from them some reply to the statements, he might say the charges, of the hon. Member for East Gloucestershire (Mr. J. R. Yorke). He (Mr. W. E. Forster) was glad to have the efficient help in past times of two very responsible members

